THE AMERICAN INDICTMENT.

IT is fortunately not probable that the English Government or its representatives at Geneva should lose their temper; but perhaps the majority of Englishmen have begun within the last week to modify the general satisfaction with which the Treaty of Washington had been regarded. The few dissentients who thought that the national dignity had not been sufficiently guarded, and that there was a risk in unlimited concession, readily admitted that it was useless to resist the prevailing judgment of Parliament and of the community; nor can they derive satisfaction from the proof that their doubts and fears were well founded. In truth, the impression that American rancour had at last been conciliated was universal in England; and it is not surprising that the attainment of so desirable an object should have been thought worth the heavy price at which it had been purchased. The case, or, as it is justly called by its authors, the indictment, against England will have undecayed all who are not obstinately determined to retain their amiable illusions. Mr. SUMNER'S speech, General BUTLER'S frequent harangues, General GRANT'S Message to Congress in December 1870, Mr. HAMILTON FISH'S Note to Lord CLARNDON at an earlier period, were friendly, moderate, and reasonable in comparison with the extravagant invective which is to be laid before the tribunal at Geneva as an excuse for monstrous and incredible demands. Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS, who was instructed to prepare the case, has been assisted by Mr. BLAMAN, author of several pamphlets which were conclusively answered by "Historians"; and their joint production has been revised by Mr. CALIB CUSHING, who, as Attorney-General in the Presidency of Mr. PIERCE, officially expressed the hope that a prosecution instituted against the English Minister would "rebound against the throne of Queen VICTORIA." The animosity which long preceded the Civil War is consistently cherished when all the pretexts for enmity have been changed. The Spectator, not unnaturally disturbed by the falsification of its hopes and prophecies, censured the Morning Post for a statement that the American demands might amount to four or five hundred millions sterling. As damages are asked for the supposed prolongation of the war during two years, the calculation of the Morning Post is short of the amount proposed to be extorted. It is true that no possible evidence can be adduced to show that the escape of the Alabama prolonged the war by two years, or two months, or by a day; but the immediate question is not as to the justice of the claim, but as to the spirit which is exhibited by those who prefer it.

It was universally understood in England that under the provisions of the Treaty no claim could be made either for indirect or for vindictive damages. The unprecedented concession of the English Commissioners in expressing the regret of their Government for acts which were not admitted to be wrongful ought alone to have been considered as a satisfaction in full for any cause of irritation unconnected with material loss; nor is it conceivable that any Government which respected itself or the nation which it represented could have agreed beforehand to be haled in damages for uncalculated and wilful mismanagement of which it might be convicted. According to the agents of the United States, some of the questions to be submitted to the tribunal at Geneva are whether England owes the war owed a debt of gratitude to the United States, whether the conduct of the English Government at the time of concession was unbecomingly, whether the language of Lord CLARNDON and Mr. FISH was objectionable, and whether the duties of a Minister were not violated. It is not necessary to state the cause of offence. The hostile intention of the framers of the document could not be more wilfully exhibited than in the mention of France as one of the States which had observed the obligations neglected by England. Among many unjust and intemperate effusions in the course of the long-standing controversy, the case of the American Government is the first attempt to aggravate the crimes of England by an invidious reference to earlier history. It seems that in several negotiations between 1812 and 1860 the United States Government was contented with a portion of its original demands, and it is coolly inferred that in every instance of the kind an obligation was incurred by England. One of the numerous benefits to be acknowledged was the conclusion of the Reciprocity Treaty with Canada, "from which the United States did not derive the slightest advantage." The arbitrators are virtually asked to increase the damages which may be awarded for the escape of the Alabama because it is to be assumed that every earlier abatement of an American demand was a voluntary concession of an admitted right. No special reference is probably made to the commencement of the San Juan demand, or to the unfriendly dismissal of the English Minister in the middle of the Crimean war. No English student of diplomatic history is ignorant of the harsh and overbearing tone in which American negotiations with England have been uniformly conducted.

The American Government describes as English cruizers, issuing from English ports, not only the Alabama, which, by an abuse of language, might be so designated, but the Santee, which was built and equipped within Confederate territory, and other vessels for which the English Government could in no way be responsible. The tribunal is asked to compensate the owners of the vessels and cargoes which were destroyed, the shipowners who transferred their ships into English names, the insured who paid higher rates, and the insurance offices which covered increased risks. The expenses of the American navy in pursuing and watching the Confederate cruizers are also to be reimbursed, and finally, the entire cost of one or two years of war is to be paid, amounting perhaps to six hundred millions sterling. The tribute exacted from France by Germany after a complete victory is trifling compared with the damages which are demanded by the United States in virtue of a treaty which enthusiasts described as the commencement of a new era of peace and friendship. The most hostile and the most scornful of Prince BISMARCK'S communications to the French Government are courteous and friendly in comparison with the indictment for which the President and his Cabinet are responsible. An idle attempt has been made to exonerate the American Government by attributing the unprecedented rudeness and malignity of the attack to the counsel who have been employed. It may be true that the American agents have discredited themselves, but they have also compromised the character of their country. In private litigation a plaintiff or defendant is properly regarded as answerable for an unreasonable claim or resistance to a claim, and for any unfounded imputation on the character of an adversary. A defendant in an action for libel who repeats the obnoxious charge through his counsel is always understood to take the risk of increased damages in the event of an adverse verdict. It is absurd to suppose that the American Government would allow itself to be compromised by the violence or intemperance of its agents. It is clear that the signature of the Treaty has not been accepted at Washington in satisfaction for the cause of hostility which are supposed to have been furnished by England.

It is suggested with some plausibility that the American counsel are not in earnest, and that they wish only to make themselves popular at home, and perhaps slightly to increase the amount of damages which might otherwise have been awarded to their clients. It is not absolutely impossible that their object may be rather insult than injury, but there is no third alternative. Offensive language would be comparatively tolerable if it were used as an instrument for obtaining several hundred millions of money. Discourtesy offered without any practical object would in one sense be more inexcusable. If the perverted and spiteful narrative is not introduced in aggravation of damages, it is a purely impertinent affront. It is indeed hardly possible that even the pliancy of the English Government and Commission can have induced the President and his advisers to believe in the possibility of inflicting a fine of five hundred millions on England. The Treaty was drawn with culpable laxity; but it cannot be strained into an interpretation consistent with the American demands. The English agents would have no choice but to withdraw from the arbitration in the improbable event of a consideration by the tribunal of the claim on account of the imaginary prolongation of the war. It is incredible that impartial jurists, with their own characters and with the credit of their respective nations at stake, should even listen to pretences which would make neutrality more costly than participation in war; yet it must be assumed that the able counsel employed by the United States have not adopted a vindictive line and preferred extortionate demands without belief in the possibility of success. If the arbitrators should, contrary to expectation, abet the scandalous injustice of the claimants, retirement from further contention would be consistent with the terms of the Treaty, and it would at the same time be an instructive comment on the blessed innovation of substituting judicial decisions for appeals to force. The statement of reasons for a declaration of war has but seldom been as acrimonious as the first proceeding in the great international arbitration.

THE FRENCH DEBATE ON THE INCOME-TAX.

WHATEVER may be thought of the soundness or unsoundness of the economical views of M. THIERS, no one who has read his recent speech can fail to be impressed with the lucidity of its method, the finish of its style, and the skill with which it was adapted to his auditory. It is also full of instruction, for M. THIERS based his opposition to an Income-tax mainly on the ground that France had already all that was good in an Income-tax, and it was therefore necessary for him to explain the whole system of French taxation. He took the last Budget before the war with its total revenue of 72 millions, and he showed how the burden of providing this revenue was distributed. Adding to the 72 millions raised for general purposes 12 raised for departmental purposes, he stated that the sources of revenue might be divided into two equal halves. One half, or 42 millions sterling, was levied on property. About 13 millions were levied on real property, 2 millions on buildings in the shape of a tax on doors and windows, 4 millions on personal property by means of a tax on householders according to their fortunes as indicated by the houses they occupied, and upwards of 4 millions on professional and mercantile profits in the shape of licences. Upwards of 18 millions were levied on the transmissions of property by means of stamps, charges on registration, and so forth. The other half of the sources of revenue, also producing 42 millions sterling, consisted of taxes on articles of consumption to the extent of 30 millions and of miscellaneous sources of revenue, such as the produce of the forests belonging to the State, the revenue of Algeria, and the income derived from the Post Office. Of the 30 millions raised from taxes on consumable articles, the Customs, exclusive of sugar, yielded 3 millions, sugar nearly 5, liquors 10, tobacco 10, and salt upwards of 1. The taxes on property and the revenues from miscellaneous sources, yielding 54 millions together, do not, according to M. THIERS, fall on the poor at all. Of the 30 millions levied on consumable articles, he calculated that 16 millions at the outside were paid by the poor. Thus, out of the total of 84 millions, the poor only contribute 16 millions, or a little less than one-fifth. This M. THIERS declared to be the most equitable scheme of finance, and the most favourable to the poor, of any known to the civilized world. His principal objection to the Income-tax was, therefore, that since it would be a new burden on property, and would not touch the poor, it would introduce an element of unfairness into that which is a fair system. It would make French finance unduly hard upon property, and the poor ought not to expect or desire that this should be changed; they ought to be credited with, or be taught, enough of patriotism to wish to bear their fair share of the new load under which France is beginning to groan. These are very much the same arguments, it may be remembered, which Mr. Lowe used with so much force and success last spring against the plan of throwing all the increased burden of the taxation of the year on the payers of Income-tax, when he showed conclusively how very unfair it would be to take the course which a few days later he forced on a reluctant House of Commons. In France it is especially necessary that the poor should feel as much as they can be fairly made to feel of the inconveniences of having to pay the new taxes occasioned by the war. It was they who by their pliancy last year encouraged the Emperor to do whatever he pleased; and it is a salutary lesson for those who gave him this encouragement to find that when the man they allow to do as he pleases is pleased to go to war for nothing, they, in the long run, will have to pay for his fancy.

This was the main argument of M. THIERS, and it is one that carries much weight with it, if only some tax can be devised that will make the poor pay their fair share of the additional taxation made necessary by the war without crippling the resources and fatally fettering the commerce of the country. But he had other subsidiary arguments on which he relied to strengthen his case. He turned to the United States, and showed that the Income-tax was so unpopular there, and worked so badly, that the President had just recommended in his Message its total abolition. This argument was received with great favour by the Assembly, and was a very cogent one. The Income-tax was borne patiently enough in the momentous crisis that followed the close of the Civil War in America. But the frauds of which it has been the cause are so startling and notorious that prudent politicians in the States fear the national demoralization which must ensue. In France a merely temporary Income-tax would, as the best writers who wish for an Income-tax admit, be very unfair, as there are certain classes which already pay an Income-tax there, and to make it fair there must be a large readjustment of the whole system of taxation. M. THIERS had then to surmount the difficulty of the Income-tax existing, and being supported with tolerable patience, in England. He had, of course, the strong ground that the Income-tax was in the early years of its existence pronounced both by Sir ROBERT PEEL and Mr. GLADSTONE to be essentially a temporary resource to meet a deficit that would soon pass away. It was so unwelcome even in England that the pill had to be largely glided before it could be swallowed. But in England it was, M. THIERS admitted, very wise and fair to impose an Income-tax. The landed interest and the makers of yearly profits were far too lightly taxed in comparison with the poor. Free trade was most advantageous to England, but only, according to the peculiar views of M. THIERS, because England is an island. In order to attain this great national benefit, Sir ROBERT PEEL had a perfect right to ask the rich to pay that fair share of taxation which they had previously escaped. In France, landowners, professional men, and traders are exceedingly heavily taxed, and therefore what was right in England would not be right in France. It might seem at first sight as if M. THIERS much understated the burden of taxation which in England falls on the landowner, for the landed interest supports an enormous burden of local taxation. But in a subsequent stage of the debate M. FOURRER-QUARTIER completed the statement of his chief, and asserted that the landowners in France, besides contributing their share to the revenue comprised in the Budget, and applicable to general and departmental purposes, pay 20 millions sterling to local purposes; and if this is true, it is obvious that landowners are much more heavily taxed in France than in England, even though allowance be made for the very much larger area of land in the former as compared with that in the latter country. M. THIERS was also right in saying that the Income-tax, although tolerated in England, is only just barely tolerated, and causes a very large amount both of fraud and inconvenience. Lastly, M. THIERS insisted most urgently on the unsuitability of the tax to France in its present circumstances. He probably exaggerated the arbitrariness with which it would be levied, but he pointed out that it would make the Republic odious; and he at once amused and alarmed the majority of the Assembly by declaring that they were all determined to give the Republic a perfectly fair trial. But he also pointed out, and the Assembly seemed to be entirely of his opinion, that in France, where the Government was so constantly changing, it would be most perilous for a trader to have to let the Government of the day know exactly how rich he was, as succeeding Governments would be tempted to plunder him. The argument seems worthy of Mexico or Venezuela, but the French Assembly immediately recognized its validity, and foreigners must therefore suppose that it is applicable to France.

M. THIERS made out a strong case against the Income-tax, but the majority of the Assembly was so heartily with him that even feeble arguments and a less telling manner would have sufficed for the overwhelming vote by which the proposal for the Income-tax was rejected. He was very inefficiently opposed by M. WOLOWSKI, who is a dreary, faint, and almost inaudible speaker, and who tired out the patience of an adverse audience by references to the pages of an English blue-book. The only effective reply to M. THIERS, if it can be called a reply, was that of M. LARGUOL. He insisted, with a great amount of truth, that the financial difficulties of France had been much underrated, and that the only chance of the country attaining a position which would enable it to meet the emergency would be to enter on a period of new and great commercial activity. This was only to be accomplished, he urged, by totally repealing and avoiding all taxes which add to the cost of exportable articles. This was obviously, in the first place, to prejudge the question between the Assembly and the Government as to the protective duties, and in the next place to point out a principle without showing how it was to be applied. It is almost impossible for a private member who holds to one system of finance to attack one part of the scheme of a Ministry which holds to another system. For what he would gain by defeating the Ministry on the point under discussion would only lead to a fraction of his system being practically carried out. Nor does it at all follow that, even if duties enhancing the price of exportable articles were to be abolished, an Income-tax in the form in which it was proposed would be the best mode of making up the consequent deficiency of revenue. What is to be the mode in which the revenue which the proposed Income-tax would have yielded is to be raised was left for future discussion. The Assembly decided that it would not have an Income-tax, but it did not decide whether the Government proposal to raise 6 millions by the taxation of raw materials should or should not be adopted instead. But although the discussion, or at least the vote of the Assembly, terminated in favour of M. THIERS, enough was said both by himself and others to throw some doubts on the truth of his reiterated assertion that the French system of taxation is perfect. If it were so, the obvious mode of getting new taxes would be to make an equal increase of every existing tax. One member proposed that this should be done, but M. THIERS received the proposal with great coldness. The Government has indeed already shown its readiness to depart from this perfect system of taxation. During the course of the debate the Government intimated its willingness to assent to an increase in the sum derived from licences, or, in other words, to make an exceptional increase in the contribution of the trading and professional classes to the revenues of the State. This was in effect to allow that the classes who would most suffer from an Income-tax might properly and advantageously be made to pay more than they do in the form of Income-tax applied to them. If, however, the Assembly did not go further than to decide not to have a general Income-tax, it showed by incontestable signs that a very large majority of its members was strongly opposed to the taxes on raw materials. M. THIERS will have to cram these taxes down the throats of his hearers; but he is so skilful and so necessary, that there is no saying that he will not persuade an Assembly to vote for the taxation of raw materials, although it considers such a form of taxation pernicious in the highest degree.

POLITICAL PROSPECTS.

AS the Ministers will keep their own secrets till the meeting of Parliament, it is impossible to anticipate with confidence the nature of the political conflicts which may probably be impending. Mr. STANSFELD lately spoke with hesitation, or perhaps only with official diffidence, of the possibility of introducing the Sanitary Bill which he pledged himself to prepare; but there can be no doubt that the Government must find time for a measure which in its general principle will encounter no opposition. The Act of last Session constituted the central authority which is indispensable to the efficient working of local administrative bodies; and the distribution of powers will be simplified by the experience of many years in the similar relations between the Poor Law Board and the Boards of Guardians. Little instruction is to be derived from the practice of the Home Office since it superseded the Board of Health. Its authority was nominally too extensive, and practically it was insufficient, nor was any adequate staff provided for the discharge of the duties imposed on the Office by various Acts of Parliament. Even the Board of Trade, notwithstanding its chaotic organization, was preferred by those who had local business to transfer to the Sanitary Department of the Home Office. Under several recent Acts the Secretary of State had the power to insist on the removal of nuisances, and in case of refusal or neglect he was authorised to execute the necessary works at the expense of the delinquent community; but the Secretary of State had neither engineers to perform the work nor funds to pay for it in the first instance; and, by the fault of Parliament rather than of the Office, all enactments of the kind proved entirely inoperative. In future legislation stringent provisions for compelling local bodies to do their duty will be preferable to the alternative execution of works by a central authority; yet the difficulty of compelling those who for their own profit cause nuisances to abate them by their own action at their own expense will not be easily overcome. If the Bill is judiciously framed, Parliament will not refuse to confer all necessary powers on the Local Government Board, or rather on the President. The success of the measure will depend chiefly on the judicious selection of the mode of administration and of the best local authorities. On the whole, probably, Mr. STANSFELD will have recourse to the Boards of Guardians, both because they already exist, and because the area which they represent is intermediate between a parish and a county. Mr. GOSCHEN'S Bill of last year would have practically excluded the gentry from all share in local government, though it is fair to admit that such a result was not contemplated by the author of the scheme. It is not likely that either Mr. STANSFELD or the majority of the House will be disposed to increase the power of the Justices; and yet the upper classes in rural districts both appreciate most fully the importance of sanitary improvement, and possess greater independence than their poorer neighbours. The graduated parochial franchise is too little consistent with democratic principles to be favoured by modern legislation.

The Ballot Bill will, after the events of last Session, almost certainly take precedence of less purely political measures. It is probable that a majority of the House of Commons dislike and disapprove the innovation, but pledges must be redeemed, and, above all, the House of Commons must not give way to the House of Lords. There are politicians who attach to the machinery of Ballot Bills an importance which to others seems exaggerated. It is generally admitted that, if there are shades of merit in such contrivances, last year's Bill was not the best that could have been devised; but the additional strength which will be given by any possible Ballot Bill to the party of movement matters far more than the encouragement or abolition of certainties. The friends and the more candid enemies of the Ballot are entirely agreed on the main issue, which indeed is now practically decided. The extreme Liberals wish for the Ballot because it will increase the effect of popular excitement, and diminish the influence of position and of property. It is no longer worth while to inquire whether it is desirable that every man should give an unbiased vote without regard to the wishes or opinions of others. It is extremely unlikely that at a general election half-a-dozen seats should be obtained by the use of personation or any other flagrant kind of fraud. The kinds of corruption which will be promoted by the adoption of the Ballot are those which have hitherto been more familiar to Americans than to Englishmen. The House of Lords will show sound judgment by accepting an unpalatable measure which primarily concerns the House of Commons and the constituencies. It is not necessary on this occasion to determine the limits of legislative power which confine the action of a second and less powerful Chamber. It would be highly invidious for the House of Lords, after due delay and consideration, to prevent the House of Commons from determining the mode in which its members are to be elected; and if the deliberations of the Peers are guided by statesmen, they will at present be more than ordinarily unwilling to provoke a collision which would necessarily be followed by agitation. The premature anxiety of various demagogues to appropriate to themselves, after the fashion of SISSEY and his officers, fragments of the Constitution to be destroyed has for the time provoked a certain reaction. Mr. DIXON made little of his scheme for destroying the House of Lords, and the clamour for a Republic has died away without an echo. A popular pretext for fresh revolutionary proposals would be in the highest degree acceptable to the baffled enemies of the Constitution who have once missed their spring. It would indeed require more than ordinary audacity at the present moment to renew attacks on the Crown. The feeling which was exhibited during the illness of the Prince of Wales must have served as a warning to the most conceited of Republicans, and the touching and eloquent letter of the Queen to the people of England will be remembered when recent attempts to earn notoriety are forgotten; but the House of Lords has no similar security against attack, and if it furnishes an excuse for hostility it will concentrate on itself all the attacks which have hitherto been dissipated upon several different objects.

The serious inconvenience which the Ministerial party may incur through the growing disaffection of the Nonconformists will be reduced to the lowest point by firmness in maintaining the Education Bill. No compromise is possible which would not fundamentally disturb the settlement of 1869; and if Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues show any disposition to waver, they will only tempt the malcontents to increase their demands. At the same time they will revive all the differences which the Act was intended to settle; and it is not clear that the new opponents whom they would provoke would be less formidable than their present assailants. The extreme section of a party sometimes prefers the triumph of open antagonists to the interests of lukewarm and moderate allies; but in the great majority of instances a recession is threatened twenty times for one case in which it is actually undertaken. Although the confidence which is reposed by thoughtful and moderate politicians on the PRIME MINISTER may not be wholly unqualified, nothing would be more undesirable than the temporary accession of the Opposition to office. Their leaders are not known to have a policy, and those among them who are most indisputably sincere are with few exceptions deficient in statesmanlike ability. On the other hand, Mr. GLADSTONE would be relieved by expulsion from office of the restraints which still to a beneficial extent hamper his excessive activity. In Opposition he has always been restless and often intemperate, and it is not known that he has any remaining prejudice which might not be overcome. One unpleasant task which awaits him at the opening of the Session is fortunately not such as will necessarily endanger the existence of the Ministry. It is certain that the late appointment to the Privy Council will be censured by the opponents of the Government, and a friendly majority will have to pronounce its verdict without any undue regard to the merits of the case. There are many Parliamentary contrivances by which the necessity of passing a vote of censure may be evaded. A business-like Assembly is not called upon to vote directly on issues which may for any reason be thought unseasonable. It is indeed probable that Mr. GLADSTONE and Lord HAMPDEN will regard the support of a friendly majority as a full condonation of their questionable proceeding; but if they wish to ascertain the genuine opinion of Parliament, they will probably find the debate more instructive than the division. The enthusiasm of three years ago has not survived the experience and the disappointments of last Session; but it will be the fault of the Government if its position is endangered during the present year.

THE PARIS ELECTION.

THERE is every probability that the election of a deputy for Paris, which takes place to-morrow, will have the same result as that by which so many previous elections have been attended. The Radicals have found a candidate, and have agreed—though not, it seems, without many misgivings—to give him a united support. The party of order, which has everything to gain or lose by the choice of the electors, has allowed things to take their chance. It claims to be a majority in Paris; it is certainly associated with the majority in the Assembly and in the country; and yet, for any thing it makes of its strength, it might as well belong to a despised minority. When first the contest began, the friends of order made some little show of taking part in it. They allowed a Committee of newspaper editors to look out for a candidate on their behalf. When their choice was made public, it turned out to be the very worst they could have lighted on. There are good reasons why the Commander-in-Chief should not be a member of the Assembly, and there is one reason in particular why he should not be a member for Paris. If ever the Assembly is exposed to violence from without, it is to Marshal MACMAHON that it will have to look for deliverance; and nothing would be more likely to paralyse a soldier's hand than to have been a spectator of the irresolution and weakness of purpose which the Chamber would probably have shown before making up its mind to resistance. So long as the state of siege is maintained in Paris, it may at any time be the duty of her representative to appeal to the Government or the Assembly against some needless severity on the part of the troops. The Commander-in-Chief could hardly be expected to do this part of a deputy's work. From these possible complications France has been saved by Marshal MACMAHON's prudence. It may be doubted whether the Paris Conservatives were really sorry when they thought there would be no opportunity for them to vote, or whether, now that an opportunity has presented itself at the eleventh hour, they will not prefer to let it slip. M. VAUTRAIN's appearance has deprived them of the plea that they have failed in finding a candidate. If the election turned on the issue between Monarchy and a Republic, they might perhaps excuse their inaction on the score that, where both the candidates are Republicans, electors who desire a Restoration are not called upon to vote for either. But the contest between M. VAUTRAIN and M. HUGO is really a contest between order and anarchy, between the French nation and the Paris Commune, between reasonable liberty and democratic tyranny. Paris has now to determine which of these rival creeds shall be put forward as hers in the Assembly. If the party of order takes no side in the controversy, it is bound to find some other name for itself before the next election. Either because the bourgeoisie of Paris dislike M. THIERES and his Government more than they dislike the Commune, or because their expectation of seeing the Commune restored in spite of him makes them anxious not to commit themselves in the eyes of their future masters, or because the political instinct has died out from want of exercise, their passion for abstention seems to be the one element of consistency in their character. If Heaven only helps those that help themselves their chance of providential aid in their next trouble will be an exceedingly small one.

The interest of to-morrow's election, such as it is, turns less upon the result, which we fear may be taken as foreordained, than upon the indications which may be gathered from it as to the future policy of the extreme Republican party. If there were no party of order to claim a share in the honour, the Paris Radicals might write themselves down as the most contemptible of political organizations. The controversy about the mandat impératif could never have arisen in a party which had any belief in its leaders; and a party which neither trusts the men whom it chooses to represent it, nor has the energy to replace them by others in whom it has more confidence, is not likely to achieve any conspicuous success. In all former revolutionary periods—and it is by the standard of a revolutionary period that the Paris Radicals must be judged—the great object at every election has been to return men whom the voters thought to be better men than themselves. The contest has in truth been one of men rather than of measures. The populace have accepted as essential whatever doctrines their leaders have chosen to call by that name, but they have never questioned that the election of their leaders meant the triumph of the principles they professed to maintain. Now the one settled conviction of the Paris Radicals seems to be that their representative will betray them if he gets the chance. They have invented the mandat impératif, they have accepted the mandat contractuel, for no other end than to deprive him of this chance. They only half like M. VICTOR HUGO, because he has insisted on the mandat contractuel being substituted for the mandat impératif, and many of them suspect that he has changed the form in order to get rid of the substance. It is impossible that a deputy elected under these circumstances should long retain even the modified confidence which the electors must be supposed to have had in him before they accepted his signature to the electoral contract. It is a safe prediction that M. HUGO will not have given many votes in the Assembly before the "jury of honour" which is to decide whether a deputy has violated his pledge will be convoked to hear the complaints of his constituents, and be appealed to to demand his resignation. Another feature that distinguishes the Paris Radicals from their predecessors in the same line is the extraordinary pettiness of the objections alleged against the candidate ultimately chosen. Whatever other qualifications M. VICTOR HUGO may want, it might have been thought that he would have been accepted as a good Democrat. But it seems to have been urged as a serious flaw in his title to this distinction that he sold his books at a price which allowed none but the rich to buy them, and that his opinions twenty years ago were not in all respects what they are now. It is difficult to imagine a position of less dignity for a man of genius than that in which M. VICTOR HUGO has chosen to place himself; but the electors who will probably return him to-morrow have achieved what might have been thought impossible, and have made him almost respectable by contrast themselves.

If the programme embodied in the mandat contractuel had no unexpressed articles to be inserted between the lines, it would be by no means a very revolutionary document. Several of the demands embodied in it are such as a wise Government would long ago have conceded by anticipation. The return of the Assembly to Paris, the grant of an amnesty, the recognition of a dissolution as an indispensable preliminary to the exercise of constituent powers by the Assembly, the raising of the state of siege in the great cities, a larger measure of freedom in local administration, the removal of arbitrary restrictions on newspaper criticism on political events, the reform of the magistracy, the introduction of compulsory military service—are all matters upon which it is surprising that sensible Frenchmen can hold two opinions. Mixed up with these are some demands of very doubtful expediency, and others which are unmistakably mischievous. To the former class belong the immediate nomination of a Constituent Assembly, the abolition of capital punishment, the separation of Church and State, and the abolition of press prosecutions except in civil matters. To the latter class belong the abolition of the principle of irremovability among the judges, a proportionate tax upon incomes, the prohibition of religion in education—if at least this be what the Committee of the Rue Bréa understand by “gratuitous primary education, compulsory, and conducted by laymen,” and the gratuitous provision of secondary education by the State. Still even the most objectionable of these theories hardly comes up to the traditional notion of Red Republicanism. The omission of the doctrines generally attributed to the Socialist party is remarkable. With the solitary exception of the proportionate Income-tax, M. Hugo is pledged to nothing which a capitalist might not advocate with perfect safety to his pocket. Indeed it will be strange if the author of Les Misérables does not on this head go far ahead of his instructions. This absence of the Socialist element may help to explain the general mediocrity of the whole movement. The real strength of the extreme Republican party in Paris has not been put out. Probably it was not thought prudent for the Communists to come forward in their own character. Such a step might have been attended by inconvenient consequences, so long as Paris is in a state of siege; and the alarm which would have been given to the Assembly by an avowed Communist triumph might have led to a continuance and extension of repressive precautions. Nor would there have been any gain to set against these obvious risks. M. Victor Hugo will be as useful at Versailles as the most earnest of the Communist leaders. No men are better suited to play the cat to the Communist monkey than the men who, by contrast with the real wire-pullers, may be called the moderate Radicals of Paris.

THE MEMBERS FOR OXFORD.

THE annual speeches of Mr. CARDWELL and Mr. HARCOURT are always well received by their constituents; and on New Year's Day they left behind a not disagreeable impression that there is for the moment nothing particular to say. Mr. CARDWELL, as became a Cabinet Minister on a festive occasion, was cheerful, complimentary, and vague. He naturally shared the general satisfaction at the probable recovery of the Prince of WALES from an illness which had given occasion to a remarkable display of loyal feeling. With the past he was contented, and especially with the relief from the burden of purchase of an army which he justly described as devoted and heroic. Even the settlement with the United States has, in spite of the elaborate indictment prepared by the American counsel, not ceased to convince Mr. CARDWELL that the two nations are united by the bond of a common language, which one of them uses on all public occasions for the purpose of vituperating the other. As to the Ballot, Mr. CARDWELL said that he was in a peculiar position, inasmuch as he had never been an enthusiast for secret voting, having indeed consistently opposed it until it was adopted by the present Cabinet. On the licensing question, and on the general controversy about alcohol, Mr. CARDWELL wisely declined to enter, except that, as his audience happened to be sitting round a table covered with decanters, he expressed a laudable wish that everybody else might, like the present company, have reasonable facilities for enjoyment. Everybody in Mr. CARDWELL's opinion entertains the same desire, although the temperance agitators would put an end to any enjoyment which may be derived from any kind of fermented liquor. Some passages in Mr. CARDWELL's speech seemed to point to the substitution of administrative or social legislation for political conflicts; and he concluded with a hope that all parties would merge minor differences, for the purpose of obtaining great results and of increasing our reputation as an example to all the nations of the world. It is much to be wished that less cautious Ministers would profit by the example of Mr. CARDWELL; but perhaps it is not to be expected that they should all look at the prospects of the coming Session with equal complacency. Having carried his Army Bill, the SECRETARY OF WAR, like a player who has completed his innings, walks aside, while Mr. BRUCE and Mr. STANSFELD in their turn concentrate upon themselves the attention of the spectators and the efforts of the hostile party to dislodge them. Mr. CARDWELL has nothing to do with public-houses or with Local Boards, except to vote, or possibly now and then to speak, in favour of the Ministerial measure. The anxiety of general supervision and guidance falls almost entirely on Mr. GLADSTONE. Mr. CARDWELL was too prudent to betray in the smallest degree the confidence of the Government. It is probable that some resolution may have been taken with reference to the attacks of the Nonconformists and secularists on the Education Act; but Mr. CARDWELL confined himself to the harmless statement that twenty years ago only a small minority was in favour of State education.

Mr. HARCOURT, untrammelled by the restraints of office, is also on ordinary occasions more pugnacious and impatient than his experienced colleague, but the most exciting suggestion which he could devise was a general protest against repose. To Mr. CARDWELL's recommendation of harmonious co-operation in measures outside the range of politics Mr. HARCOURT replied, with some point, that “recourse to a non-political programme was the unfailing symptom of a used-up party and a played-out Administration.” In his opinion, it is the business of the Liberal party to attack abuses, and of the Conservative party to defend them; and from the conflict is evolved the kind of activity which is properly called political. It seems to follow that, if the Opposition should at any time neglect their proper function of supporting abuses, it would become indispensable that Mr. HARCOURT and his friends should assail the beneficent and valuable parts of the Constitution. Of all courses he most earnestly repudiates the system of leaving things as they are. Ideal perfection of government would be no excuse for the tranquillity or stagnation which must result from general unanimity. On one subject Mr. HARCOURT thinks that the Government has been too active, and that it might have more prudently let alone the whole question of licences. He doubts whether it is possible to reconcile “the views of those who wish nobody to drink anything with those of the persons who desire everybody to drink everything.” The issue which has been raised in the controversy could not be more tersely or accurately defined. The greater part of Mr. HARCOURT's speech was occupied with a general denunciation of the extravagance of successive Governments and of the House of Commons. He has discovered, as some other politicians have learned before him, that twenty years ago the national expenditure was only 55,000,000*l.*, whereas it is now above 72,000,000*l.*, and, without entering into the details of the public wants, he concludes at once that the whole or the greater part of the excess is to be regarded as superfluous and wasteful. One million, indeed, spent on primary education, he admits to be a legitimate addition; but 18,000,000*l.* might, in his opinion, be saved, and in the meantime the amount furnishes matter for political speeches. It is necessary, however, in making the comparison to allow for the increase of population and of revenue, and for the universal advance of prices. If the affairs of the United Kingdom were administered for the cost which was sufficient in 1851, it would follow that enormous proportional reductions of expenditure had been effected. Mr. HARCOURT cannot but be aware that his statements require to be modified, and apparently he thought that in an after-dinner speech it would be troublesome and tedious to enter into details; but round numbers have no meaning where the actuals are not more or less applicable to the actual state of facts.

It appears to have occurred to Mr. HARCOURT that his figures were inconveniently large, and that he was bound to furnish some explanation of the apparently wanton propensity of Parliament to squander the public money. He proceeded to ask whether the diplomatic service or the Colonial establishment had become in twenty years more costly, and he could not but answer his own questions in the negative. Was the army excessive? “Are you more competent to indulge in the

"favourite dream of some people, that of fighting Europe all round? Does your navy show less alacrity in sinking?" In other words, the army is not too large; the navy is not too large; and therefore the alleged extravagance of expenditure might be supposed to be imaginary. It would have been more to the purpose, though not more accurate, to assert that the army, the navy, and the other great branches of the public service were maintained on an unnecessary scale of magnitude. It was on this point that Mr. COBDEN and Mr. BRIGHT incessantly harped, instead of sneering at the supposed inefficiency of the army or the navy. But Mr. HARCOURT, having deprived himself of the most obvious ground for complaint, boldly proceeds to account for the 18,000,000*l.* which might, according to his theory, be saved. "I will venture to let you into the secret. It is muddled away. It is spent nobody knows how, and goes nobody knows where." And this is spoken in the presence of the SECRETARY for WAR by a supporter of the severest economists among Prime Ministers and Chancellors of the Exchequer. The public accounts are, it seems, so laxly kept, and the outlets of the Treasury are so carelessly guarded, that one-fourth of the whole expenditure of the country is muddled away in such a manner that it cannot even be traced. If Mr. HARCOURT is unable to trace any item of the total amount, his incapacity only proves that he has not studied the Estimates, or checked the Votes of Supply; or rather that he has not yet devoted to finance the great abilities which have enabled him to master more attractive branches of knowledge. Nothing is commoner than for patriotic members to complain of extravagance to which they are themselves parties; but few Liberal orators have rivalled Mr. HARCOURT in the boldness of paradoxical self-accusation. Ships cost more and guns cost more than in 1851, and the pay of the army and the allowances of the navy have since been increased. The Civil Service Estimates, which are annually canvassed by members less impatient of detail than Mr. HARCOURT, have been necessarily enlarged in consequence of the various extensions of the functions of Government. It is the interest, as it is probably the conscientious desire, of the Ministers to curtail as far as possible the public expenditure; and the result of their efforts, and the expression of their judgment, is the Budget from which Mr. HARCOURT proposes to make his startling reduction. It is impossible to believe that, if he had seriously considered the effect of his statements, he could have thought that if he were himself in power he could strike off from the annual charge on the country eighteen millions, or twelve millions, or six millions. It would be a valuable service to the country to reduce the outlay by a single million without diminution of efficiency; but vague declamation against the whole system of financial administration can only promote either useless discontent or unflattering incredulity. An able and astute member of Parliament who avers that 18,000,000*l.* are annually muddled away virtually avows that he has not taken the trouble to become acquainted with the subject which he discusses. The proposal, borrowed from Mr. BRIGHT, of a "free breakfast-table," and the more original demand for the abolition of the Income-tax, would only deserve to be discussed when the possible contingency of a surplus was first established. Mr. HARCOURT longs for a Government which would do equal justice to all classes of the community, and at the same time, by allotting to the payers of Income tax the benefit of half of the whole reduction to be effected, he unconsciously admits that taxation is at present not inequitably distributed. It was not in this manner that Mr. HARCOURT proceeded when he was at home in his subject, and earnest in his desire to effect the change which he recommended. His scheme of legal and judicial reform, though both its principles and details may be open to criticism, was in one important respect a model project of reform. Knowing that legislation principally consists of details, Mr. HARCOURT took care to substitute a positive and complete system for the existing fabric. The titles, the salaries, the functions of the Judges; and the machinery of jurisdiction were all distinctly explained; and it was evident that the author of the plan was familiar at the same time with the institutions which he regarded as defective, and with the remedies which he undertook to provide. When he devotes equal attention to national finance, he will not content himself with the indolent and unmeaning proposition that eighteen millions are annually muddled away.

THE LANGUAGE OF DIPLOMACY.

PRINCE BISMARCK has notified that henceforth he will use the German language instead of the French in his communications with Foreign Powers. As he has made this announcement in a communication to Count ARNIM, it might at first seem as if he were using a rather petty means of humiliating France in its hour of weakness. But Count ARNIM is only just entering on his duties as German Ambassador in France, and as this is a new beginning of diplomatic intercourse which was necessarily interrupted by the war, it seems a fair occasion for instituting a new system. To Englishmen the change seems a very natural one, for during the present century it has become the habitual practice of the English Foreign Office to use English only in its despatches, and the example of England has been followed by other States. But for about a century and a half previously French had been almost the exclusive language of diplomacy, partly on account of the intrinsic merits of the language, and partly on account of the preponderating influence of France. Yet this was an artificial practice in harmony with what, according to the standard of the present day, may be called an artificial system. While nations were subjected to the personal influences and caprices of great people—of princes, Ministers, courtiers, and able adventurers—it was natural and advantageous that there should be some common mode of exercising personal influence in diplomacy. Diplomacy was then very often an affair of rapid and daring stratagems. The first Lord MALMESBURY once got a treaty of offensive and defensive alliance signed by a Sovereign in opposition to the known wishes of the Royal advisers, and the simple mode he adopted was to bribe a valet to keep the King's chief adviser out of the closet. This is a curious instance of what a century or so ago was possible in diplomacy; but it is by no means a solitary or a very exceptional instance. One or two influential personages acted for a nation, and a diplomatist was an adroit influential personage sent to lead or mislead the local influential personages of a foreign State. For such purposes it was exceedingly convenient that all European people of importance should know at least that sort of French which was familiar to GEORGE II. and the Empress CATHERINE, and which sounded enough like French to make rapid communication possible between those who spoke it and any one who knew French. But now diplomacy is a very different matter. It consists partly in the communication of the official views and intentions of the Government which the diplomatist represents, and partly in the collection of all kinds of information as to the country in which the diplomatist resides. If a Government wishes to make a communication, it naturally wishes to do so in its own language; and if it is to receive information, it desires that this information should be procured by a man who speaks, not French, but the language of the country to which he is sent.

The announcement of Prince BISMARCK may therefore be said to point to the two new uses and purposes of diplomacy. The Government of a State desires that a foreign Government should precisely understand what are its opinions, what it complains, what it fears, what precautions it thinks ought to be taken, what line it may itself be preparing to take. Those who write such despatches can never write them properly in any language but their own. They know, or at least ought to know, what words and phrases mean in their native tongue, but they can never be sure that they are fully embodying in language what they wish to embody when they speak a foreign language. Sir HAMILTON SEYMOUR is quoted by Professor BURNARD, in his very instructive lecture on Diplomacy, as having said that, as he should always prefer using his own word, so he should always prefer speaking his own language on important diplomatic occasions. If Sir HAMILTON SEYMOUR felt this, all diplomatists must feel it; for it was certainly through no want of ability or knowledge that he was sensible of the need of using the one instrument of the expression of thought with the use of which he was perfectly familiar. A foreign language cannot always be made to express exactly what is wanted; and it may be observed that French, although excellently fitted in some respects as a common vehicle of expression, is in other respects badly fitted. It has, especially under the influence of the vague and grandiloquent writers of the last half-century, a fatal tendency to run into words and phrases which may mean almost anything. French looks clear because the language lends itself easily to very clear arrangement; but it looks very often clearer than it is, for it is full of expressions which seem to mean much and may mean very little, or which may seem to mean little but may be easily shown by those who use them to have meant a great deal. The language of modern French diplomacy teems with such words as "solidarity," "unification," "eventualities," and so forth, which always make a reader feel as if he were a provincial maire and LOUIS NAPOLEON was addressing him under a triumphal arch. Nor is this all. Diplomatic documents are now to a very large extent the property not of diplomatists but of the public. A despatch from Prince Bismarck to Count ARNIM is very possibly meant as a manifesto to Germany. The celebrated despatch to Washington in relation to the Trent affair, which is said to have been very largely the work of the late PRINCE CONSORT, was meant to be, and was immediately accepted as, a solemn calm justification of the course taken by the Government before the tribunal of England and the world. Such despatches ought never to be written in any language but that of the country which has to make the words of the writers good. And the same may be said, although of course in a less degree, as to diplomatic documents of minor importance. The Duke of GRAMONT has within the last few days been called before a Commission of Inquiry, and to justify the course he took in the summer of 1870 he has placed in evidence two documents, one from the English Ambassador at Berlin, in which, as he states, the Ambassador announced that Prussia was bent on war; and the other from the English Ambassador at Paris, which, according to the Duke, stated that the intentions and tone of the French Government were very conciliatory. The English diplomatists thus appealed to will of course be desirous that their words should be fairly and carefully judged and appreciated by every one, but more especially they will be desirous that this should be done by Englishmen. A correct and critical judgment cannot possibly be formed in England unless the documents have been originally written in English. In short, in whatever way the point is regarded, it becomes evident that when diplomatic documents are presented in the name of, and are to be judged by, a nation, they must be written in the language of that nation, and not in any foreign tongue.

The change from French to German in the diplomatic documents addressed by Germany to France also falls in with the other great change in the character of diplomacy. The modern diplomatist ought to be expected and forced to make himself as much as possible acquainted with the language of the country to which he is sent. While French was the common language of diplomacy, an idle young man who knew French thought he had nothing more to learn. He could always do a little trifling business, or have a little gossip with persons inhabiting the country to which he was sent, if they belonged to the same circles as he did, and could speak French equally well. If all that the Foreign Office required was a guess at the possible caprices of a Sovereign, his mistress, or his Prime Minister, the young diplomatist could collect in the French tongue as much material for worthless guessing as he conceived himself to require. But if a diplomatist is to be regarded, as every year he is being more regarded, as a person one of whose main duties lies in making himself master of all the information he can get hold of as to the country to which he is sent, in order not only that correct political judgments may be formed by his chiefs, but that the nation to which he belongs may be guided in its own legislation, aided in its commerce, and enabled in every respect to deal with more intelligence and honesty in all its intercourse with the natives of the country where the diplomatist resides, he must learn to talk the language of that country. Nor will any nation gain so much as France itself by such a change in the habits of diplomatists. Frenchmen have suffered above all other men by French being so extensively used in diplomacy. French diplomatists started knowing so much that they would learn nothing more. It is said that many members of the body of French diplomatists residing two years ago in different parts of Germany were totally unacquainted with the German language, and yet they were expected to send home accurate and trustworthy reports as to the state of German feeling and opinion with regard to a war with France. A very large portion of the disgraceful ignorance among Frenchmen of almost every class which showed itself in the late war, and which was so large a cause of the disasters of the country, may be traced to the fact that Frenchmen considered it the business of foreigners to learn French, and not that of Frenchmen to learn foreign languages. If every nation writes its diplomatic documents in its own language, this peculiarity of the French mind will necessarily act with feebler force. Not that French as a medium of international communication will soon, or perhaps for a very long time, lose its hold on Europe. There are occasions when the use of French as such a medium will prove to be very useful in diplomacy. At a Congress or Conference, for example, it would be distracting if every diplomatist sitting round the table used a different language, and the readiest means of arriving at being intelligible would be for all to talk French. There are some countries, too, which, if they want to be listened to at all, must use a language that Europe generally can understand. If the Government of the Danubian Principalities had anything to say to Europe, it would be absurd for it to write in Roumanian. Probably for some time to come even Russia must use either German or French in diplomacy. Changes like these, to which Prince Bismarck's announcement points, are not made suddenly or as a whole. They steal on gradually, and only make themselves felt and seen in proportion as an altered state of society permits them to gain strength.

LORD RUSSELL ON RELIGION AND LIBERTY.

A STATESMAN of Lord Russell's eminence must be supposed to have a meaning in all that he writes, but this assumption is subjected to a strain of extraordinary severity by his letters to Mr. ALFRED BOURNE. It is clear indeed that Lord Russell is dissatisfied with certain "onions" of religious liberty; but as his ordinary condition is to be dissatisfied with some one, and as, in his own estimation, Lord Russell's enemies for the time being are always the enemies either of religious liberty or of the settlement of 1688, this discovery affords no clue. Perhaps if Mr. BOURNE's letters had been printed along with Lord Russell's the obscurity might have been in some degree removed. But nothing is known of this gentleman's share in the correspondence beyond the fact that he seems to have asked Lord Russell to attend a meeting of the British and Foreign School Society, either at Stockwell in December, or in the Borough Road in January. If Lord Russell's letters are any sample of what he would have said on these occasions, had he been able to attend, the Society may be congratulated on his determination to pass the winter at Cannes. At meetings of this kind it is usually thought well to avoid any subjects which might provoke differences of opinion among the members, and as, according to one interpretation of Lord Russell's words, he would have appeared as the advocate of a new variety of concurrent endowment, this reasonable understanding might have been violated.

The historical survey which usually forms part of Lord Russell's conception of a letter goes back in this instance no further than 1839. That was a remarkable year in the educational history of the country. Lord Russell "obtained the sanction of the QUEEN to a declaration that she wished the youth of this kingdom to be "religiously brought up, and the rights of conscience to be "respected." The form of the sentence might be taken to imply that the QUEEN did not in the first instance wish anything of the kind, and that it was only under judicious pressure from Lord Russell that she consented to forego her prepossession in favour of irreligious education and a disregard of the rights of conscience. Fortunately, however, HER MAJESTY's known character is enough to show that Lord Russell could not have meant this inference to be drawn. Due attention has been paid to this expression of the QUEEN's wish "in England, in Scotland, and in Ireland," the last named country having been especially favoured by the planting "of a "sapling, not of the upas-tree, but coming from an "acorn of the British oak." It is rather puzzling to find the system of National Education established in Ireland in 1834 described as a sapling "coming from an acorn of the British oak" which was planted in 1839. This, however, might be only a bold figure of speech; what is harder to explain is how an educational system which neither in theory nor in practice has anything in common with the English system can be called a sapling from it. The characteristic feature of the Irish national system has always been the combination of united secular and separate religious instruction. The characteristic feature of the English system, down to the passing of the Education Act, was the employment of the same persons to give religious instruction and secular instruction. It is quite possible to hold that each of these systems was well adapted to the country and circumstances to which it was intended; but Lord Russell has been the first to discover that the two are identical.

A further difficulty is presented by his remarks upon the Conscience Clause. Hitherto, it seems, all the world has been in ignorance as to the true nature of this expedient. It has been always supposed to be a device for the protection of religious liberty. Instead of this it was the invention of "the enemies of religious liberty." Now the Conscience Clause was not applied to English schools until long after 1839, and so far Lord Russell's dislike to it is chronologically consistent.

But it was applied to Irish schools from the very first; so that Lord RUSSELL presents us with the distracting spectacle of the same critic regarding a Conscience Clause as incompatible with religious liberty in a system into which it was introduced after a long interval, and compatible with religious liberty in a system into which it was introduced at starting. The history of the Conscience Clause in England as given in these letters is this:—Lord RUSSELL and the QUEEN wished a religious education and freedom of conscience to be secured to every Englishman. It "occurred, however, "to some enemies of religious liberty that to give Dissenters a religious education and respect their rights of conscience was too much, that to have one of the two was quite "enough for Dissenters. They . . . therefore invented "the Conscience Clause." The natural conclusion from this narrative would be that Lord RUSSELL has suddenly become an extreme Denominationalist. He wishes every child in England to receive religious as well as secular instruction at the expense of the community, and the only obvious means of securing this object is to send the children of each denomination to schools in which they will be brought up by teachers of their own creed. The objection to this plan, founded on its enormous cost, would in Lord RUSSELL's eyes be of no moment. He has been told that if the "gracious intentions of the QUEEN of 1839"—this looks as though Lord RUSSELL thought the QUEEN of 1839 and the QUEEN of 1872 were different Sovereigns—are to be "fully carried "into effect," more room than is sufficient will be provided. "More," he answers with heroic indignation, "than is "sufficient for packing closely the boys and girls to be "taught, but not more than sufficient for faith and conscience." This notion of a certain minimum of cubic space being required for "faith and conscience" makes it evident that Lord RUSSELL is not the ardent Denominationalist which his desire that the State should give religious as well as secular instruction to "the youth of this kingdom" seemed to prove him, since, if separate schools were provided for the children of each denomination, there would be no necessary waste of room. The only alternative interpretation of his meaning is, that he wishes schools to be provided in which every English child may have an opportunity, if his parents choose, of being taught a sort of composite religion of which Lord RUSSELL appears to be the prophet. In this way, no doubt, very much more room would be provided than is "sufficient for packing closely the boys and "girls to be taught," since for every boy or girl so packed in a Church school, or in a Dissenting school, a similar amount of room would have to be kept in the Established RUSSELL school. Upon the doctrines of the religion for which he claims this magnificent endowment of empty benches Lord RUSSELL is silent. Its relations to Christianity seem to be friendly, for Lord RUSSELL intends that his converts shall be brought into the way of truth "without leaving their present church or "chapel." Its attitude towards the Founder of Christianity is one of positive patronage, for Lord RUSSELL, on the 20th of December, pronounces the comment on the Lord's Prayer recorded in the Gospel to be "excellent"; and on the 25th of December—having, we may suppose, read the passage again to make sure that he had not bestowed his commendation on an undeserving object—he declared it to be "admirable."

It is one disadvantage of a winter at Cannes that it interferes with the regular reading of English newspapers. At least this is the conclusion which necessarily follows from Lord RUSSELL's description of the present position of the Education controversy. He denounces the driving all the children of Dissenters into the national schoolrooms as a hardship which even "the Tory Lord NOTTINGHAM" would not have inflicted, and then he adds:—"But the Tories of "1690 were more Liberal than the present Liberal House of "Commons." Lord RUSSELL apparently supposes that the present House of Commons has passed a law—in a winter Session, we presume, and without asking the concurrence of the House of Lords—for compelling all the children of Dissenters to attend Church schools. Here in England the course of events wears a slightly different aspect. The "just "and deep offence" which, according to Lord RUSSELL, has been given to the Protestant Dissenters of England and Wales, consists, not in any attempt to drive their children into Church schools, but in the refusal of the House of Commons to sanction their attempt to drive the children of indigent parents belonging to the Church of England into schools to which they have a conscientious objection. If the grievance imagined by Lord RUSSELL had any existence in fact, it would be the exact counterpart of the grievance which a section of the Dissenters are moving heaven and earth to inflict upon Churchmen and Roman Catholics. Perhaps when Lord RUSSELL returns to England he may see that it is not the less a hardship to drive a man's child into a school which he dislikes because Lord RUSSELL happens to like it.

THE IDEAL WORKING-MAN.

THE Times happened to remark, in a recent article on the licensing system, that what was wanted was not the suppression of public-houses, but the establishment of "public-houses without drunkenness"; and this useful, though not particularly novel or profound, observation has been followed by an amusing correspondence about working-men's clubs. Of course we do not mean that the correspondence is amusing in itself, for it is as dull and prosy as letters on such a subject might be expected to be; but only that it is amusing as an illustration of the extraordinary and complacent ignorance of working-men which is displayed by those who profess so much solicitude on their behalf. It is quite true that working-men in France or Germany do not, as a rule, give way to habits of intemperance to the same extent as working-men in this country, and one reason of this is that drinking is almost the sole recreation of the latter, while foreign artisans and labourers, even of the lowest class, have usually other sources of amusement at command. And it is very important that this should be remembered. Our countrymen are undoubtedly at a disadvantage as compared with their Continental brethren in this respect, and if anything can be done to place them on an equality, it will be a clear gain to the cause of temperance. It has been said that life is not all beer and skittles; but the association of ideas is not quite fair, and it is probable that, if there were more skittles, we should find a less exclusive devotion to beer on the part of our labouring population. Even if there were no diminution in the amount of liquor consumed, it would doubtless be better that men should, while drinking, play at some game which exercises their muscles, or, in however small a degree, their minds, than that they should be content to sit simply soaking and smoking in a dirty, ill-smelling, unventilated room. In France there is less difference between the personal habits of working-men and of middle-class citizens than might be supposed from the extreme divergence of their political sentiments. Each has a café which he frequents, and where he plays at cards, dominoes, or perhaps billiards, with his companions, when he has had enough of talking. The café of the bourgeois is rather cleaner and more brilliant in its decorations, perhaps his coffee is rather better or his sugared water of purer quality, than that of the mechanic, and occasionally he may indulge in some little luxuries which are denied to the latter; but substantially their recreations are much the same. The consequence is that, if a working-man rises in the world, he finds nothing particularly novel or irksome in the change of life; the difference is only one of quality, not of kind; and when he exchanges the blouse for broadcloth, he has no difficulty in accommodating himself to his new condition. On the other hand, an English workman who comes into a little money is apt to be a truly miserable object, for he can do little else than drink it, and is quite unused to any of the amusements or refinements of a higher social grade. The Australian gold-digger who, after trying a round of liquors, ordered the waiter to bring him a bottle of rum and charge it as champagne, was a type of his class. Probably the utmost that can be expected from legislation is that good order and decency should be maintained in the public-houses, and that the adulteration of liquors should be checked; but a great deal might undoubtedly be done to diminish intemperance by establishing public-houses in which the sale and consumption of drink should be only an incident of the business, and should be associated with amusements of various kinds.

The motives which have led philanthropic persons in various parts of the country to establish working-men's clubs are of the most respectable kind, but it is unfortunate that before embarking in the enterprise they did not take the trouble to ascertain the peculiarities of the class for whom they had so kindly undertaken to procure a pleasant and wholesome lounge. It is obvious that working-men's clubs are of no use unless working-men can be persuaded to frequent them, and it is in this rather essential particular that they appear to have generally broken down. Nice clean rooms, well lighted, well ventilated, with draughts and chess, a supply of religious periodicals, and a choice selection of works of an improving character, and perhaps a set of instructive maps, or a few edifying pictures, have been provided; but, singular to say, the working-men will not enter the doors, or, if they come once, fidget about uncomfortably, and never return; the result being perhaps a two days' debauch at the "Blue Pig," as compensation for the shock to the nervous system which they experienced from the frigid and uncompromising proprieties of the model club-room. The good folk who have got up these prim little clubs seem to have forgotten, or never to have known, the human weaknesses of their kind. Of course, if working-men happened to be in want of moral improvement, and appreciated the proprieties, this would be just the place for them; but then that is precisely what they do not want. They are tired and thirsty, and perhaps rather sulky, after the day's work; they want to enjoy themselves in their own fashion, with a pipe and a mug of beer, in some place where they can stretch their legs and feel at home, and which shall not be so clean as to shame their own dingy clothes and faces. At the model club there is a solemn set of rules placarded over the mantelpiece, and smoking is forbidden. A visitor can indulge in the mild excitement of a cheap cup of tea or a bottle of lemonade, and in some cases the extreme concession has even been made of a glass of beer; that is to say, it is intimated that if anybody is hardened enough to ask for beer it will be produced; but it is not surprising that our friend in fustian should prefer the frank hospitality of the "Blue Pig," where the pot appears at his elbow as a matter of course, and the pipes lie in a heap on the dirty old table ready for use. One of the correspondents of the Times, who recognizes the importance of allowing working-men to amuse themselves in their own way, states that the committee of his club are so scrupulous on this point that they never go near the house, and that the rules are as few and as simple as possible; but it would appear that their simplicity is quite compatible with such a serious infringement of the liberty of the subject as an interdict on smoking. A similar mistake is usually committed by the benevolent people who build model lodging-houses. Here again we have an appalling code of rules and by-laws; everything must be kept so spotlessly clean and tidy that the class for whose especial benefit the buildings have been erected are scared away from them. Cleanliness and tidiness, instead of being attractive to them, are their peculiar abhorrence; and they would rather live in the freedom of a filthy court than in the decorous propriety of the model lodging-house, even if they had to pay double rent for the privilege of doing as they liked. Something might no doubt be done to wean the lower classes from their love of dirt and muddle, but it is quite certain that it can only be accomplished gradually and persuasively, and not by puritanical strictness or peremptory rules. And no good can come of providing for an ideal class of people, instead of taking working-men as they are, and making the best of them.

One of the most remarkable developments of modern mythology is the worship of the working-man as an impersonation of virtue and wisdom. It may be admitted that he has his good points, and is at the bottom by no means a bad sort of fellow, that his lot is in many respects a hard one, and that there is much which might and ought to be done to improve it. But this is not enough for the idolaters of labour. We are asked to admire the nobility of his life, and to accept his utterances on any subject as the perfection of human sagacity. He and his fellows are alone worthy of the attention of statesmen and legislators, and it is at once the duty and the privilege of the other classes of the community to pay his share of taxation for him, to educate him and his children free of expense, and to teach them a trade, if they do not think it beneath them to learn it; to provide him with a nice house and sunny garden in the pleasant outskirts of the town, with railways and tramways at nominal fares; and to compel shopkeepers to supply him with unadulterated provisions at cost price. It is true that the bargain is not to be altogether one-sided. In return for this liberal treatment on the part of his fellow-subjects, the working-man, we are assured, will in future be good enough to take all the responsibility of government and legislation off their hands. His simple instincts will make short work with the doubts and difficulties of statesmen and philosophers, and it will be unnecessary for the country at large to go through the costly and troublesome form of electing members of Parliament. It will be enough for the working-man to appoint delegates under a mandat impératif, although for the present this is a word which there may perhaps be some little difficulty in rendering into English. This is the ideal working-man of a certain school of politicians and philanthropists. If you labour with your hands, and are in receipt of weekly wages, you have a right to consider yourself one of a superior order of mortals, and an admiring country will bow down before your august decrees, and make you comfortable out of the taxes. But if you happen to belong to any other class, if you work even so little with your head as well as with your hands, if you are a clerk or a shopkeeper, you are outside of the charmed circle; and no matter how ignorant or incapable of reasoning you may be, your instincts are of no more value than if they were the matured opinions of educated and thoughtful men. It is of course inevitable under a system of Parliamentary government that the votes of the majority should determine what should be done on any question, but a very good reason can be given for this without insisting upon the inherent wisdom and justice of the class which has a numerical preponderance. The most amazing circumstance connected with this fantastic cult is that the object of it should be a personage who might be assumed to be so well known and familiar as the working-man. Judging from the extraordinary notions which appear to be entertained in regard to his character and habits, it might almost be imagined that he appeared on earth only at rare intervals, or that he lived somehow or other beyond the reach of observation. It is not easy to say why there should be any insuperable difficulty in getting at the natural history of the working-man. Most people, we fancy, have at some period of their lives met with a specimen of the class, and with a little research it might be possible to test the beautiful theories which are current in some quarters by a reference to realities. The moral superiority of the working-man is not, we fear, distinctly attested by the hard facts of life. There is reason to suppose that at home he is apt to be rather brutal and selfish; that he has a somewhat loose conception of paternal obligations; that he is not over-scrupulous either as to his work or his word; and that, as a rule, he drinks a great deal more than is good for himself or anybody who has to do with him. His wisdom is represented by the rules of the Trade Unions, and by the political declarations of those whom he allows to speak on his behalf. The politicians who profess to have such faith in the unerring instincts of the working-man, and the good people who imagine that he is the sort of person who is likely to find himself at home amid the decorous proprieties of a model club or model lodging-house would do well to look at him a little nearer at hand. They will find that he does not quite match their ideal; and, considering the circumstances of his life, it would perhaps be strange if he did. No class has a monopoly of virtue, and wisdom is not altogether a natural faculty. The working-man has his good qualities and his bad qualities, and the extravagant adulation with which he is too often treated is at once foolish and demoralizing. If he were less flattered he would perhaps be more respected.

A NEW LEAF.

IT gives us pleasure to think how many people have been resolving within the last few days to turn over a new leaf. It is not that we suppose that any large number of such resolutions will be kept, for that would be a very equivocal advantage. If virtue should be increased, the number of prisons and bores would also be multiplied incalculably; for it may be assumed that at least nine-tenths of the good resolutions in question are due to the desire of leading a perfectly methodical existence. The pleasure of which we speak is the pleasure of thinking how many innocent enthusiasts there are in the world who retain some faith in the virtue of a resolution. Though we condemn presumption and self-conceit, there is no doubt that they are the cause of an immense deal of happiness to their fortunate possessors; and surely the most satisfactory of all feelings must be the conviction that you are able to fix your future character for yourself. Who would not envy a young gentleman who really believes that he has only, as it were, to pass a kind of private Act of Parliament in order to lay down the outlines of his future conduct? We have no doubt that many thousands of young ladies and gentlemen have been giving this proof of a touching freshness of mind on the opening of a new year. It is true indeed that they will very soon lose this energetic faith in their own autocratic power. A very few years of experience will teach them to be less sanguine, and therefore less happy, in their resolves. As the character stiffens we become conservatives; that there are certain changes which are apt to be had by wishing for them, however strenuously. Some people flatter out by five-and-twenty that early rising is beyond their power, and others that nothing will make them love their neighbours. They may endeavour to make the best of their qualities, such as they are, and to find one of those positions in life in which punctuality is no object, or a power of inflicting pain without flinching more desirable than a disposition to make things pleasant. Fortunately, there is room in the world for most qualities; but long before we are middle-aged we learn that our main hope must lie in changing our circumstances and not our qualities. If internal experience does not enforce this lesson upon us, a man must be lucky indeed upon whom it has not been impressed from without. Such of our readers as have the good or ill fortune to be rich and benevolent have probably had many reminders of this kind lately. They have had one more appeal from the impecunious friend who declares, with his usual solemnity, that he is about to turn over a new leaf and never again get into debt. They have been requested to give another chance to the drunkard who is this time really going to take the pledge and keep it. They have been invited to be reconciled to the relation who has definitely sown his crop of wild oats, and is never to make a bet or attend a horse race again. They know well enough what would be the simplest, and perhaps in the end the kindest, course; that they had better, so far as their own interests are concerned, recommend the fast young gentleman to go to the diggings or any other place where revolvers are used as recklessly as possible, that the dipsomaniac should be enabled to drink himself to death, and the gentleman in difficulties take the shortest possible road to the workhouse. Why struggle to keep a man's head just above the waters into which you know him to be irremediably sinking? The process is a laborious one for us, and we should be inclined to fancy that it could not be an agreeable one for him. As for the vain hope that a good resolution will change the course of the unfortunate victim's life, that is altogether too shadowy a prospect to be taken into account by reasonable men. As Christians we are forbidden to despair of our neighbour, or at least to refuse to offer him a helping hand; but as men of business we feel that our hope is of the smallest, and only trust that our merit in giving help may be proportioned to the depth of our conviction of its uselessness.

There are few people who have not had enough of such experiences to regard the boyish trust in good resolutions as one of the most groundless illusions of childhood. We have ourselves made so many good resolutions, and we have watched the results of so many good resolutions of other people, that it is impossible for us any longer to be sanguine. We can probably remember the time when we resolved to keep a regular diary, to make careful abstracts of all the standard authors in the language, to work out a grand philosophical system which should reconcile all the conflicting views of different schools, to reform the world, and to keep our accounts accurately, and we know how small a part of these admirable schemes has ever borne fruit in practice. We have probably been less disappointed by the shortcomings of our neighbours; but in one way or other we have ceased to regard the resolution to turn over a new leaf as being identical with, or even as being a probable preliminary to, turning it over in practice. We feel a keen sympathy with poor Dr. Johnson, who continued for seventy years to resolve that he would be an early riser, with no nearer success at the end of that period than at the beginning. And yet, after all, we must admit that, under some circumstances, a good resolution may be rather useful than otherwise. A habit of making good resolutions is indeed a very dangerous thing. It has sometimes been argued that reading novels and poetry is on the whole prejudicial to the moral nature, because it leads us to be satisfied with the cultivation of our benevolent emotions without applying them to any practical purpose. On the same principle, it should be dangerous to be always picturing ourselves as the possessors of every virtue under heaven without making any distinguishable progress towards the accomplishment of our wishes. Our will, it is said, becomes enervated when we acquire a habit of aspiring without carrying our aspirations to their legitimate fulfilment. And of course it is true that good resolutions are objectionable if they produce no dividend whatever. Yet it is possible for a man to improve, however rare the phenomenon may be; and if, by resolving to get up an hour earlier—early rising is so frequent a subject of good resolutions that we cannot avoid drawing our illustrations from that source—we succeed in actually rising five minutes earlier, or even in stopping our natural downhill course towards rising later, we have done something. Indeed it must be admitted that there is frequently something to be gained by forming good resolutions at such stated periods as the beginning of a new year; our lives run so much in grooves, that it is useful occasionally to change our point of view, and endeavour for a few moments to see ourselves from the outside. It is not unfrequent for a man on such an occasion to gain sudden glimpses which reveal to him his whole life in a different aspect from that to which he is accustomed. He may find out for a moment that he has been frittering away his time and talents on totally unworthy objects, and may resolve to take some plunge—into matrimony, for example, or into a different profession—which will entirely alter his whole scheme of existence. Cases probably occur when a man discovers that he is and has been for many years a fool; and though that useful piece of knowledge is likely enough to be forgotten when he has returned to his usual routine, it is nevertheless a discovery which may leave some traces upon his career. No man is quite the same after he has once distinctly said to himself, I have made an unequivocal blunder in the whole theory of my life.

This, however, refers to the conjuncture of circumstances which is not likely to occur more than once or twice to any man. The more normal case of good resolutions, the determination to break off some bad habit or to raise the general tone of character, is less likely to lead to tangible results. Yet even here something may occasionally be done. We need only refer to the change known amongst certain classes of religious functionaries as conversion. Very often that phrase means nothing more than a fit of temporary excitement; sometimes it implies a simple change of dialect, whilst the character remains essentially the same; but it would be absurd to deny that, whatever may be the philosophy of the case, the term sometimes denotes a very remarkable change of character even amongst the most unimaginative and commonplace of mankind. But without dwelling upon topics of this exalted nature, something may be done by ordinary human beings if they are content not to expect too much. Everybody, as the common phrase goes, is a fool or a physician by forty; some people are both; and, to transfer the doctrine from the physical to the moral health, everybody should have learnt before that period what is the method of treatment by which he may be coaxed into some kind of improvement. A good resolution is a medicine of which the amount and the mode of application require to be carefully considered; and no very plain rules can be laid down beyond that tact which is inexplicable even to its possessor. An overdose is very apt to turn the stomach, and too small a dose may produce no effect at all. Perhaps the only general principle is that the moral, like the physical, medicine can do very little beyond securing fair play to nature. It would be absurd, for example, though nothing is more common, for a person who is never capable of catching a train or answering a letter to determine to become all at once a model man of business; but some moderate improvement may occasionally be brought about by judicious measures. As a rule, a person sets about the work of reform by putting up an elaborate set of pigeon-holes, laying in a store of red tape, and resolving to answer every letter by return of post. The result is of course that in a short time he finds that he has a more elaborate machinery than he ever before possessed for reducing things to a state of systematic chaos. A more limited ambition might have produced happier results. If, for example, the patient had resolved to destroy all his papers without an effort to preserve them, and to allow such business as he neglected to do itself without struggling to interfere in the process, he might have obtained a kind of inverted order, which is certainly not of the most desirable kind, but which is perhaps more congenial to him and more satisfactory in the long run than any compromise between confusion and perfect arrangement. But if we attempted to discuss such matters, we should be drawn into inconvenient detail. All that can be said generally is that making good resolutions is a fine art, which requires a good deal of time and attention. Our ordinary spasmodic efforts at turning over a new leaf end for the most part in nothing but disgust; but if we carefully measure what we can do, and consider what are the means really within our power, we may sometimes succeed, not in substituting good qualities for bad, but in so distributing our energies as to make our bad qualities rather less obnoxious to ourselves and our neighbours than they have hitherto been; and that, it must be admitted, is far from a contemptible result.

THE FRENCH ACADEMY.

THE French Academy has recently filled the vacant chairs of four of the most remarkable of the Immortals who within the last fifty years have been gracefully handed down to oblivion in the customary Éloge. M. de Montalembert, who is succeeded by the Duke of Aumale, deserves to survive the literary obsequies which must, in the course of French nature, be performed over his remains, and, thanks to the name and merits of his successor, the ceremony will probably be something better than a form of painless extinction. Happy at least in the opportuneness of his death, happy assuredly in the hour of his departure from a world of disenchantments and regrets more difficult to endure than disease and pain, the felicity of his release is ratified by the posthumous good fortune of being consigned to the cenotaph of the Palais Mazarin by the heir and historian of the House of Condé. The Liberal, the Catholic, the Royalist, the constitutional and Parliamentary orator and writer, could not have desired a biographer more capable of doing justice to a life of impassioned fidelity to honour and conscience, to the eloquence that never quailed before despotism or anarchy, and to the faith and piety that never deserted the cause of human freedom or confounded reaction with religion. M. de Montalembert belonged to the choicest type of Academicians, such as we cannot doubt that the great Cardinal designed. It is a vulgar popular fallacy, and a ceaseless cuckoo-cry of the small literary whippersnappers of the Boulevards that Richelieu, because he amused his leisure moments in writing bad verses and worse plays, created the Academy as a representative body of professional men of letters. To support this theory it is assumed that Richelieu was anxious in the first instance to establish a privileged camaraderie of authors and critics, who would naturally indulge his own literary pretensions, and surround him with the reflected halo of their own renown. Richelieu may very probably have been more vain of his verses than proud of his statesmanship. But it was the statesman, not the poetaster, that founded the Academy; and he founded it, not as a republic of authors, though he was certainly not insensible to the rising intellectual glory of his country, but partly as a department of intelligence in which the licence of the unruly tribe of penmen might be placed, without their knowing it, under some sort of State supervision and control, and partly as a school of good manners and polite traditions, which should infuse through the middle classes of society a spirit of aristocratic repugnance to innovation. Richelieu never intended the Academy to be a society of men of genius or of literary men. What he wanted was a select company of representative men of all recognized ranks and orders and talents in the realm, statesmen, ecclesiastics, lawyers—the aristocracy of the sword, the Church, the robe, and the pen, with a moderate mixture of companions—and he meant to keep this miscellaneous company well in hand without imposing the slightest perceptible restraint upon their dangerous pastimes. The history of the Academy from 1637 to the present year is a fulfilment of the Cardinal's sagacious purpose. All the more or less pungent or insipid pleasantries which have been levelled at the institution by the rival occupants of the Forty-first Chair, who have stood generation after generation idly sneering and shivering at the portals, trying to keep their vanity warm with mutual assurances of indifference and superiority, attest the strength and soundness of Richelieu's foundation, and the singular uniformity with which his original design has been preserved in the midst of revolutionary perturbations and vicissitudes. It will be found, with a very few exceptions, that the Academy has always been a composite collection of men not invariably eminent, not always literary, but mostly mediocre, and discreet, tempering gaiety with gravity and liveliness with severity, and preserving in their mannered compliments and faint allusive whiffs of irony, something of the faded perfume of an old régime.

It would be easy of course to name decided instances of Academicians in a period of two centuries and a half who have not answered to this general description. Before and since the Revolution brilliant and destructive writers have figured in the illustrious fauteuils, and have sat side by side with infidels and heretics. But these writers have been the friends or the clients of great social and political personages, and the infidels and heretics have been Cardinals and Abbés. The Academy has persistently shut its doors against the literary adventurers, the pure and simple "gentlemen of the press," or what we should call in these days the Bohemian tribe. Aggressive heterodoxy it has repelled rather as a sin against the forms and usages of good society than as a sin against dominant beliefs. In the last century it shut its doors against the greatest man of letters of the time, until he had written a mock and therefore doubly humiliating recantation. And yet Voltaire had given a home to a Jesuit refugee; he had dedicated a tragedy to the Pope; he had restored a church and personally dedicated the sacred edifice to the Deity; he was chamberlain to a King, and the familiar correspondent of monarchs, Ministers, and marshals; and, after all, it was not so much his letter of submission to the Church as his considerable social relations throughout Europe which secured a seat among the Forty for the author of a national epic and of classic tragedies, for the expounder of the philosophy of Locke and the science of Newton, for the historian of the grand epoch of "all the glories" of France. As a man of letters Diderot was only second to Voltaire, but Diderot was a "Bohemian." What sort of men of letters, it has often been asked, would an English Academy elect if it proceeded on French principles and precedents? Perhaps the patrons and Committee of the Royal Literary Fund, and the members of the famous Literary Club, would be the natural representatives of such an institution in the present day. In former generations such men as Addison, Bolingbroke, Prior, Swift, Burke, Reynolds, and Dr. Johnson might have been typical Academicians. It is not difficult to recognize the many well-known and popular names in our literature that would have found no place in the company, and we can imagine the taunts of the ready writers of the journals and the circulating libraries, when a bishop, a dean, a Privy Councillor, or a ponderous essayist was chosen, and a novelist or a playwright was rejected. Fortunately, an Academy of Literature is as little likely to be established on this side of the Channel as a Provisional Republic. We have only suggested a fanciful analogy by way of illustrating the false conception of Richelieu's Academy as a society of professional men of letters. No doubt it was to be the supreme guardian and arbiter of the literary language; it was to be entrusted with the laborious monopoly of compiling a couple of dictionaries—one for common use and the other classic and historical. The former of these tasks was indeed accomplished in the course of the last century, and the work has passed through some five or six editions; the latter has advanced, we believe, as far as the fifth letter of the alphabet, and at the present rate of progress will probably be completed in the thirtieth century. The First Napoleon, who had his reasons for detesting the Immortals, complained bitterly of their neglect of the founder's intentions in the matter of the Dictionary; he would willingly have transformed the Academy into a sort of literary Council of State. He did not quite succeed in this; it was not so easy as to sterilise the national intelligence, to silence the free voices he could not subdue, and to suspend the vending of history.

Under the Restoration and the Monarchy of July the elections to the Academy were, for the most part, if we have correctly interpreted the founder's intentions, in strict accordance with his original purpose. The mere literary man, professionally speaking, was consistently excluded; but the eloquent statesman and parliamentary debater, the high-bred ecclesiastical dignitary, the voluminous national historian, the correctly classical dramatist, the ingenious professor, the novelist of society, the literary critic, and the poet when he was also a peer of France, were admitted without misgiving, and without putting too fine a point on questions of confession or conformity, or prying into secrets of the conscience. M. Mérimée, for example, to whom M. de Loménie succeeded, wrote exquisite fictions in a perfect style; his intellectual resources were rich and various, his culture was delicate and refined; but in politics he was nothing but a sceptic until the Second Empire made him a Senator for what they call in our Navy "particular service"; and in religion, if he had any, it is enough to say that he was the bosom friend and disciple of Henri Boyle. M. Villemain, so long the Permanent Secretary of the Academy, to whose chair M. Littré has so worthily succeeded, was the French Quintilian, a consummate Latinist and critic, a Professor equally versed in ancient and modern literature, a Liberal-Conservative Minister of Public Instruction, and as good a Catholic as Voltaire when he corresponded with a Cardinal. The lamented Prevost-Paradol, whose seat, so early filled and so early vacant, is now occupied by a gentleman conspicuously unknown to the world at large as the historiographer of the French War Office and the compiler of a very weighty abstract of French history, owed his election to the conditions and circumstances of the time in which his lot was cast as a political writer on the Liberal side under a military despotism. A fellow-student of About and Taine at the École Normale, he chose a political career on the losing side, and the losing side at that time, if displeasing to the gods, was pleasing to the Immortals. He fought for the good cause with the only weapon a Liberal could use, a rapier of keen and polished irony, "the ice-brook's temper." While his friend About was disporting himself in Bohemia, and accepting the hospitalities of Compiègne as one of the lighter sort of guests of "the third series," Prevost-Paradol was combating and suffering on behalf of all the necessary liberties. It was the example of respectability, of moral courage, and of moderate constitutional liberalism which the Academy rewarded in the person of that attached disciple of M. Thiers, who was destined by the cruel sarcasm of fate to fall as suddenly as he had risen, and with the losing cause, a victim to the blandishments of M. Émile Ollivier, and who removed himself abruptly from the scene after the manner of a Roman Stoic under the Cæsars, because he could not face his friends at home whose warnings he had disregarded, or bear witness to the fulfilment of his own prophetic fears. Were the French Academy what it is ignorantly accused of not being, and what it was never designed to be, a purely literary society, assuredly the claims of M. Prevost-Paradol were neither superior to those of M. About nor equal to those of M. Taine. M. de Loménie may be considered an average specimen of the literary Academician; his name indicates a more than satisfactory social position; he is an agreeable Professor, a painstaking and not too sparkling biographer, and in politics and religion he belongs to the juste milieu, that "safest middle" of moderate and reasonable men of the world. The Duke of Aumale, if he were nothing but a Liberal commoner returned from exile, would have amply deserved an Academical fauteuil by his literary qualifications, his public services, and the perfect dignity of his life and conduct. The minority of one by which M. About lost his election may well surprise those who remember his diverting, but not dignified, political gyrations under the last régime, his attacks, his adulations, his services, his desertions, his simulated disdain and his voracious sympathies, better than the pathetic charm of his Tulla, the delicate observation and genial wit of his Marrages de Paris, the sound sense and vivid clearness of his chapters on Progress and his Workman's ABC, and the incisive mockery of his Roman Question. There is no denying that as a literary handicraftsman he is of the lineage of Voltaire; but the writer of those atrocious letters in Le Soir at the opening of the war of 1870, who glouted over the coming slaughter of the Germans, and depicted, in anticipation of coming events, the Turks (who carry civilization in the folds of their flag) licking their lips at the sight of the blondes Bavaroises, never had a spark of Voltaire's generous humanity in his breast, and was never capable of Voltaire's serious and exalted sympathy with suffering, his horror of cruelty and oppression, and his respect for the dignity of letters. Still, as a mere literary artist, M. About is not an improper candidate for a chair in the Academy; and if he never wrote another line, his works would certainly be remembered for some years after M. de Pongerville's translations and M. Viennet's fables were forgotten. Nor is it an unwelcome aspect of the Academical development since the fall of Imperialism that a philosopher of M. Littré's calibre and independence is chosen, and that the author of La Question Romaine is only rejected by a single vote. Whether it be true that M. About's near approach to success was owing to the personal influence of the President of the Republic, who had promised and withdrawn a diplomatic appointment for which the Academy was expected to provide an honorary compensation, we cannot say. But the unprecedented and unwarrantable scandal of Bishop Dupanloup's virulent and violent attack upon M. Littré; that fiery prelate's endeavour to turn the Palace Mazarin into a Holy Office; his pamphleteering examinations, his restless conspiracies, his sudden resignation of his seat among the Immortals, his capricious descent from Olympus in a cloud of the blackest episcopal ink, and in a storm of his loudest episcopal thunder, warn us to abstain from too confident dreams of a republic of letters in which the ecclesiastical lion and the heterodox lamb will sit down together, and agree to differ.

Bishop Dupanloup's own qualifications for the Academy consisted principally in his having resisted Ultramontanism and Imperialism, and defended the Pagan classics against a bilious Abbé who insisted that the Catechism and the Lives of the Saints were a sufficiently nourishing and stimulating diet for the intellect of youth. His own literary performances out of the pulpit are more remarkable for vigour than for refinement, and, as Mr. Disraeli would say, "want finish." On the other hand, the Bishop is almost the sole survivor of Gallicanism; he was the friend of Montalembert, and he believes in a constitutional monarchy. Wherefore this extraordinary outburst against M. Littré, the quietest, most blameless, most meritorious, most learned and laborious of citizens and philosophers? Bishop Dupanloup has been content to sit side by side with Voltairians like M. Viennet, translators and disciples of Lucretius like M. de Pongerville, Epicureans like M. Sainte-Beuve, cynics like M. Mérimée, philosophers like M. Cousin, who was more Platonic in his philosophy than in his passion for the fair penitents of the Fronde, and who fancied himself devout at an age when he could only hope to accompany Madame de Longueville to her Carmelite retreat. And now he shrinks, as at the breath of a pestilence, from contact with a man of Benedictine patience and learning, of the severest and simplest life, of incorruptible integrity, of perfect moderation in political opinion, who has never uttered or written an aggressive or mocking word against any Church or creed; but who, in an age of toleration and inquiry, and liberty of conscience and printing, has avowed that he prefers what he considers a scientific conception of human life and history, to some prevailing theological systems and formulas. Bishop Dupanloup appears to be one of those ecclesiastics who can tolerate any simulated uniformity better than any honest or open incredulity; and who resent, even more than conscience in a heretic, the example of public and private virtue in an unbeliever. If M. Littré were one of the well-behaved and sagacious Sadducees of society, who keep their opinions, if they have any, to themselves, he need never have parted company with the Bishop of Orleans on this side of the grave. Had he only buried himself for years in the compilation of a dictionary, without avowing himself to be a disciple of M. Comte, the Bishop of Orleans would be delighted to welcome him among, at least, the provisional Immortals of this terrestrial sphere. But although M. Littré long ago renounced the religious pretensions of his master, and solemnly withdrew from the church of Comte, it is enough that he should persist in acknowledging his obligations to that philosopher's scientific teaching and discipline, and his preference of the inductive to the theological interpretation of such facts as are accessible to finite intelligence, to make Bishop Dupanloup pronounce, of his own mere motion, the major excommunication upon his inoffensive colleague, and then, with admirable logic, instantly proceed to excommunicate—himself. It seems doubtful whether, according to the statutes of the Academy, the liberty of self-excommunication is allowed. Can an Immortal become again a mortal? That is the question upon which the French Academy will have to pronounce, if the Bishop should not recover his temper and almost persuade himself to be a Christian before his heretical friend, M. Littré, upon whom he, out of the abundance of his heart, has lavished so rich a vocabulary of charitable epithets, takes his seat as M. Villemain's successor. Unless we are greatly mistaken, the French Academy would contemplate the resignation even of a Bishop without much remorse, if only M. Emile Ollivier, whose election a year ago remains one of the most flagrant scandals in its history, could be persuaded to go and do likewise.

THE DOCTORS AND ALCOHOLISM.

THE declaration respecting alcohol which has just been signed by two hundred and fifty physicians and surgeons, headed by the Presidents of the two great Medical Colleges, and including nearly all the most eminent members of the profession, has certainly not appeared before it was required. We have ourselves more than once called attention to the increasing passion for stimulants which is observable in modern society, not only among the lower classes, but among educated and cultivated people, men and women alike, in the drawing-rooms of May Fair as well as in the Clubs of Pall Mall and the counting-houses of the City; and we are glad that the doctors have at last taken up the question in a serious manner. There are some scandals about which it is perhaps well to say as little as possible, but there are other scandals which must be boldly faced if any good is to be done, and which cannot be hushed up, however strong may be the desire and however general the consent that they should be treated as non-existent. The drinking habits of the upper and middle classes seem to us to have reached a point at which they clearly belong to the latter category. It is necessary to speak out and to call things by their right names in order that those who are now dallying more or less unconsciously with a degrading and ruinous vice may see the peril of their ways and make a resolute effort to turn from them. In any comparison between the present generation and our grandfathers or great-grandfathers it is usually assumed that we are superior to them at least in our temperate use of intoxicating liquors. Gentlemen no longer come reeling into the drawing-room after a debauch at the dinner-table. Five-bottle men have gone the way of the dodo and the pterodactyl, and the days of prolonged potations are at end. At a dinner party the gentlemen rejoin the ladies after a brief interval, sometimes following them at once to the drawing-room. Heavy drinking is regarded as a disgraceful anachronism, and a man who gets drunk excludes himself from good society. All this is very true, but it does not quite prove the assertion that we are a more sober people than our grandfathers; it only proves that we do not get drunk in the same way as they did. It is quite possible to drink a great deal of liquor, even of strong liquor, without yielding to that absolute intoxication which reveals itself in inarticulate speech, staggering movements, or senseless stupor. A good deal depends on whether the liquor is consumed at a sitting or in drams taken at intervals during the day. Violent or helpless intoxication is but one among many phases of drunkenness. It may be said that it is only navvies or the lower order of mechanics and petty shopkeepers who now allow themselves to be seen in this condition. Some of them are confirmed sots, and are always tipping; but as a rule, when men of this class get drunk, it is not by means of habitual drams, but as the natural conclusion of a drinking bout in which they have engaged with a distinct expectation, if not expressly for the sake, of this result. There is a "big drink" recurring with more or less frequency, and in the intervals they are perhaps as sober as judges. This was once the way in which gentlemen settled down to their cups, and the fashion has been gradually descending in the social scale. Of course it is a disgusting and brutish habit, and it may be hoped that in the course of time it will be cast off by the labouring population as it has been by the gentlefolks, judicious legislation perhaps assisting the natural process. But what we are now concerned to point out is that this is after all only one kind of drunkenness, and not in all respects the most dangerous and destructive kind. Its very grossness and the violent external indications which accompany it supply to some extent a warning, if not a corrective. It is a rock on which no vessel can split unawares. There is a sharp, unmistakable penalty for each carouse, which suggests reflection and encourages reform. If a man goes to the dogs in this manner, he goes with his eyes open, and everybody can see plainly what has happened, and can put together cause and effect and draw the necessary moral. It is the strong still current of the stream above the falls, the fatal grip of which is not appreciated until it is too late to struggle against it, which is most to be dreaded. It is possible for a man to be very much the worse for drink, as the phrase is, both in a moral and physical sense, without showing it in his gait or speech, and even to be all but a confirmed drunkard without himself being more than faintly aware of the peril in which he stands. Hence the serious and alarming aspect of the kind of drunkenness which is now becoming so prevalent in society, even in quarters where it has hitherto been little suspected; drunkenness which, stopping short of absolute intoxication, takes the form of a perpetual and feverish craving for alcoholic excitements, for nips and drams, for odd glasses of sherry and "spots" of brandy at irregular hours. As a mere matter of hygiene, it would probably be better for a man to get fairly drunk once or twice every few weeks than to yield himself in bondage to an evil desire, which, when once indulged, establishes its dominion by preying on the stomach and destroying the appetite of its wretched victim, and thus compelling him to depend on stimulants for sustenance. It is possible for a time to make alcohol a substitute for food, but of course it can only be for a time, and the end is certain, and often swift in coming.

It may be admitted that there is more refinement in the drinking habits of the present day than in those of the past century; but it is a mistake to take mere grossness as a measure of vice. Sir Walter Scott's grand-aunt once confessed to him that she, an old woman of eighty and upwards, sitting alone, was ashamed to read Mrs. Behn's novels, which, sixty years before, she had heard read aloud for the amusement of large circles consisting of the best society in London. The frank obscenity of Mrs. Behn are still more out of date now; but it would be rash to assume that the delicately worded fiction of some of our own lady novelists does not supply a more insidious and dangerous poison. A similar remark may perhaps be made with regard to the more decorous indulgence in stimulants which has been substituted for the simple brutality of sitting down to drink steadily and without intermission until the host and his guests fell dead drunk under the table. In the latter case there was at least a limit to drinking for the time, and nature was able to impose an interval of sobriety before the next debauch. But the habit of taking drams and nips may be continued, almost without cessation, from one year's end to another, until paralysis or delirium intervenes. There is of course a constant tendency to increase the dose, and the tippler's condition is always becoming more pitiable and helpless; but his descent is smooth and not interrupted by the shocks which pull up the more violent drunkard in his desperate career, and almost compel him, in spite of himself, to reflect on the misery and degradation which he is accumulating for himself. It is impossible to shut our eyes to the signs of the times. On every side we see proofs of the increasing habit of drinking at all hours of the day. The railway stations are becoming vast drinking-saloons. There are few bakers or confectioners who do not exhibit a decanter and glasses on their counter. The theatres present the appearance of a succession of bars. One of the newest of them opens into a tavern, which shares the same roof, and may be regarded as part of the same establishment; while visitors to another find barmails established in bowers of bottles at every turn of the central staircase and in every spare nook and corner of the auditorium. It might almost be supposed that the day is not far distant when the West-end theatres will borrow a leaf from their humble suburban rivals, and provide every accommodation for industrious drinking during the performances. As if this abundant public provision for the insatiable thirst of the community were not sufficient, it appears that it has of late become the custom for commercial men to set up a private bin, or at least bottle, in their places of business. No counting-house would seem to be considered complete without a well-stocked cellar, and it is hinted that attorneys' chambers are fitted up with equal care for similar rites. If it is true that there was more downright drunkenness fifty or sixty years ago, on the other hand it may be doubted whether the consumption of liquor has not greatly increased. There are apparently not a few people who are under the impression that, with the exception perhaps of brandy and whisky, no intoxicating drinks are now in use, champagne being only a kind of lemonade, and sherry as innocuous as currant wine, while claret, of course, is only a sort of coloured water. It would perhaps occasion considerable surprise if the amount of raw alcohol contained in the light wines which are so much in favour, and which are triumphantly referred to as a proof of the increasing sobriety of the nation, could be extracted and exhibited. Most of the low-priced sherry is only brandy-and-water in disguise, but the brandy which forms the principal basis of the deleterious compound bears no relation to the juice of the grape; it is a fiery, corroding spirit, distilled from potatoes, beet-root, grain, or perhaps even from timber. Some people flatter themselves that, if they keep to a very dry sherry, they are safe; but dry sherries, to any degree of dryness, are now to be had at any price, the wine-merchants having discovered that the addition of nitre will produce the desired flavour. Much of the cheap claret which is consumed under the impression that it is a light temperance beverage is also highly fortified with coarse spirits. It may be observed that persons who are accustomed to this so-called light wine often disparage the better kinds as tame and insipid. The introduction of cheap wines into this country has proved, we suspect, a very questionable advantage. Quantity for quantity, it may be better to drink a simple claret than strong port; but, on the other hand, it must be remembered that the claret usually sold is very far from being so simple and innocuous as is supposed, that it is consumed more freely and frequently than port was in former days, and that a large class of people who rarely drank wine at all, but contented themselves with water or light beer at their meals, are now in the habit of drinking several glasses of wine in a day. Formerly wine, in households of moderate means, was reserved for state occasions, a birthday or some other family festival; but now everybody drinks wine, or what is supposed to be wine, as a familiar indulgence. Every middle-class house with the least pretensions to respectability, down to the clerk's toy villa at Islington or Camberwell, boasts of a cellar, and there is always a supply of liquor temptingly at hand. If people do not get drunk as they used to do, it is certainly not because they have reduced their consumption of intoxicating drinks; and it is not certain that the modern fashion, although it may be more decorous, is an improvement as regards its effect on health and morals. The feverishness and restlessness of modern life, the morbid passion for excitement and sensation, the tendency to reckless speculation in business, and to a headlong pace in society, may without much difficulty be traced in a great measure to the increasing use of dangerous stimulants.

Under these circumstances, it is satisfactory to find that the doctors, who have great influence in such matters, are now turning their attention seriously to this canker of society. Some offence has apparently been occasioned by the opening statement of the Medical Declaration that, "it is believed that the inconsiderate prescription of large quantities of alcoholic liquids by Medical Men for their patients has given rise, in many instances, to the formation of intemperate habits"; but it is impossible to deny that the doctors, as a body, have made themselves responsible for a certain share of the mischief. Their sins in this respect have been sins both of omission and commission, and their reticence has perhaps been more injurious than their prescriptions. They have encouraged the use of stimulants, not only by administering them somewhat too freely in particular cases, but also by neglecting to challenge or rebuke undue indulgence with sufficient plainness of speech when it came under their notice. It is true that patients often take upon themselves to interpret the physician's advice in a sense agreeable to themselves, or to father upon him directions which he would be the last to give. What has been recommended for an emergency is adopted as a regular habit, and drops are magnified into drams. At the same time, although the doctors do not deserve all the blame which is cast upon them, it can hardly be said that they have shown that caution and that sense of grave responsibility which are necessary in prescribing so fascinating and dangerous a drug as alcohol. The Medical Declaration, in fact, hits the blot exactly when it says that "alcohol, in whatever form, should be prescribed with as much care as any powerful drug, and that the directions for its use should be so framed as not to be interpreted as a sanction for excess, or necessarily for the continuance of its use when the occasion is past." If the doctors choose, they can do immense service by dissipating the superstitious exaggeration which prevails as to the value of alcohol as an article of diet; by warning their patients of the insidious and fatal advances of the appetite for stimulants if once encouraged; by compelling them to reckon up the extent of their regular potations; and by stripping off all disguise or illusion as to the character of the liquids consumed and the inevitable consequences of a disgusting and destructive vicia. It has been calculated that one ounce and a-half of absolute alcohol, or two ounces in the case of unusual mental or physical exercise, is about the maximum daily allowance for adult men, and three-quarters of an ounce (or two glasses of ordinary cherry) for women. Of course it cannot be expected that people should take their wine in measured phials; but it is well that it should be understood that it is only within narrow limits that stimulants can be safely taken, that frequent small doses, especially if taken apart from meals, are almost worse than an occasional overdose, and that drinking may be carried to an excessive and ruinous point without producing anything like absolute intoxication.

SWISS FEDERAL REFORM.

WE lately described the opening of that important Session of the Swiss Federal Assembly which has taken in hand the great work of a thorough revision of the Federal Constitution. One stage of that work has now been gone through. The Nationalrath, or House of Representatives, has debated and voted on some of the most important of the proposed changes, and has now gone home to enjoy its Christmas holiday and to meet again on January 15th. We have been a good deal amused at the kind and degree of notice which the proceedings of the Assembly have thus far met with in the English newspapers. We have nowhere seen any consecutive or intelligible account. But notices have come here and there at haphazard, which we suppose may pass as signs of the amount of knowledge which the ordinary English reader and writer has gained of Swiss political affairs. For instance, the last and nearly the first telegram which appeared in the daily papers announced that "the National Council had decided" that education should be so-and-so. We tried this form of words on a thoroughly impartial witness, and we found, as we expected, that the idea conveyed was that, when the National Council had decided a thing, there was no more to be said about it, and that what they had decided became law without more ado. The words certainly would not suggest to any one the notion that a measure—especially a constitutional amendment—which has only passed the National Council is a good deal further from being law than a measure which has only passed the House of Commons. No one would guess that the vote of the National Council was, in the case of an amendment of the Federal Constitution, only the first vote out of four; that the measure when it had passed the National Council could still be either rejected or amended by the Council of the States (Ständerath or Senate); and that, when the two Councils agreed on the form of the measure, it had still to be submitted to a vote of Yea or Nay at the hands both of the Cantons and of the nation at large. When an attempt has been made, as was done in at least one case by the Pall Mall Gazette on the question of Etablissement or Niederlassung, to give some account of the points at issue, the account given has been such as to convey a somewhat exaggerated notion of the existing state of affairs. The Swiss citizen of one Canton settled in another Canton is certainly treated as a foreigner in many points of communal affairs; but it is by no means true to say that he is treated as a foreigner in cantonal affairs, in which he has exactly the same rights as a native of the Canton. Swiss politics are so complicated; they contain so many wheels within wheels, the Cantons within the Confederation and the Communes again within the Cantons; there are so many cross interests of Catholics against Protestants, of the Welsh Cantons against the German; the whole mode of procedure is so unlike anything that we are used to among ourselves, that the thread is somewhat difficult to follow even for those who have made Swiss affairs a special study, and the piecemeal announcements which the newspapers put forth from time to time must be wholly unintelligible to the general reader. Now that a break has taken place in the proceedings of the Assembly, it seems to be a good time to give some general account of what has been already done. We have followed the debates carefully throughout, and are thinking at least, they contain many points of extreme interest.

What has been done as yet has been for one body which the Legislature—the Nationalrath, or Conseil National—to go in order directly represents the Swiss people as a nation, and through the first chapter of the Federal Constitution and the amendments on it which have been proposed in various quarters. This first chapter of the Constitution, the heading of which is Allgemeine Bestimmungen, or Dispositions Générales, deals with matters which for the most part are not in the strictest sense constitutional. The form of the Federal Government itself, its legislative, executive, and judicial branches, are dealt with in the second chapter of the Constitution, which the debates of the Council have not yet touched. Nothing therefore has been said as yet on the great question of the direct voice of the people in Federal legislation, nothing about the proposals known as Veto, Referendum, and Initiative. The questions dealt with as yet are many of them very important, and they are of a very miscellaneous kind. Besides questions which have no great interest out of the country, the Council has been dealing with many matters which are worthy of the attention of political students everywhere, such as the constitution of the army, the relations of Church and State, especially in the matter of education, the codification of the civil and criminal law, and that most interesting question which has no exact parallel among ourselves, but which hangs on to so many political and historical questions in all times and places—the question of the rights of citizens settled in a commune which is not their own by birth. On these points the National Council has had before it the proposals of a Committee of its own body and of another Committee of the Ständerath, as well as the proposals of the Federal Council (the executive Government), and the various proposals made in the course of debate by members of the Council itself. The proposals of the Select Committee of the House have been by no means universally accepted by the House itself. In some cases the National Council has preferred the proposals of the Committee of the Ständerath, and in other cases it has preferred the amendments of individual members. One or two points in the way of carrying on the debates at once strike an English reader. Though there are in Switzerland strongly marked political parties, yet the forms of the Constitution do not admit of anything exactly answering to a Ministerial and Opposition side of the House. As the Federal Council is chosen by the Assembly for the same term as the existence of the Assembly itself, there can never, in the ordinary course of debate, be any question as to keeping in or turning out this or that Administration. There is no room therefore for anything answering to our Treasury Bench: there is no opportunity for any one member to hold the position, one unknown to the law, but so familiar and important in practice, of our Leader of the House. It follows that the functions of the President are somewhat more extensive than those of our Speaker. He to some extent unites the functions of Speaker and Leader of the House, so far at least as concerns such matters as suggestions as to the order of business in the House, which in England fall to the Leader of the House, but in Switzerland to the President. Like the English Speaker, he votes only when the House is equally divided, a duty which has fallen upon him more than once during the course of these debates. But what at once strikes one familiar with our House of Commons, though it is no more than the practice of our own House of Lords, is that the present President, Herr Brummor of Bern, has at least once in these discussions left his chair of office to take part, like an English Lord Chancellor, in the debate. The members of the Federal Council also have made frequent use of the provision in the Constitution which allows them to appear and speak in either House of the Assembly at pleasure, but without the right of voting. Herr Dubs in particular, the well known political writer, has been as ready in speech as with his pen; he has taken rather a prominent part in the debates, and has laid several amendments before the House. And, what strikes an Englishman as more singular than all, it seems not to be against rule for a member of the Federal Council to speak openly in the Assembly of the secrets of the innermost sanctuary of the Commonwealth, to announce that on such a point the Federal Council was unanimous, while on such another point it had divided with such or such a majority and minority. It is more in accordance with English Parliamentary usage when a Federal Councillor announces that the Federal Council has determined that such a point shall be an open question, and that each of its members shall be free to support whatever side he pleases. It must be remembered that, though the Federal Council constantly lays proposals before the Assembly, and though the Assembly constantly refers matters to it for its advice, it has no direct voice in legislation, neither the absolute  veto  of the English King nor the suspensive  veto  of the American President.

In our study of the debates in the National Council we have come across several things which we must confess that we look upon with some little dread. The Federal principle is the very life and soul of the Swiss Commonwealth. A number of small communities, differing widely in blood, language, religion, and social condition, but united by a common history, a common love of freedom, common interests in the face of more powerful neighbours, have been kept together by a system which allows them to act as one nation in the face of other nations; a system which creates a central power clothed with authority in all matters which concern the whole body, while it leaves to each of the component States the fullest independence, the fullest legislative and administrative power in all matters which concern itself only. The principle on which the existing Constitution goes is to entrust to the Federal authorities such matters as the Cantons cannot deal with for themselves, and to leave to the Cantons everything which they can deal with for themselves. It has been rightly felt that the same legislation need not always be the best for a Catholic and a Protestant community, for a German-speaking and for a Romance-speaking community, for the people of a pastoral valley and for the people of a manufacturing town. And it has been no less rightly felt that, putting aside all questions of what is abstractedly the best legislation, the historical traditions and the historical pride, nay the mere prejudices and susceptibilities of commonwealths many of which have for ages gloried in their independence, are not to be touched with a rude hand. It has been felt that it is better to leave some things in a less perfect state than to run any chance of sowing discontent or discord among the confederated States. It has been felt that there are cases in which it is better to let a Canton govern itself in a worse way than to govern it in a better way by the interference of the central power. The principle of cantonal sovereignty is the basis of the whole Confederation; and, when we turn to the Constitution of 1848 followed on a close examination by the work of the conquerors in that year, we find that the wonderful and honourable to its framers that principle has been so carefully preserved throughout. If the principle of cantonal sovereignty is ever given up, Switzerland will at once lose its great distinctive glory and advantage in the face of other nations. Without the cantonal principle, the difference between Switzerland and the surrounding nations will be cut down to a difference between monarchic and republican forms of government. In a Federal Switzerland the possession of the highest degree of local freedom by each separate commonwealth is an attraction strong enough to bind States together which otherwise have more in common with some of their foreign neighbours than they have with one another. If Switzerland should ever, instead of a Federal, become what is called a Unitarian State, if independent Cantons ever sink into mere administrative departments, the men of Ticino, for instance, may begin to ask, or at all events some one may begin to ask for them, whether an Italian-speaking country on the Italian side of the Alps might not as well be a department of Italy as a department of Switzerland. To us, as outsiders, it seems that no danger can be so great as that of needlessly wounding even the traditional feelings of the several confederated States. To us it seems rash to seek for legislative or administrative unity at the risk of doing the slightest damage to national unity.

Now in reading the debates it strikes us, as indeed we hinted in our former article, that a party in the Confederation, chiefly the Liberal party in the German Cantons, have shown themselves too eager to purchase certain real or supposed improvements at the cost of striking a blow at the higher principle of cantonal independence. They remind us somewhat of the impetuous zeal of the younger generation of Oxford reformers. Because there are many points in which the legislation of many Cantons may be greatly improved, because it would often be better if some Cantons would imitate the legislation of others, a large party seems prepared to force on the reforms which they seek at all hazards by crowding the Federal Constitution with provisions which, to our thinking, ought to stay, as they hitherto have stayed, within the competence of the Cantons. It must be remembered that in a Federal State there is no means except that of a provision in the Federal Constitution for enforcing any change throughout the whole country. All powers which are not specially vested in the Confederation by the Federal Constitution remain within the competence of the Cantons, and ordinary Federal legislation cannot touch them. Hence the eagerness to deal by means of constitutional provisions with matters which to us do not seem to be constitutional matters at all. There seems a forgetfulness that a Federal Constitution is not simply a law for a certain territory, like an Act of an English Parliament or a Ukase of a Russian Czar, but that it is essentially a treaty between independent States, which keep their full independence on all points on which they do not formally give it up. There seems a forgetfulness that it is not enough to show that a proposed change will be abstractedly an improvement, but that it must be further shown that it is an improvement so absolutely necessary as to justify thrusting it down the throats of independent States against their will. In the Burgundian Cantons, on the other hand, these distinctions seem to be perfectly well understood. It is the special interest of those Cantons to understand them. To them the retention of cantonal sovereignty is everything. Now they are independent States, the equals of their German neighbours. Turn the Federal State into a "Unitarian" State, and they will be at once swamped by an overwhelming German majority, and may perhaps be made to receive a code of German law for which they have no fancy. Hence, in the course of these debates, we find members from the Welsh Cantons, whose views are as liberal as those of their German brethren, but who also see that on every point of this kind there are two questions to be asked. Member after member from the West gets up and says:—"I approve of such or such a proposal in itself; it is the law of my own Canton, or I should like to make it the law of my own Canton; but I do not look on it as a thing which ought to be forced on unwilling Cantons by a provision in the Federal Constitution." We venture to think that this line of argument is more truly Liberal than the overbearing eagerness of those who would overturn all barriers in order to carry their own particular reforms, however desirable in themselves. And we are sure that to bear with weaker brethren, to give a little and take a little, is the surer way to maintain the unity and safety of the Confederation.

We trust in another article to enlarge a little more fully on some of the special points which have been under discussion in the National Council.

FATHER GRATRY'S RECENTATION.

WHILE the Vatican Council was sitting in 1870 Father Gratty, one of the most learned priests in France, published four Letters, since translated into English by Mr. Bailey, addressed to Mgr. Dechamps, Archbishop of Malines, who was a principal leader of the infallibilist party among the bishops. His Letters were alike remarkable for their earnestness, their logic, and their outspoken earnestness of tone. In the first he examined and exposed at length the heresy of Pope Honorius, and his condemnation for heresy by three Ecumenical Councils and a succession of Popes, summing up the argument by a statement that, "if the Letters of Honorius are not heretical, the whole Church has for centuries anathematized as heretical a writing, a man, a Pope, perfectly orthodox, and on a question of faith and dogmatic facts three Councils and twenty Popes have obstinately deceived themselves in their most solemn decrees." He further shows that the Roman Breviary has been seriously tampered with in order to conceal these unpleasant facts, and denounces with just severity a system of "infamous" falsification which has been for centuries one main cause of religious decay among Catholics. In a second Letter he returns to the attack, and expates still further, and in detail, the tactics of this "secte de mensonge," which has misled the noblest men and greatest intellects in the Church, and which he considers more perilous to her interests than all the heretical sects. He insists that all the advocates of Papal infallibility are working directly or indirectly on forged authorities, that there are no traces of the doctrine in the first five centuries or in any great theologian of any age, except those who have been deceived by what we now know to be forgeries, and that it is therefore "evidently false." There is not indeed "any question, theological, philosophical, historical, or other, which has been so disgraced by falsehood, bad faith, and forgery. It is a question utterly disgraced by fraud." Nay, more, this school of lying "is none other than the obstacle foreseen by Christ, these gates of hell which will attempt, but in vain, to prevail against the Church," and which are the real cause of her "at present scarcely ruling a twentieth part of the human race." In his third Letter Father Gratry vindicates his argument against the feeble rejoinder of Mgr. Dechamps, and shows from the solemn Bull of Paul IV., "Cum ex Apostolatus officio," signed in Consistory by all the Cardinals, and "addressed to the whole Church, and even to the whole human race," that, according to his own infallible decree, "the Pope is the master of all kingdoms, the crime of heresy deserves capital punishment, and ipso facto deprives all princes of their dominions, and all men of their rights and property, and that every domain, property, or kingdom belonging to those convicted of heresy lapses of right to the first occupant." And he indignantly asks whether men possessed of reason and moral sense are prepared to trample under foot truth, justice, and the Gospel of Christ, and to depose God Himself by accepting such monstrous tenets. This is pretty strong; but the fourth and concluding Letter, in reply to those infallibilist partisans who had written against him, is the most remarkable of the series. In it he demonstrates, against the dishonest blundering of Dom Guéranger, the systematic falsification of the Roman Breviary in the interests of infallibilism, and applies to it the well-known passage in the Book of Job, "Nunquid indiget Deus mendacio vestro?" The real aim, he says, of "the sect" represented by Dom Guéranger, is "to abolish the Councils and to suppress the episcopate." And he ends with a vigorous protest against the infallibilist decree then on the eve of being forced through the Vatican Synod. "Why treat the peaceful and humble assembly of the faithful 'as it never yet has been treated' (to quote Father Newman), why tread under foot the convictions of so vast a number? . . . Why insult, despise, outrage, crush hundreds of doctors and bishops, thousands of the faithful, enlightened, intelligent, zealous, well informed, whose life you trouble, whose conscience you grieve?" He adds that what is not clearly contained in Scripture and tradition cannot be defined as a dogma, and that that certainly is not contained in Scripture and tradition of which so many doctors and bishops in all ages declare the contrary to be found there. Such were the sentiments of Father Gratry, publicly and deliberately repeated in four successive pamphlets, the last of which only appeared a month or two before the Vatican decree of July 18, 1870.

And now let us turn to his letter just published in the Debats to the newly-appointed Archbishop of Paris, the Ultramontane successor of the murdered and heroic Darboy, who was the chief opponent of the infallibilist dogma at Rome, and who has left a record of his latest sentiments on the subject in the little pamphlet La Dernière Heure du Concile, issued just before the close.

Montreux (Vaud), Nov. 25, 1871.

Monsieur,—If I had not been very ill and incapable of writing a letter I should long before this have addressed to you my respectful welcome. I wish at least to-day to say to you, Monsieur, what it appears to me perhaps does not require to be said—that, like all my brethren in the priesthood, I accept the decrees of the Council of the Vatican. Anything which I may before that decision have written upon that subject which is contrary to those decrees I efface.

Be pleased, Monseigneur, to send me your blessing.

A. GRATTEY.

The Archbishop, as was to be expected, at once replied with the flattering assurance that his correspondent had rendered greater service to the Church by "effacing" his anti-infallibilist pamphlets than by all his "useful and eloquent works" formerly published in defence of the Church. But another and very different reply was soon to follow which disposes summarily of at least one statement in Father Gratry's remarkable opistle. That a writer who had been only a year before an energetic in denouncing the atrocity of pious frauds, should commit himself, in view of the events of the last few months, to the assertion that all his brethren in the priesthood agree in accepting the Vatican decree, is sufficiently startling. And one of the most illustrious of his "brethren," not only in the priesthood, but in the French priesthood, who is also an intimate friend, has taken care that it shall not pass unchallenged. Writing from Munich on the 23rd of December to his "very dear Father," Gratry, the Père Hyacinthe proceeds, with a delicate gentleness and courtesy which add fresh force to his criticism, to gauge the moral and intellectual value of this brief and wholesale recantation. Not quite agreeing with the Archbishop's estimate of the matter, he observes pointedly that such collective letters as those recently published by his correspondent against the new dogma can hardly be disposed of by the mere statement that he "effaces" them, especially when coming from a writer who insisted but a year before that he "had received orders from God" to write as he did, and was prepared to suffer, if necessary, for the truth's

ake. Father Gratry had not simply asserted, but proved by a "demonstration as logical as it was eloquent," that the whole question of Papal infallibility was "gaugered by fraud," and had indignantly asked whether God needed such falsehood; and now "he writes in an easy, offhand style which both surprises and saddens," to say that he simply "effaces" what he wrote before. We do not wonder at Father Hyacinthe sorrowfully asking if "the truth and human souls are hereafter to be treated in this manner in the Church of Christ?" Before he can hope to effect anything by his recantation, Gratry must refute as well as retract his former arguments, and explain why—if such be indeed the fact—he has ceased to regard the Vatican Council as "an assembly without authority, because it was without liberty," and what tests he would now suggest to discriminate a sham Synod from a real one. Father Hyacinthe continues:—

If you admit the two pretended dogmas of the personal and separate infallibility of the Pope abque consensu Ecclesie, and of his universal episcopal jurisdiction, do not attempt to give them an interpretation which is opposed to the evident and natural meaning of the decrees, the only one, moreover, which is accepted and imposed by the Roman authority, but show to us how that meaning agrees with the facts of history which you have so learnedly established and discussed. Then, my dear Father, but only then, you will have "placed your conduct in harmony with your convictions," as the Archbishop of Paris has written to you, and you will have acquired "new authority to defend the rule of religion," which is at present so sadly compromised. For my own part, what I dread the most for it is not the outspoken and loyal rejection of the adversaries of revelation; it is the unconscious scepticism of those who place a false authority and a false unity above the truth. The first consolidates the sacred edifice by the very assaults which it makes upon it externally; but the other mines secretly within it, disturbing the foundation upon which it rests—sincerity of faith and integrity of conscience.

These last comments of Father Hyacintho will not unnaturally recall to memory another passage from a distinguished Roman Catholic writer, which may indeed have suggested them:—

Truly such a school of lies would cause the weak to lose their faith. It makes one giddy to see such masses of error built up on the foundation of ancient impostures, and their consequences maintained as if the impostures had not been unmasked. . . . Is it not time for men of honour, of sincerity, and of faith to look this scandal in the face, and drive from the temple no longer only the sellers, but the robbers and coiners of base coin, religious or moral? They are more guilty than the forger who, in France at this time, has been hanged over to justice for having forged and trafficked in false scientific documents. . . . It is because I understand, more clearly now than ever, why our admirable mother, the Holy Church of God, the mother of humanity, whose spirit is nothing else than the unity of all the just who have ever lived, at this day scarcely rules a twentieth part of the human race. The reason of the low progress is this: it is the secret and internal foe which stops our march, it is the school of error which I do denounce, and which is none other than those gates of hell which will vainly strive to prevail against the Church.

It would be difficult to denounce with sharper or more searching rebuke the "unconscious scepticism" of which Father Hyacinth complains. But the rebuke comes from the second of Father Giraty's Letters to the Archbishop of Malines.

How are we to account for this strange and sudden conversion? Certainly any reader who compares the Letters of 1870 and of 1871 will be tempted to exclaim Nemo fuit unquam sic impar- sibi. No doubt Father Gratry may plead, as it is reported that he does plead, that he has but followed a multitude to do evil; for, of all the bishops who voted at Rome in the minority, Strauss- mayor is now the solitary Abdiel. But then it has not generally been the way with bishops to hold out against despotic wrong. A student of Church history might at least have been expected to remember the ignominious collapse of the Catholic episcopate after the Council of Nice, when St. Jerome complains that the whole world ground to find itself Arian; and the Court of Rome is to the episcopate of the nineteenth century pretty much what the Court of Constantinople was to their predecessors of the fourth. They have given hostages to fortune, and find it more convenient to save their position than their conscience. It has been all along predicted that this would be the upshot, and the opportune removal of the one man among them of combined the wisdom of a statesman with the courage of a martyr left them free to follow the instincts of cowardice for fear. But that Father Gratry, who had a reputation for learning as well as for consistency, should join in the greater cry of "Sauve qui peut!" had not been anticipated. Yet under similar whom he once professed to venerate, was able to purchase a circumstances by the cruel kindness of his noble the ordered quiet old age by framing his lips to the grave is, "nothing aliboloth, he replied without hesitation, with a lie in my mouth," before me, and I will not descend into that the eloquent, "brouwer for his own credit it might be well-tailed in the V. ## PARIS AND THE LESSONS OF ADVERSITY.

Paris is still the Paris of the Empire. Impoverished as she is, she still finds the means for dissipation and frivolity. She has discarded decency, and seems bent on proving to Europe that the refinement and good taste on which she prided herself were only tinsel on the surface. She is holding her orgies in what should be the house of mourning. She has pitched the booths of her Vanity Fair on pavements scarcely cleansed from the blood of her citizens. The stalls are set as thickly along the Boulevards as ever they were, and the trade in étrennes goes forward more briskly than before. It appears as if the chosen seat of genteel comedy had lost all sense of the ludicrous. Does Paris believe life to be a vaudeville and crushing national calamities things to be trifled with or jested over? It is hard to see where even the most ingenious and light-hearted and vainglorious of peoples can find matter of mutual congratulation in the events of the past year, or the prospects of the coming one. Fancy an English or German family munching bonbons and exchanging jests on the day after a funeral, and while there is an execution in the house. A moralist might find something suggestive of the hollowness of things in France in those gaudy and costly cases which contain a franc's worth of unwholesome sweets. Still we can conceive that something might be said by a Parisian for keeping up the friendly fashion of étrennes. Abused as it has been, it is the French counterpart of the German Christmas-tree, and originated doubtless in kindly family feeling. There might be a false air of chivalrous spirit in struggling to be cheerful in memory of past happiness, in pinching upon straitened means in order to be generous. No such defence can be set up for the public amusements of the season. The masked balls at the Opera House are in full swing. Most people know what these are, by hearsay, if not by personal observation. The masked ball means the loosest of loose Paris celebrating its saturnalia, in a disguise that invites decency to join while giving indecency its wildest license; indecency of thought, speech, and all but act, we should say, for experience has taught the necessity of detailing a powerful force of police to quell any demonstrative obscenity. It means dancing beginning at midnight after long dinners; suppers in the cabinets of the Maison Dorée and the Café Anglais; women in "costume," with as little character as clothes, shading off through the neutral classes of shopgirls, actresses, dansesuses, and dames de comptoir, to ladies of society ensconced snugly in their masks and dominoes. These masks and dominoes give absolute immunity from the whispers of the world, even were the world more inclined to censure than it is. The fair wearers may rub their draped shoulders with the naked ones of the most brazen-tongued of the lost sisterhood, and listen freely to shameless talk. It is easy to conceive the facility which these balls give for assignations in a city where married women are frequently as much their own mistresses as fascinating young girls in business. One might fancy that the censorship which busies itself with the politics of the drama might profitably turn its attention to the morals of these forcing-houses for female innocence. The masked ball exhibits the dignity of Frenchmen in quite as striking a light as the delicacy of Frenchwomen. The grand nation that blazoned the walls of Versailles with its victories, reared the Arch of Triumph, and cast the column of the Place Vendôme, has just been capitulating by hundreds of thousands, their arms in their hands. Here they are, fresh from the Caudine Forks, capering, shrieking, and grimacing as clowns, Pierrots, and monkeys. Not that they have forgotten the war. On the contrary, with their felicitous sense of the fitness of things, they have made the taking of each other prisoner and the spoils of the victor the standing jokes of the season. Nor are the ladies altogether oblivious of the dead; if they wear but the lowest of corsets and the briefest of skirts, they have their minimum of raiment suitably trimmed with black and silver grey. We cannot say that we admire the taste of dancing the caneon on a coffin-lid, nor are we sure that we do not prefer the pétroleuses of the Commune to the Bacchantes of the Carnival. But then we are not French, and we suppose we must take French patriotism as we find it. The same spirit of cynical indifference reigns supreme at the theatres and the cafés chantants. The Théâtre Français and the Odéon have never had quite the vogue which their admirable acting, their State subventions, and the masterpieces of Molière and Corneille should secure them. Still one might have believed that their turn must have come in the grave circumstances of the hour, and that Molière's comedies might have been light enough for the taste of the desolated city. On the contrary, all the different managements are constantly ransacking their répertoires for frivolities and indelicacies to rival the Palais Royal and the Bouffes. We are the less surprised when we remember the delighted crowds that filled the latter house on the morrow of the evacuation of Paris by the Germans. Yet let us be just. One change the war has wrought in the Parisians, and we have referred to it already. The most sensitive of people has suddenly become the most thick-skinned. We should have imagined that for many a year to come, prisons and prisoners would be sore subjects with French soldiers; that the sight of a Prussian helmet would act like a red rag on a bull. We are informed that the most popular caricature in Paris is a group of German soldiers acting wild beasts behind the rails of the Tuileries gardens, while a single Frenchman stands sentry over them. As for the German in blue tunic and spiked helmet, when he is not walking away with clocks, he is pressed into carrying bonbons. On the whole, it is not clear what the Parisians have gained by getting rid of the Emperor, or what they would lose by having him back to-morrow.

MR. SPURGEON ABROAD.

HERE we are again! The genuine original-comic Christmas entertainment for this night only at the Tabernacle, Newington. The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon will undertake, as usual, the part of Harlequin, while the Pope of Rome will do involuntary duty as Pantaloon. Managers of other Transpontine houses may thank themselves that this formidable competitor appears only for one or at most two nights. We should fear that the best pantomime in London would fail dismally if it depended only upon speech and action unaided by one or more gorgeous transformation scenes. But although Mr. Spurgeon promised to illustrate his lecture by dissolving views, the interest of the lecture was so absorbing that the audience would probably not have missed the illustrations if they had been forgotten by the lecturer. They desired to see Mr. Spurgeon and hear him talk. He has been on a holiday trip to Rome, and he was certain to crack some of his most racy jokes over the superstitious practices which he witnessed there. The preliminaries of the lecture were soon transacted. "Take care of your pockets," says Mr. Spurgeon, "and let us sing a hymn." Of course Mr. Spurgeon could not prevent the literal fulfilment of the text, "My house shall be called the house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves." Where the prey is there will be the vultures; and people who place cheques for 200*l.* at the disposal of a beloved pastor must inspire pickpockets with a feeling like that of the veteran Blucher when he beheld the wealth of London, and thought of the fierce and hungry soldiers whom he had led through France. But we cannot help wondering whether Mr. Spurgeon noticed in his tour that the presence of those that sell and buy in foreign cathedrals is a point in which they resemble the Tabernacle which he left at home. A reporter of a daily newspaper calculates that the profits of this entertainment must have been immense, for, besides the admission money, "all legitimate means of increasing the fund had been devised and cleverly carried into practice." The tea, although unlimited in quantity, as well as in accompanying supplies of cake and bread and butter, must have yielded, says this reporter, "a handsome commercial return." The sale of a poem written for the occasion, and offering a welcome home to Mr. Spurgeon, must have added something to the receipts, and besides, there were collections in boxes throughout the building. It is curious that a feature of Continental churches which we have always thought particularly disagreeable should be produced with improvements at the Tabernacle. Many readers have doubtless witnessed the noonday performance of the Strasburg clock, and may remember the keen, business-like manner of the verger who lets chairs for halfpence to visitors who desire to secure good places for the spectacle without the fatigue of standing. Just try to help yourself to a chair, and see how quickly the verger will discover and pursue you. This we had thought a tolerably strong example of the practices which the text condemns, because the performance of the clock cannot be considered as a religious service, although the twelve apostles take part in it; but it is nothing compared to the banquet of tea and cake and the lectures and dissolving views at the great annual festival conducted by Mr. Spurgeon.

As might be expected, Mr. Spurgeon was tremendously funny upon relics. Perhaps our own feeling in that respect does not differ widely from Mr. Spurgeon's, but we should not think of expressing it as he does. In Roman Catholic churches we see the reverential sentiment carried to an unwholesome, and it may be ludicrous, extent; and at the Tabernacle, if we went there, we should perceive that the same sentiment was in lamentable deficiency. Mr. Spurgeon is very severe upon the degraded superstition which causes people to kiss the foot of St. Peter's statue at Rome, and it probably does not occur to him that the ladies who work slippers for his own feet would kiss them if they had the chance. The Roman form of idolatry has this advantage, that St. Peter's statue will last for many generations, while Mr. Spurgeon is certainly mortal. The Church of Rome may boast with some show of reason that she is founded upon a rock, while the cohesion of the worshippers of the Tabernacle depends upon the personal qualities of their minister. It is difficult to understand how a Christian can speak of any form of Christianity as Mr. Spurgeon speaks of Roman Catholic doctrines and practices. And yet we felt certain before reading any report of Mr. Spurgeon's lecture that he would be overwhelmingly facetious about images. It would be a curious experiment to take an Italian priest of good power of observation and description to the Tabernacle, and set him to write an account of what he saw and heard there. Mr. Spurgeon at Rome wondered how humanity could have fallen so low as to worship relics. An Italian priest at Newington might wonder how Divinity could have fallen so low as to dwell in the same place with purveyors of tea and cake and exhibitions of dissolving views. We should think that among all the unprepossessing British tourists who have afflicted the Continent with their presence during the last year, Mr. Spurgeon would bear away the palm. "The only relic he had brought away from Rome was the piece of wax candle he had used in the catacombs." This statement was of course provocative of laughter. The mirth, however, has not been wholly on one side. Mr. Spurgeon preached in Rome, and, according to his own account, "he was said to have said and done some very strange things." We believe that since Mr. Spurgeon took to lecturing he has for the most part reserved for week-days the drolleries which used to ornament his Sunday sermons; but still he sometimes falls into the old vein, and if he happened to be in good temper and spirits, as he probably was, at Rome, we have no doubt that he did say and do some things that would have appeared to us, who are used to him, very strange, and which by Italians, if they could have understood them, would have been accepted as symptoms of disordered mind. Mr. Spurgeon described the services he held in Rome, and the interruption of one of them by a secular priest, "who declined, however, to enter upon a public discussion." We do not know what may have been the secular priest's motive for thus declining. Perhaps he may have laboured under a difficulty of understanding Mr. Spurgeon, or of making Mr. Spurgeon understand him. We can only express our profound regret that any impediment should have existed to a performance which must have been even more amusing than a lecture by Mr. Spurgeon at the Tabernacle. The friends and admirers of Mr. Spurgeon would probably have taken care that he should not visit Rome before the Pope's temporal power was abolished. Mr. Spurgeon's rule seems to be, "When you are at Rome do as you do at home," and we cannot help fancying that even the presence of the troops of the King of Italy in that city does not free this rule from all danger in application. But probably almost nobody understood Mr. Spurgeon's testimony against idols and relics, and people in general must have regarded him as a new variety of the race of harmless British lunatics who annually squander their money on the Continent.

The success of this annual lecture by Mr. Spurgeon is a curious phenomenon. The late Mr. Thackeray gave lectures, and they were successful because many people were willing to pay for seeing and hearing a celebrated man. But the admirers of Mr. Spurgeon have built a Tabernacle for the purpose of seeing and hearing him every Sunday, and it is big enough to receive all the casuals who come to "do" Mr. Spurgeon as one of the curiosities of the metropolis. Probably there would be an equally full attendance whatever might be the subject of Mr. Spurgeon's lecture, but we must suppose that his proper flock felt interested in the particulars of their pastor's journey, and they doubtless anticipated—if we may put holy thoughts into profane language—that Mr. Spurgeon would have a shy at the Pope. We feel as outsiders only a feeble interest in the statement that Mr. Spurgeon was hurried over his dinner at Dijon, and endeavoured at Lyons to perform the operation which is called keeping the fire warm. Probably many of us in vacation tours have written such particulars in letters or journals which we knew would be read with interest by wife, sister, or daughter. But it is a different thing to stand up, and narrate them before seven thousand people. However this large assembly heard the story of Mr. Spurgeon's journey with attentive ears. At Nice he was troubled with mosquitoes, which he calls "natty little creatures." The pun is bad enough for a burlesque. At this point we pause to inquire where were the dissolving views? A good likeness of Mr. Spurgeon, eating his dinner in a hurry, to save the train at Dijon, or combating in his bedroom with the mosquitoes at Nice, would have been almost equal in excitement to the famous contest between the devil and the baker which used to adorn the slides of magic-lanterns in our youthful days. It is a pity that Mr. Spurgeon could not have visited the Pope, and still more that he should not have been photographed. But the Pope now lives in strict seclusion. It does not appear to have occurred either to lecturers or hearers to consider seriously the nature of that power which enabled Mr. Spurgeon's influence over his people to be so great as the Tabernacle to the Coliseum. The temporal power of the Pope has passed away;

but if his spiritual power loses in one direction, it gains at least equally in another. Mr. Spurgeon's sneers about the Virgin Mary's milk please himself and the narrow-minded people who delight to hear him talk. But the mind which dwells most on the gross and fraudulent absurdities of the Romish Church ought to be most strongly impressed with amazement at the width and depth of its influence over mankind. We think that Mr. Spurgeon is a wonderful man, but the Pope is an institution, and incomparably more wonderful.

THE OLD MASTERS AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

THIS, the third year given by the Academy to historic schools, scarcely as yet indicates exhausted resources. That fewer rooms are occupied this season than last, and that 150 fewer pictures are collected, may be accounted an act of mercy. Five galleries, comprising 274 works which range over a period of five centuries, will certainly be found to yield amply sufficient materials either for a casual visit or for sustained study. Still some exception may be taken to the selection made. There would seem, for example, to be little reason why the least successful of Reynolds's works, the portraits of George III. and Queen Charlotte, exhibited here as recently as 1870, should again be hung as signboards in the vestibule. Other properties of the Academy, thirteen in number, include some diploma works redeemed by genius, such as Hilton's "Ganymede" (36); but several, like "Jael and Sisera" (111), by Northcote, might with advantage have remained in the collars. The Academy, perhaps wisely in regard to its reputation, has never yet ventured to exhibit its collection of diploma pictures as a whole. This year, however, living Academicians come forward in the new character of collectors; as many as eight members of the body appear in the list of contributors, and though the works sent are with some few exceptions little remarkable, yet we think it tells well for our contemporary school when leading painters affectionately gather in their homes some memorial of deceased brethren, or some cherished heritage from olden times. Still, we think, there are signs of an effort to win through the Exhibition a reputation for unaccredited works. We may mention that the total number of contributors is 77, and the total number of artists represented 117. Among contributors of the largest number of works are Her Majesty, the Duke of Buccleuch, Mr. Thomas Baring, and Sir Richard Wallace; and among the painters most fully represented are Vandyke and Reynolds. The distinguishing characteristics of the present collection may be said to be—first, the prominence given to the English school; and, secondly, the presence, after long seclusion, of the Hertford pictures. The nation has recently had to thank Sir Richard Wallace for the donation of a masterwork of Terburg, and now the Academy is indebted to the same munificent benefactor for the loan of the "Rainbow Landscape," by Rubens, "Nolly O'Brien," by Reynolds, and other scarcely less famous works which, when last seen fourteen years ago among the Manchester Art Treasures, excited a popular furore. We cannot conclude these preliminary remarks without once more complaining of the uncritical character of the Catalogue. It may be gratefully acknowledged that never before has been given at so low a price such good paper, clear type, and handsome margins; but when historic or other information is sought, nothing more recondite can be found than "Guido Reni, called Guido." When we recall the Catalogues of even provincial Exhibitions, such as those of Manchester and Leeds, the sixpennyworth now before us would seem little to the credit of the Royal and chartered body to whom the art education of the nation is in some measure delegated.

The Italian masters are of less value than in previous years. Still, of the Florentine school are Filippino Lippi and Sandro Botticelli; of the Milanese, Leonardo and Luini; of the Roman, Raffaele; of the Bolognese, Guido and Annibale Carracci; and of the Venice school, usually strong in English collections, Titian, Piombo, Veronese, Tintoret, Palma Vecchio, and Paris Bordone. One of the choicest of Italian pictures, as may be naturally imagined, is "The Virgin and Infant Christ" (95), by Raffaele, contributed by the Duke of Aumale. The master's manner, in its transition from the spiritualism of the Umbrian and Florentine schools to the stronger and higher development of the Roman period, is almost too well known to need description. This small composition, one of the very many Madonnas and Holy Families painted by Raffaele—not less than fifty in number—is tender, delicate, and lovely in the extreme. The infant in its play on the mother's knee has a sportiveness with a symmetry of line which recalls the Colonna picture now in Berlin. The work, given in outline by Kugler, was in the Orleans Gallery; fortunately the gem has been once more acquired for the Orleans family. The picture probably dates between 1506 and 1508, and is therefore, as the types and the colours indicate, prior to the Gavagh Raffaele in the National Gallery. Just before this Orleans Madonna was painted, Raffaele and Leonardo da Vinci are supposed to have met in Florence; doubtless they talked often together of art; they found much in common; yet, judging from the sequel, they must have agreed to differ. The pictures here ascribed to Leonardo are, as usual, open to doubt. Certainly "The Virgin and Child" (117), according to the present tendency and temper of criticism, would be transferred from Leonardo to Luini; whereas the capital companion composition, "A Madonna and Child" (113), though assigned to Luini, has a severity better accordant with other masters. Yet, though beset with these historic doubts, we should be sorry to surrender faith in, or love for, that magic, and as it were mesmeric, "Portrait of a Young Man" (215), here ascribed to Leonardo. But when we recall the Beltraccio in the National Gallery, and still more the "Creator Mundi" by the same artist at Leigh Court, we seem to have the secret of this mystery-shadowed, eye-piercing portrait. The earnest steadfast outlook of this face, with its inward depths of consciousness, makes an impression not to be obliterated. The head once seen haunts the memory. In the presence of this work we cannot but feel the grandeur of which portraiture is capable. In execution the picture clearly belongs to the school of Lombardy; the manner became infectious, and, passing over the Alps, entered the studio of Dürer in Nuremberg. And yet sometimes we are tempted to think that the geographic distribution of styles was just the reverse; that Squarcione, Mantegna, Leonardo with the Vivarini in Venice, owed much of their pictorial manner, as did assuredly the Lombard architects, to the so-called Goths of Germany. Gallery No. V. contains pictures from Lombardy, Germany, and the Low Countries, which suggest interesting speculation as to the origin and consanguinity of early schools. There are noteworthy "figures" (242) in monochrome by Mantegna, a master of whom we always desire to see and to know something more. The painter tended to monochrome when not to repellent colour, as classicists habitually do; and here again the drapery is cast in the symmetric lines pertaining to classic art, the bearing is statuesque, and so the work becomes removed from common life, while even as to execution the surface suggests a fine keen chisel rather than a broad sweeping brush. Also for study of drapery, both as to disposition of lines and technical methods, "A Portrait" (270), by Botticelli, is instructive. These early painters were more indebted to classic art than is usually imagined; it might be shown that Fra Angelico and other ultra-spiritualists were in intimate relation, as regards harmony of line and symmetric proportion, with Greek and Roman sculpture. In this masterly piece of manipulation even the materials used are all but identical with the ancient tempera, and when we here observe the exquisite play of light pigment over a warm underground, we might almost call in question the advantage gained by the introduction of oils into Italy. It may be observed how much our English artists in the present day are going back to the old processes; the guiding principle of course should be to adapt the process to the exigencies of the subject in hand. People curious in these matters will do well to pass in these Galleries from picture to picture in order to compare tempera with oils, panels with canvas, to see the effect of varnish in the way of darkness or lustre, and generally to judge of how time, the destroyer, has dealt with the artist's creation. A perfect medium, which is and always has been a first desideratum, would transmit with gem-like transparency the painter's thought, so that for all time the pigment should remain, like the original conception, of the quality of pure crystal.

A collection of all schools such as the present usually suggests the conclusion that the Dutch are most correct in what has been called the grammar of art, that the Flemings and Old Germans (as witness here works by Van Eyck and Mabuse) are the most perfect as to the management of pigments, and that the Italians, having thoughts to express and an ideal to attain which soar beyond the reach of paints and panels, occasionally break down in the mere materialism of their art. The obvious exceptions to this broad generalization may now be passed by as but exceptions which prove the rule. We have not space further to enlarge on this matter, and yet it is difficult to resist the temptation of a work so suggestive of speculation as "The Adoration of the Virgin" (217), by Filippino Lippi. The Italian painters were impelled by an imagination which avowedly did violence to historic fact, and accordingly here the manger of Bethlehem might almost be mistaken for the ruins of Baalbek. We presume that Rio, Montalembert, and other critics of that school, broadly classifying artists into the sheep on the right hand and the goats on the left, would disallow to either of the Lippi a place among the former. And, looking to the adjuncts of this Nativity, to the ostentatious but inappropriate display of classic architecture, it is evident that at the end of the fifteenth century the rampant Renaissance had already set in. Filippino Lippi, who executed frescoes in the Brancacci Chapel, strongly imbued with dramatic genius, was, as may be judged from the example before us, a man of fire and passion. What impetuosity he throws into his composition, how the figures crowd onward and around in tumultuous rotund, so that the Madonna whom they come to adore seems to be actually endangered! The picture as a whole would appear to pretend to little more religious feeling than a Christmas pantomime, and yet as a piece of decorative work the colour reaches deep harmonies, the light is something more solemn than that of common day, and so, as generally happens when we are in the presence of the old masters, the mind is lifted out of the sphere of ordinary life. This picture is decidedly superior to that of the same subject in the National Gallery, and therefore we transfer to it the anecdote from Vasari which Mr. Wornum appropriates. The story is as follows:—

Filippino having painted a composition of small figures for his friend Piero del Pugliese, he executed it with such skill and care that, when another citizen expressed a wish to have a similar work, Filippino declined the commission, remarking that it was impossible to paint a second picture like it.

The Venetians come as chief exceptions to the seeming rule in art that high conceptions are joined to infirm physiques. The painters of Venice, excepting the Vivarini and one or two others, did not mortify the flesh; they were jubilant in joyful life, and accordingly the characters they paint have eaten and drunken, and are given to song and dance. In this festive spirit has Jacopo Palma painted the portraits of his "Three Daughters" (67), lyre in hand and singing. These famous beauties pass in an analogous composition in Dresden for the "Three Graces." Violante, who was her father's favourite, has a face known in almost every Gallery in Europe; she served as a model indiscriminately for Venus nude, or for St. Barbara and St. Catherine fully draped. The golden hair of which the three sisters were proud was got by bleaching in the sun; we may imagine these girls seated on the house-top, with the crowns cut out of their hats, burning under an Italian sky till their curls had drunk in the sunlight which still as it were shines on their heads in the picture before us. The operation could not have been particularly favourable to the intellect, if we may judge from these blooming damsels, so buxom in flesh but devoid of thought. The picture at once pronounces the master when in joyous mood he cast off all care about the Saints and the Church, and took holiday, as was the custom of Venetians, with musicians in the open sunny fields. The "music parties," not only of Palma, but of Giorgione and of Titian, are famous. The work before us is a mere wreck, and the companion picture which we examined a few weeks since in Dresden has also suffered much; but it is naturally hard to find a panel which has reached the patriarchal age of three hundred years that has escaped the cruel hand of time. How solemn old Palma could be, how near he sometimes was to the grandeur of Titian and the glow of Giorgione, whom he in fact sought to emulate, is well known to all frequenters of the Galleries of Dresden, Vienna, and Venice. A fair example of this kind, "The Virgin and Infant Saviour" (124), from Hampton Court, is noble in form and altogether lovely. The figures are seated by a column in the midst of a hill country; indeed, about Bergamo, the painter's birthplace, there is much undulating ground which recalls the hills round Bethlehem, Nazareth, and Jerusalem. Painters of the life of Christ living in Italy needed not to go to Palestine for landscape backgrounds.

The three great masters of Venice—Titian, Veronese, and Tintoret—make but a poor figure in the present Exhibition. "Diana and Actæon" (73) is apparently a late, and assuredly a feeble, work of the master, who lived to the age of ninety-nine, when he died of the plague. Blurred in touch and uncertain in hand, this picture is akin in execution to the last work of Titian now in the Academy of Venice. The assumed sketch of "La Gloria" (114), whether by Titian or not, is an interesting record of the great work which the painter in his will directed should be placed wherever his body rested. In violation of this injunction, the picture has been removed from the Escorial to Madrid. As the subject of the sketch and picture is unusual, we translate the description given in the Madrid Catalogue:—

The most Holy Trinity above, and near thereto the Virgin. On the right are Charles I. and Philip II., with princes and princesses of the house of Austria in white raiment. All are among the clouds, and severally they are introduced by angels, who assume the attitude of adoration rather than that of conferring favours. On the left are many holy Patriarchs and Evangelists of the New and Old Testament, and in the midst the Church, figured by a maiden, presents the company to the Holy Trinity.

In conclusion, we may point to a magnificent "Study of a Head" (116), by an unknown master of the Venetian school. One almost fancies that the picture might have been painted by the lender himself, Mr. Watte, R.A., who has so successfully emulated Venetian colour and texture. At all events, this fine "study" gains additional interest as affording ocular demonstration of how closely its owner has moulded and meliorated his manner after Venetian models and methods. With this one exception we can scarcely trace even the most distant relation between our modern art and the historic works here assembled. We heartily thank the Academy for this noble collection, yet, as to the Academicians themselves, they almost appear in relation to these historic schools to be pretty much in the position of the Roman painter who confessed to Reynolds that he had not entered the Vatican for many years.

OLD AND NEW BURLESQUE.

A PANTOMIME upon the story of Tom Thumb naturally directs attention to the burlesque upon the same subject which was written by Fielding to ridicule the pompous rhyming tragedies of his time. This burlesque, which could not be adapted for performance on the modern stage, may nevertheless be usefully examined as one of the most popular and successful works of a period much more fertile in dramatic genius than our own. The name of Queen Dollalolla, and her song, "What though I now am half-sea o'er," have been heard by many who know no more of Fielding's work. We may remark that the Queen's name has been borrowed by the author of the pantomime at Drury Lane Theatre; but her song, and indeed the rest of the play, would have been unsuitable for his purpose. We do not of course know what Fielding may have had before him when he wrote, and it would be rash to say that any dramatic composition of any age is original; but we can hardly be mistaken in supposing that King Arthur and Queen Dollalolla have been the parents of a long succession of potentates of burlesque. The comic effect of the scenes in which they figure may be easily tested by reading them with due exclusion to an intelligent audience without the help of dress, scenery, music, or dancing, to which so many modern burlesques are indebted for their success. The piece opens with a duet between Doodle and Noodle, which explains that King Arthur's Court is holding festival in honour of Tom Thumb's victory over the giants. The scene proceeds:—

DOON. Yes, Noodle, yes:—to-day the mighty Thumb Returns triumphant. Captive giants swarm
Like bees behind his car.

[Flourish of trumpets.

NOOD. But hark! those trumpets
Speak the King at levee. I go.

DOON. And I also to offer my petition.

NOOD. Doodle, do.

[Enter Doodle and Noodle.

(Trumpets.) Enter King Arthur, Queen, Lord Grizzle, Courtiers, Doodle and Noodle, and attendants in procession. They take their state.

KING. Let no face but a face of joy be seen!
The man who this day frowns shall lose his head,
That he may have no face to frown withal—
Smile, Dollalolla!

DOON. (knocking). Dread liege, this petition—

KING. (dishees it away). Petition me no petitions, sir, to-day—

To-day it is our pleasure to be drunk,

And this, our Queen, shall be as drunk as we.

QUEEN. Is't so? Why, then, perdition catch the fallers;

Let's have a rouse and get as drunk as tailors

Air.

QUEEN.

What though I now am half-sea o'er,

I scorn to baulk this bout.

The author, while ridiculing the tragedy of his own or nearly preceding times, did not scruple to make a sly hit here and there at Shakespeare. The stilted sentiment and grand roll of the lines in some of the speeches are an inexhaustible source of amusement to any one who remembers, and perhaps with all their faults admires, Dryden's tragedies. The speeches in these tragedies were meant to be spoken ore rotundo, and even Drury Lane Theatre, as it now stands, would not be too large for the delivery of them by properly instructed actors. The following passage is only a moderate caricature of the tragic style, and it deserves to be compared with the best of a series of portraits of statesmen and other celebrities of the present time in which the slight and delicate touch of a skillful hand imparts a grotesque aspect to an undeniably truthful delineation. The heroic Tom Thumb has now marched triumphantly into the royal presence, while in his train follows the chained Queen Glumdalca, whom he has made prisoner in a decisive battle with the giants.

KING (looking fondly at Glumdalca). I feel a sudden pain across my breast—

(Aside) Nor know I whether it proceeds from love
On the wind cholic. Hugs our Queen of Hearts,
Sure thou wert made by all the Gods in council;
Who, having made a lucky hit beyond their journey-work,
Cried out, "This is a woman!"

GLUM. Then were the gods confoundably mistaken—

We are a glumless. I tell thee, Arthur,
But yesterday we were both Queen and wife;
One hundred thousand giants owned our away,
Twenty whereof were wedded to myself.

QUEEN (aside). Oh, bless'd prerogative of gianting!

KING. Be cheer'd, vast princess. Think our Court thy own;

Call for what'er thou lik'st—there's naught to pay.

Nor art thou captive; but thy captive we.

[Takes off her chain.

QUEEN (aside). Ha! Arthur faithless!

This hag my rival, too, in dear Tom Thumb!

Revenge! But I'll dissemble—

[Crosses to Glum.

Madam, believe that with a woman's eye

I view your loss; take comfort; for to-morrow

Our grenadiers shall be called out; then choose

As many husbands as you think you'll want.

GLUM. Madam, I rest your much obliged servant.

[Exit with Guards.

Any actors who could speak plainly would render this passage amusing, and at the same time the highest talent for burlesque acting would find ample scope in it. A modern manager would properly scruple at performing it in England, although in America there are some ladies of advanced opinion who would not be shocked at Queen Glumdalca's sorrow over several husbands killed in the same battle, and even among ourselves something has been published about "female polygamy"; but of course this was written with a serious didactic purpose, and not for transient amusement at a theatre. But setting aside the coarseness of the idea, there is admirable spirit and freedom in the lines. The sound pleases irrespective of the sense, and herein they resemble many hundreds of lines of Dryden's tragedies. We will give one more extract, which is perhaps even a happier effort of the same kind. It belongs, indeed, to a style of burlesque which is wasted upon any but an educated and attentive audience. King Arthur is about to stab himself, and lie down last of a row of bodies which extends from one side to the other of the stage. Before striking the fatal blow he speaks as follows:—

Death takes a feast to day,
And but reserves ourselves for his bun-bonche (sic);
So when the boy, whom name from danger guards,
Sends Jack for mustard with a pack of cards,
Kings, queens, and knaves tip one another down,
Till the whole pack lies scatter'd and o'erthrown;
Thus all our pack upon the floor is cast,
And my sole boast is, that I fall the last.

In the mock heroic style this passage would be hard to beat. The distinction between the pathetic and the ludicrous has seldom been more finely drawn. But some acquaintance with tragic and epic poetry is required to see the point of it, and it would be almost thrown away upon an average audience at a modern theatre. We will only add that King Arthur and Queen Dollalolla, and the lords and ladies of their Court, are all brought to life again by the wand of the enchanter Merlin, who at the same time compels the red cow to disgorge Tom Thumb.

We have made these quotations from the "acting edition" of Fielding's Tom Thumb, as altered by O'Hara. The alterations were probably supposed to have adapted the work for representation at the time when they were made, but it could not be represented now without such excisions as would seriously reduce its body and destroy its spirit. It consists only of one act, and even in this short compass we could find many passages besides those quoted which are models of witty and vigorous composition. The piece offers the strongest possible contrast to those recent burlesques in which sumptuous accessories are supposed to disguise the essential poverty of the work. It would be absurd, however, to demand Fielding's genius in the ordinary playwright, and we would rather point to a modern author who has shown himself capable of work of higher quality than that which his contemporaries produce in unbounded quantity. The Gaiety Theatre has this winter justified its name by producing a burlesque at which young and old, careless and critical, may laugh together. We are not sure that Mr. Gilbert may not have written as well before, but he has not, we think, been equally fortunate in finding interpreters of his words. The idea of Thespis; or, the Gods Grow Old, is that the deities of Olympus, becoming with advancing years weary of their work, take twelve months' holiday, and appoint as deputies in their absence Thespis and other members of a theatrical company who have come up Olympus for a picnic. Here is an excellent basis laid for every kind of drollery, but it is only available on the supposition that the audience has some slight knowledge of classical mythology. It would not perhaps go far with earnest-minded reformers of education if we urged that boys who have wasted time at school over Latin and Greek are enabled as men to waste time at theatres over burlesques. But to show how much the modern stage would lose by neglect of ancient literature, we need only refer to this amusing burlesque of Thespis, and to the French opera of La belle Hélène. Let us hope that, in spite of utilitarianism, boys may long be so taught as to be able when they are grown up either to compose or enjoy such works. It will be a dull time when people are unable to laugh at Jupiter's complaint in this burlesque, that the influence of the gods on earth is failing, and that the sacrifices have positively dwindled down to preserved Australian meat. Jupiter, unlike some earthly potentates, is too wise to close his ears against unpleasant truths. Thespis and his company, being unquestionably trespassers upon Olympus, there is a pleasant humour in the warning which Thespis gives to the gods that this is a private mountain, from which he requests them to withdraw. Jupiter, preserving his temper under this insult, tells Thespis that he is the very man he wants. "Now," says he, "as a judge of what the public likes, are you impressed with my appearance as the father of the gods?" We need not say that Mr. Toole acts Thespis admirably. His performance is not only funny in itself, but the notion of placing Mr. Toole, the very embodiment of everyday English and, we might say, cockney character, in confidential intercourse with Jupiter is a joke in itself, irrespectively of what he says and how he says it. Thespis expresses his opinion with a frankness for which kings, either of Gods or men, ought to be, but very seldom are, grateful. "The fact is," says he, "you are not the Gods you were. You're behind your age." He recommends the Gods to go down to earth, mingle with the world, hear and see what people think of them, and judge for themselves as to the best means of restoring their influence. This advice of Thespis to Jupiter might be useful to Mr. Gladstone at the beginning of a long vacation. It may deserve notice also that Thespis did not advise Jupiter to go about the country making speeches to prove that the administration of affairs by himself and colleagues had been, in spite of factious opposition, completely and invariably successful; and that, if one department had been more successful than another, it had been either that of naval and military or of domestic management, and his only doubt was to which of these two departments to award the prize for superior excellence. Jupiter, under the advice of Thespis, preserved a discreet silence as to the past, while endeavouring to learn how to govern better in the future. Other rulers, perhaps, have not received such prudent counsel, or have not been willing to accept it. Thespis offers himself and his company to fill the places of the Gods during their absence, and he assures Jupiter that actors never fail, but have always great successes "in the bills." Thespis appears to belong to that class of persons who are more prudent in speech than in action. He gives excellent advice to Jupiter, and he narrates, as a warning for himself, "the story of the gentleman who undermined his influence by associating with his inferiors." We are quite sure that when Mr. Toole sings the lines—

These are the consequences all proceeding
From his affable ways and his easy breeding, he intends to make no allusion to public dissatisfaction caused by the intercourse of the Premier with Mr. Finlan, or by his civil mention of Mr. Bradlaugh's poetry. If there be a distant resemblance between the character of Mr. Gladstone and that of the Chairman of Directors of the West Middlesex Junction Railway, who "sang little songs to the engine-drivers," we are quite sure that it is entirely accidental; and we are perfectly satisfied that no prediction concerning the Ministry is implied in the statement referring the career of this eccentric Chairman, that "the general public did not like it," and that the train conveying him and his Board was finally shunted on a lonely siding. But although we cannot discover political satire in Mr. Toole's song, one or two of the passages of this burlesque are certainly suggestive. Thespis and his company, being established as Gods upon Olympus for a year, have certainly not done the ordinary work of governing the world, but they have availed themselves of their position to try a series of hazardous experiments upon the order of things which they were appointed to preserve. Bacchus, having been persuaded to take the pledge, contrives that the grapes of Mitylene shall yield only what Mr. Bruce would call "an innocuous beverage"—namely, ginger-beer. We cannot help thinking that there is here a covert allusion to the Home Secretary's flirtation with the Alliance. A complaint is brought to Olympus that in Athens there has been a wet Friday in November for the last six months; to which Thespis answers, that the Athenians shall have a hot Tuesday in July for the next twelve months. The irrelevancy, as we venture to call it, of this response might easily be paralleled in the House of Commons, when Ministers are questioned upon some inconvenient subject, as, for example, the loss of the Megara. We happen to remember that, when it was reported that this ship had a hole in her bottom, Mr. Gladstone remarked, that the weakness discovered before the ship sailed was in her side. We are far from suggesting that Mr. Toole, in disposing of complaints against his government, has any mental reference to Mr. Gladstone; but we certainly think that Mr. Gladstone, in difficulties which we venture to regard as similar, might usefully imitate Mr. Toole's method of encountering them. In plausible justification of his own and his colleagues' blunders Thespis presents a strong likeness, which we can hardly regard as accidental, to the Premier. At any rate, Mercury, seeking a strong expression for his opinion of the rulers of Olympus during the last year, does not scruple to compare them to an English Ministry:—

From Jupiter downwards there isn't a dab in it,
A Premier in Downing Street forming a Cabinet
Couldn't find people less fit for their work.

Thespis might have found it convenient to assure the Athenians complacently that the whole subject of wet Fridays in November was under the consideration of his legal advisers, by whose assistance he hoped to frame a comprehensive measure for regulating rainfall.

This work has a large share of the same quality which so conspicuously belongs to Fielding's masterpiece in burlesque. The scenes from which we have quoted have an inherent drollery which is felt even in a bare description. They are also excellently adapted for every kind of laughter-moving accompaniment. We have preferred to speak of the literary merit of the piece, because that is in the present day most rare, but it has much merit of many kinds.

BLACKIE'S AND LEVIN'S LECTURES ON PHILOSOPHY.*

THE system of public lecturing has attained such large proportions—and it is evidently on the increase—that much of what is now printed as literature has been originally delivered in the shape of lecture. This must certainly be reckoned among the causes which tend to lower the level of publications in this country. For the object and purpose of the printed book, is, or should be, different from the object of the speaker's lecture. When a person volunteers a book on any matter, he is bound by his title to exhaust the subject; or, if not to exhaust, at least to survey the whole of it. It must be presumed that he is acquainted with it in its whole extent. But he who offers a lecture on the same subject may select what part he pleases. Nay, he must select. For he is limited in two ways; by time, and by the knowledge possessed by his audience. In a word, a lecture must be elementary and popular. Consequently, books made up of such lectures are necessarily elementary, and are precluded from dealing profoundly with their theme.

There can be no great harm in this. At some time in his life every one must be a beginner. And there must be books, as well as lectures, for beginners. But whatever may be the effect upon the public taste of being flooded with well-written lectures upon all possible subjects, it is but fair that the critic should take note of the distinction, and not review a lecture as if it were a book. It would be very hard to make any individual writer answerable for the defects of an established custom. If Professor Blackie * Four Phases of Morals—Socrates, Aristotle, Christianity, Utilitarianism. By John Stuart Blackie, Professor of Greek in the University of Edinburgh. Edinburgh: Edmonstone & Douglas. 1871.

Six Lectures Introductory to the Philosophical Writings of Cicero, with some Explanatory Notes on the Subject-matter of the Academics and De Finibus. By T. W. Levin, M.A., St. Catherine's College, Intermediate Lecturer on Logic and Moral Philosophy. Cambridge: Deighton, Bell & Co. 1871.

had announced a book on any one of the four subjects treated in the present volume, we should have had a right to complain if he had said no more than he has here said. But if a lecturer is superficial, we must recollect, when the lecture comes before us in print, that he was stooping to attract and entertain an audience. Professor Blackie has been long enough before the world for every one to know that he could, if he liked, speak to the learned. When he descends from the heights of science to address a word to the unlearned, it would be very unfair to turn upon him, and to say, "You have omitted this," or "You should have said that." We must take this book, not as a book, but as a lecture. It is not what Professor Blackie could say about Socrates and Aristotle if he chose, but what his hearers could take in.

It is impossible for Professor Blackie to speak on any subject without saying something witty and worth remembering. If indeed we had to take seriously his handling of the subject of his second lecture—Aristotle—we should find ourselves obliged to dissent from most of what is here said. But, taken as an hour's conversation to a miscellaneous assembly of persons of all ages, it sparkles with racy observations. How good, for example, is the following:—

Of all commodities in the world, the most difficult to deal with is truth. If indeed all men went about the streets, like Socrates, in search of truth, and thanking everybody frantically for any contribution to his stock of it, truthfulness would be an easy virtue. But we all know it is not so. Truth is an article to which, except in so far as particular truths may happen to prop up their prejudices, to flatter their vanity, and to inflate their conceit, many persons have serious objections. To fling it in their face is to insult them; to put it down their throat, even with a silver spoon and sugar-candy, a difficult operation. Hence, in the conduct of life, the great importance of not speaking too much truth, lest we frighten people, and not speaking too little, lest we learn altogether to live upon lies. In mixed society, on account of the extreme sensitiveness of all sorts of vain and self-important persons, the rule is generally adopted of speaking as little truth as possible.—P. 199.

This is very telling irony, though it may perhaps be objected that it is scarcely fair to have inscribed it "Aristotle." The following observation is not ironical:—

I do not know whether I have not seen more sad mistakes made in life by persons who were rather depressed by too little, than elevated by too much, self-esteem. I have sometimes thought that the conceit so natural to young men is given to them by a gracious provision as a superfluity that is sure to be pruned off. The world is constantly employed in pulling down outrageous conceit. But when a poor fellow starts in the hot race of life afflicted with that disease which the Greeks called "difficult-facedness," that is, so modest as not to be able to look a fellow-being in the face, I must confess, though I have a kindly feeling towards a person so deficient which I never can have to the smart and pert self-conscious inanition, I feel that the defect of the one is a much greater misfortune, and a malady much more difficult to cure, than the excess of the other.—P. 202.

We must remember that these lectures were delivered in London, for we can scarcely suppose that an excess of modesty is a vice which Professor Blackie has often occasion to rebuke in his own University. Again, of the following no one will deny the general truth or force, but we may venture to question the apropos:—

Aristotle may be regarded as the great prototype of those modern Germans, who, like the mailed knights of the middle ages, stand up in our libraries cased in the invulnerable panoply of polyhistoric and encyclopædic erudition; and he gave birth to the curious sort of intellectual laborosity which, when divorced from his genius and his sagacity, produced those accumulations of written and printed record under which the shelves of so many libraries groan; by which also not a few strong intellects have been lost to the world, smothered beneath heaps of cumbrous babblements, in extent infinite, in value infinitesimal.—P. 171.

The temptation to over-estimate learning is scarcely one which most besets a Royal Institution audience. And a captious critic might object to "polyhistoric and encyclopædic erudition" being the peculiar failing of a German Professor. Aristotle wrote upon everything, and his works are an encyclopædia of science as it existed in his time. On the other hand, it is the characteristic of German learning that each man is a specialist, compensating his exhaustive knowledge of one thing by knowing nothing of anything else. The book of a German savant is as exactly the reverse of "encyclopædic" as anything can well be. Whatever may have been the case in the eighteenth century, "polyhistoric" is not an attribute which can now be applied to German learning.

Professor Blackie was very careful not to inflict Greek on his audience. Though compelled by his subject to use a Greek term occasionally, he has avoided doing so as much as lay in his power. Hence it is the more surprising that, on two occasions at least, he should have been betrayed into inaccuracy. Aristotle surely has not called, nor could he call, the "End" "architectonic" (p. 330). A science, an art, or any constructive process may, in Aristotelean nomenclature, be "architectonic," regard being had to those arts, sciences, or processes which it comprehends and directs. An "end" can be said to be ultimate or final, but not "architectonic." Ἀρχιτεκτονικὸν τίλες must be a solecism, even were the phrase found in Aristotle himself. Ἀνδρείας, again, is a good Greek word, but assuredly it was not the name which the Greeks were in the habit of using to denote the virtue of courage. Down to the latest time the form consecrated by Plato—ἀνδρεία—continued to be the usual form in all books. And if in the debased ages it tended at all to give way as the word in common use, it was to ἀνδραγαθία, and not to ἀνδρείας.

Mr. Levin's book is likewise composed of lectures. Being College lectures, and therefore addressed to a special audience, they are able to go more closely into their subject than lectures at the Royal

Institution could do. We presume that Mr. Levin's lectures are among the first fruits of the recent determination of the Cambridge authorities that some regard shall henceforward be paid to the contents of the classics. It is well known that the grand difference between the classical systems of Oxford and Cambridge has been that, while at Oxford the chief attention has always been directed to the historical and philosophical substance of the Greek and Latin writers, at Cambridge, on the other hand, the language, or form, has been considered as the only valuable part of classical study. This distinction has all along stamped a corresponding distinction on the intellectual types produced respectively by the two Universities; a contrast which has been carried deep into character, and has not rested merely in a divergent direction of philological reading. Undoubtedly there are notable exceptions on both sides; as Cambridge can show Cudworth as an expert in the more recondite parts of ancient philosophy, Oxford can put forward Elmaley as an accomplished representative of the Porsonian school of criticism. Other such exceptions might easily be named, notwithstanding which the contrast remains as an easily recognisable fact. It remains to be seen if the new legislation of Cambridge, by which the Tripos examinations are to extend to the matter of the books, will really modify the traditions of the place. Meanwhile we may welcome Mr. Levin's lectures as an early attempt in the direction indicated.

Mr. Levin has taken for his subject the philosophical writings of Cicero. We may conjecture that what has determined his researches in this direction has been Madvig's magnificent edition of the De Finibus, of which the second issue appeared in 1869. Cicero has altogether been under a cloud lately, owing to the determined and systematic attempt to run him down in Mommsen's History of Rome. The contemporary of Bismarck and Moltke can see no merit that is not diplomatic or military, and reserves all his admiration for the heroes of the sword. Cicero, who was but a poor statesman, and who was compelled by the necessities of the time to take an ineffectual part in politics for which he had no aptitude, looks very small in a drama where the principal figures are bands of savage mercenaries and bloodthirsty gladiators. But when we turn from his insignificant public career to his glorious writings, it is impossible for a reader who possesses any sense of literary beauty not to feel the spell of that genius which heretofore enthralled the Renaissance. It seems indeed as if the neglect of the nineteenth century was a Nemesis for the deification of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Such neglect, however, can only be temporary. The injustice of Mommsen will of itself work a reaction.

Mr. Levin's lectures, however, do not depend for their value on any estimate of Cicero as a politician, nor even as a writer. They deal only with Cicero's philosophical writings. Of all the works of Cicero, his philosophical books have suffered most neglect—in some respects justly. Cicero himself was no philosopher. The most consummate rhetorician that ever lived, and wielding a most powerful logic, Cicero had no perception of metaphysics. He looked upon Plato with almost adoration; but it was for his wealth of language, his powers of description and irony, and the grandeur of his genius, not for his specially metaphysical disquisitions. It might seem that a man who wrote in Latin about Greek philosophy without having any insight into what philosophy was, cannot be worth much, and that what he wrote is not unreasonably treated with neglect. This indeed might be so, were we in possession of the writings of the Greek philosophers whom Cicero discusses. But unfortunately this is not the case. The whole of the enormous mass of philosophical literature produced by Greeks between B.C. 300 and Cicero's time has perished. Chrysippus alone is said to have put his name to more than seven hundred volumes. This wealth of reflection and experience was in Cicero's hands, and he thus becomes to us the representative—not indeed the sole, but the chief, representative—of a lost creation.

This being the case, it may be matter of surprise that Cicero's works have not attracted more attention as a storehouse of the history of Greek philosophy. Of this there have been two main causes. First, the interest taken by scholars in Greek philosophy at all has been concentrated first upon Aristotle and Plato, and next upon the pre-Socratic schools. The post-Aristotelean philosophy has had few cultivators. Its own unscientific character, and the fragmentary condition to which the accidents of time have reduced it, have left it in the shade. But, secondly, even those who have turned their attention in any degree to this period have made very imperfect use of Cicero as an authority. Of Stoicism, which is in some respects the most intelligible of the post-Aristotelean schools, there did not exist any tolerable sketch till the appearance of Zeller's fourth volume. And Zeller has made but a limited use of Cicero. Cicero was held to be an untrustworthy reporter of philosophical reflection. Where we have the power of checking him—as, e.g., in his references to Aristotle—we find him capable not only of gross inaccuracies, but of misunderstanding fundamental principles. We are much safer with Diogenes Laertius, who did not understand at all, than with Cicero, who misunderstands. The real truth is that, though Cicero was a diligent reader of philosophical books, he read them not for philosophy, but for style. When he began his career, he had no design of writing on philosophy. He looked wholly to the Forum and the Senate as the theatre for the display of the talent which he was so conscious of possessing. Misfortune, public and private, drove him to write on philosophy. He composed his treatises on this subject rapidly and without preparation. He mentions many names, and the books have the air of being derived from wide reading. But it now appears, on the close investigation to which they have been submitted by Madvig, that large sections of them are borrowed from some one Greek original. For instance, in the First Book of the De Finibus, in expounding the doctrines of Epicurus, Cicero is thought by Madvig to have closely followed one text-book of the Epicurean Phædrus, although his exposition professes to be gathered from the writings of Epicurus himself. In the Fourth and Fifth Books of the same treatise, which abound in references to lost writers, it is probable that Cicero was not himself compiling from the writers he names, but was closely following, if not translating, some one work of Antiochus of Ascalon. The three books of Moral Duties again may be referred in great measure to a treatise of the same name by Panætius.

The fact that Cicero was a mine of information respecting the post-Aristotelian schools had been vaguely apprehended by scholars, but, owing to the causes above assigned, no use had been made of this knowledge. Among others, Morel, and Davies, President of Queens' College, Cambridge, deserve commemoration for their attempts to cite resembling passages. But to heap together passages expressive of similar doctrine from writers of all ages is very far short of the task which Madvig proposes to an expounder of Cicero—namely, that of determining the original Greek text which the Latin imitator may be conjectured to have followed in each instance. Mr. Levin does not himself approach a task so arduous or so well worth the ambition of a scholar. He has in view his class and its requirements, and confines himself necessarily to such information as is required by a beginner. But such a beginning must lead active minds further, and we may express the hope that the ground broken by Madvig in his edition of the De Finibus will be successfully cultivated by Cambridge scholars, or by Mr. Levin himself. He seems not indisposed to approach the more difficult parts of his subject. For he appends an Excursus on the formula "Prima Nature," and another on the arrangement of the Third Book of the De Finibus, both translated from Madvig. Indeed Madvig's Latin, though not that imbroglia of meaningless sounds which we are familiar with as German Latin, is by no means a limpid vehicle of what he has to say. It needs an interpreter. But it should be in the form of a transference, not of a translation. It is an error to think that an involved sentence of Latin is made more intelligible by having the words it contains turned into English. Madvig has done excellent work upon Cicero, but his book is not a great book, from its defective expression. Still, it cannot be read without instruction, and the comfortable sense that we are in the hands of a master. If Mr. Levin's book succeeds in introducing Madvig's De Finibus to younger students, it will have done good service.

LONGFELLOW'S DIVINE TRAGEDY.*

THERE must have been a motive of some sort for every literary effort, though in our ordinary reading we do not often trouble ourselves to find it out. With the present work, however, it is a question that at once takes possession of the reader, superseding all others. What can have been Mr. Longfellow's motive in writing his Divine Tragedy? It is not likely to have been that motive which is unhandsonely called mercenary; and certainly he cannot have proposed to add to his fame by it. There is no attempt to develop hidden meanings, scarcely anything to be called a new view. No siren whisperings of rhyme or rhythm can have beguiled him, no lofty presumption to fill the silence of Scripture with divine speech and action. What then can have put him upon this extraordinary venture, resulting in so dire a failure? For we doubt if any man, not only calling himself, but called by the world, a poet, ever committed himself to the same degree in the matter of propriety, taste, and harmony, and all the craft of his art. We can only surmise the work to have been composed at the instigation and for the use of some amateur corps, who, having assisted as spectators at the great and every way admirable representation at Ammergau, are tired with a longing to imitate what is inimitable, and to enact a Passion Play before the Western world. There is every token of its being written, not for the closet, but for the stage. The eye of the poet, filled with a marvellous spectacle, entirely nullifies and dulls his ear, and whether or not it ever is to be or has been performed, the spirit of rivalry must have been the motive of the composition. The author could only guess its effect in representation; and here there is room for self-delusion. But he must know how it reads. Mr. Longfellow will probably say that he has been hampered by his reverence. It is essential to a Passion Play to represent Christ in bodily presence; but he shrinks from putting into the lips of the actor of such a part his own thoughts and words. Yet it must strike the reader that reverence is often only compatible with leaving things alone, and certainly is not compatible with taking language divine, wonderful, and admirable in its place, and rendering it mean and pretentious by putting it into the false garb of verse, and making it profess to be what it is not, raising expectations in the ear not to be fulfilled. Our Lord's words are generally broken up into the semblance of blank verse by the simple and of numeration, by counting syllables on the fingers, and when ten are numbered passing on to the next line, and beginning with a capital letter. This, with here and there a transposition or the introduction of an article or conjunction, is all that is necessary to change rhythmical prose into halting prosaic verse:—

Children! how hard it is for them that trust
In riches to enter into the kingdom of God;
'Tis easier for a camel to go through
A needle's eye, than for the rich to enter The kingdom of God.

Martha, Martha!
Careful and tempted about many things
Art thou, and yet one thing alone is needful.
Thy sister Mary hath chosen that good part
Which never shall be taken away from her.

Sometimes the exigencies of scanning suggest some apparently trifling departure from the text, the effect of which the poet is the last to detect:—

Thou gavest me no water for my feet,
But she has wash'd them with her tears, and wiped them
With her own hair.

In the utterances of the supreme actor in his drama Mr. Longfellow may adopt the boast of the Rabbi Simeon, as quoted by Gamaliel, who, whatever his other gifts, shows himself under our poet's treatment no hand at blank verse. This Rabbi

Boasted that his pen
Had written no word that he could call his own,
But wholly and always had been consecrated
To the transcribing of the Law and Prophets.

But Mr. Longfellow does not confine himself to blank verse. His blank verse, such as it is, is relieved by various lyrical effusions. The poem opens with a dialogue called an Introitus between the prophet Habakkuk and an angel who bears him through the air. The poet's cunning has deserted him as conspicuously here as in a less accustomed field, the angel's tone and style forcibly reminding the reader of the effusions of the spirit-world invoked by a medium. The prophet is being commended by the angel with surely a lavish encomium for a simple act of kindness:—

Lo! as I passed on my way
In the harvest-field I beheld thee,
When no man compelled thee,
Bearing with thine own hands
This food to the famished reapers,
A flock without keepers!
The fragrant sheaves of the wheat
Made the air above them sweet;
Sweeter and more divine
Was the scent of the scattered grain
That the reaper's hand let fall,
To be gathered again
By the hand of the gleaner!
Sweetest, divinest of all,
Was the humble deed of thine,
And the meekness of thy demeanour!

The original character in the drama is Manahem, an Essenian, introduced at first as accompanying our Lord and his mother to the marriage at Cana in Galilee; which is strange enough considering the absence of all mention of, or possible allusion to, the Essenes in the Gospel narrative. It is for this reason perhaps that he discourses wholly in long asides on this occasion; in fact his part is a standing soliloquy, sometimes in blank verse, sometimes in such rhymes as these:—

Is hurled into the abyss
Of the black precipice;

or making "yore" ring with "Peor." It is possible that his reverend, aged whiteness of aspect is introduced to contrast with the youthfulness which Mr. Longfellow, in disregard of convention and chronology, assigns to the principal figure:—

Who is that youth with the dark azure eyes?

asks the governor of the feast. Elsewhere, in terms not intentionally profane, but which sound so, being incompatible alike with reading one's Bible or with any acquaintance with the world's masterpieces of art, a Pharisee denominates him "a stripling without learning," while another notes that Never have I seen so young a man

Sit in the teacher's seat.

Having satisfied his scruples by adherence to the text in the case of one of his characters, Mr. Longfellow allows himself to feel at home with everybody else. There is a flatness and stupidity in the talk of his Pharisees truly extraordinary; not, indeed, that there might not easily be dull Pharisees; but this stupidity is an anachronism, a modern dulness. "Clearly something must we do," says one. "If," says another, "this Galilean

Would be content to stay in Galilee
And preach in country towns, I should not heed him;
But when he comes up to Jerusalem
Riding in triumph, as I am informed,
And drives the money-changers from the Temple,
That is another matter."

Especially does Mr. Longfellow do less than justice to Gamaliel, who is represented in the Temple listening to our Lord's utterances in the outer court, and making remarks alike discreditable to his taste, sense, and piety; and, moreover, so conscious of his own inability to do anything but rail as to exclaim at length:—

Oh, had I here my subtle dialecticism,
My little Saul of Tarsus, the tent-maker,
Whose wit is sharper than his needle's point,
He would delight to foil this noisy wrangler.

* The Divine Tragedy. By Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. London: Houlston & Sons.

Pilate, the Roman Governor, falls into the same vein of heavy prose, beginning his soliloquy thus:—

Wholly incomprehensible to me—

The Apostles are made to deliver themselves in a dialect as colloquial as these disputants and doubters:—

PHILIP. There is one man with him
I am amazed to see.

ANDREW. What man is that?

PHILIP. Judas Iacobi; he that cometh last Girt with a leathern apron.

Not less easy is the phraseology and tone of speculation of the Woman of Samaria:—

I wonder who those strangers were I met
Going into the city? Galileans
They seemed to me in speaking, when they asked
The short way to the market-place. Perhaps
They are fishermen from the lake; or travellers
Looking to find the inn. And here is some one Sitting beside the well; another stranger;
A Galilean also by his looks.
What can so many Jews be doing here Together in Samaria?

We suppose this is meant to let us see the poet's imagination realizing a situation. But either the disciples would bear the marks of their calling in garb and aspect, in which case she would not speculate whether they were fishermen, but would know them as such, or the question would not come into her mind; and if, as travellers, they wished to find the inn, why should they ask "the short way to the market-place"?

To add circumstance and detail to narrative which is sacred at once to taste and religious feeling is, we own, a difficult task. But nobody, we think, could well manage it worse, or could more effectually lower, we may say vulgarize, the scene than is done here. The Mother of Jesus announces in the Gospel, "They have no wine." The governor of the feast, under Mr. Longfellow's inspiration, makes a demand:—

Give us more wine. These goblets are all empty.

And Peter, discoursing to Andrew of the miraculous draught of fishes, amplifies in this strain:—

Never was such a marvellous draught of fishes Heard of in Galilee. The market-places
Both of Bethsaida and Capernaum
Are full of them.

Mr. Longfellow, we suppose, agrees with those critics who hold that there can be no perfect tragedy without some infusion of comedy; for positively he interpolates into the awful scene in the palace of Caiaphas a smart dialogue between the damsel who recognised Peter and a fellow-servant of the opposite sex:—

SERVANT, in the Vestibule. Why art thou up so late, my pretty damsel?

DAMEL. Why art thou up so early, pretty man?

It is not cock-crowing yet, and art thou stirring?

SERVANT. What brings thee here?

DAMEL. What brings the rest of you?

SERVANT. Come here and warm thy hands.

DAMEL to Peter. Art thou not also
One of this man's disciples?

PETER. I am not.

We have been profuse in our extracts, because only through them can any proper idea be given of this extraordinary performance—doubly extraordinary considering its author's popular reputation and practised hand. Mr. Longfellow has been successful in many fields—lyrics, translations, the melancholy Evangeline, and, lastly, Hiawatha—about which were such contrary opinions:—

Published cheaply at one shilling,
Published sweetly at five shillings.

We cannot congratulate him on any sort or degree of success here; and yet, if Passion Plays come into fashion, which it is likely enough they may do, as fools rush in where angels fear to tread, we do not doubt that his Divine Tragedy will stand in favourable and dignified comparison with most or all of them. It is therefore we have felt this an occasion for speaking our mind and withholding nothing of our testimony. What is morally and aesthetically admirable among the devout and simple peasants of the Bavarian Tyrol would, to say the very least, be painfully incongruous if transplanted to the ungenial soil of nineteenth-century town life.

MOLESWORTH'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND FROM 1830.*

IN the course of the last Reform agitation Mr. Molesworth published a useful and instructive History of the Act of 1832, which having also the advantage of being opportune, attracted a good deal of attention at the time, and was favourably received. This success has induced him to undertake a more ambitious task. He has now attempted to write a History of England during the forty years over which his memory ranges. As Mr. Molesworth had already given a sufficient account of the Reform Bill of 1832, it might have been supposed that he would now start, not from the point at which he began his former book, but from the point where he left off. Again, however, he reverts to 1830, and goes through the old story once more, at nearly the same length, and in almost the same words. For so doing he offers several reasons—that the Reform Act is the earliest public event which he recollects distinctly, that it made a great change in the Constitution, and that it was the beginning of other important changes. We suspect, however, that his principal reason for repeating the history was that it was already written, and could be incorporated in his new work without any trouble. In point of fact, he has composed the greater part of the present volume by simply running his pen through a few paragraphs of his former book, and reproducing it in this slightly abbreviated form. Of 536 pages, 286 are given up to a reprint of stale matter. There are, it seems to us, several objections to this course. In the first place, a history of the Reform Bill cannot be accepted as a history of England; and in the next place, there is an obvious and unreasonable disproportion between the amount of space allotted to the Reform agitation and to subsequent events. More than half the volume is occupied with the struggle of 1830-32, while the other five years, down to King William's death, are compressed into the remaining space. There is an old joke of a man who began a history of a parish pump by an inquiry into the creation of the world, and the prehistoric condition of its inhabitants. Mr. Molesworth's argument that it is impossible to understand the history of the five years after the passing of the Reform Bill without taking the history of the three previous years along with it, might be used to justify an indefinite extension of the narrative. It is certain that the condition of England during the great Continental war had a very direct and important influence on the subsequent agitation for Parliamentary Reform; and one must go back still further in order to understand the origin and meaning of the war. An appreciation of the continuity of history is very desirable, and we have no fault to find with Mr. Molesworth for asking his readers to remember that what happened in 1830-32 had a good deal to do with what happened in 1833-37 and in subsequent years. But it does not therefore follow that he was entitled to reprint an old book as part of a new one. It would have been enough for him to refer to his previous compilation, and to other works on the subject of the Reform Bill, and to state in general terms the effect of the changes which were made by that measure in the representation of the people and the relations of political parties. The encores of the concert-room have not yet been introduced into literature, and it is not usual for an author whose first work has been applauded to reproduce it bodily in his next publication. However convenient for authors, the practice would hardly be fair to the public. The advertisements of this book ought, we think, to convey a distinct intimation that the greater part of it is a mere reprint.

In passing off an old History of the Reform Bill as a new History of England, Mr. Molesworth does not deal fairly either with the public or with his subject. The Reform Bill of 1832 was a very serious business in more ways than one. It indicated the existence of a very dangerous and critical state of society, and it also exercised an important influence on the subsequent course of English policy and legislation. But while the great struggle was in progress the country was not altogether engrossed by it. Reform may have been uppermost in the minds of the people, but it did not exclude everything else from their thoughts. Even the House of Commons discussed other questions, and the Government did not absolutely withdraw from all relations with other Powers or ignore the existence of colonial dependencies. The Reform Bill of 1832 was not, as it has been called, a revolution, but only an incident in a revolution. In writing its history, it was natural and legitimate that Mr. Molesworth should make it the central object, and subordinate everything else to it; but in a general history of England, the story of a particular statute, however important and comprehensive its bearings may be, should be reduced to its proper place as one of a series of events. Mr. Molesworth has somewhat condensed the narrative, and professes to have revised it; but he reprints without the slightest modification his extravagant and highly sensational version of the interview of Lord Grey and Lord Brougham with the King on the 22nd of April, 1831. The present Lord Grey has published a distinct and positive contradiction of the story; but Mr. Molesworth is of opinion that "after the generous and honourable alacrity" with which Lord Brougham, who had in fact supplied him with the marvellous tale, came forward to vindicate its accuracy, he would be wanting in gratitude if he now suppressed the passage. Mr. Molesworth's readers are entitled to remind him that what they have a right to expect at his hands is not a monument of gratitude to an obliging nobleman, but an accurate and trustworthy history. It is significant that the story has been omitted from Lord Brougham's own Memoirs. Mr. Molesworth has, however, some other odd notions as to the best way of writing history. In the preface to his previous publication he mentions that he avoided reading the works of other writers who had gone over the same ground—as, for example, Mr. Roebuck's History of the Whigs—until he had finished his own narrative. Originality is not the most essential quality in historical compositions, and it is desirable that a writer should collect and consider all the information he can obtain before he hastens to draw his own conclusions on the subject. Mr. Molesworth's present volume would perhaps have been better if he had enlarged the scope of his reading.

Mr. Molesworth's account of the five years of King William's reign subsequent to the passing of the Reform Bill is little more than a précis—very carefully and accurately done—of Parliamentary history. The body of his narrative is derived from Hansard, and such glimpses of the outer world as he affords are merely the passing glances of a man who lifts his head for a moment from his desk to take a hurried look out of the window. He has given us a useful and interesting abridgment of the debates; but those who take up the book expecting anything else will, we fear, be disappointed. Beyond the limits of Parliamentary history such information as is furnished is vague and scrappy. It is hardly worth while to set up as an historian in order to tell people that the name of Scott is a household word, and that his works are to be found in every library, or that Coleridge's writings are "replete with profound thought and the loftiest eloquence." "We believe," adds the historian, with an odd affectation of having a bit of private and highly original information to communicate, "that Dr. Arnold, Keble, Pusey, T. Carlyle, Gladstone, the two Newmans, the two Froudes, Colenso, and the writers both of the Tracts for the Times and Essays and Reviews were all largely, though perhaps unconsciously, indebted to the seeds of thought which he (Coleridge), directly or indirectly, sowed in their minds"; which is only another way of saying that Coleridge exercised considerable influence as a thinker, and that the persons enumerated as subject to that influence were not beyond the reach of the philosophical currents of their time. Of the personal character of the political leaders we get hardly a hint; they are mere names, or, at the most, faint shadows. Yet, in order to understand the history of the period, it is at least as necessary to know what sort of men O'Connell, Peel, and Wellington were, as to know how the Reform Bill was passed. Some surprise that Lord Melbourne should have been chosen to succeed Lord Grey in 1834 was perhaps natural at the time, but this surprise is scarcely justifiable in an historian who has the advantage of knowing the qualities which Lord Melbourne afterwards displayed in office. After a page of wondering, Mr. Molesworth innocently winds up with the observation:—

The only explanation, as far as we know, that could be given of this appointment was that his strong good sense, firmness of purpose, suavity of manner, and thorough goodness of heart, recommended him to the King, to his colleagues, and to both sides of the House on which he sat, and enabled him to manage them better than a man of greater ability and a more unbending character could have done.

To most people this will seem a sufficient and satisfactory explanation. It would be difficult to conceive better reasons for the choice of a Prime Minister, though it is true that the description of Lord Melbourne is not exactly applicable to the head of the present Government. Perhaps Mr. Molesworth is of opinion that strong good sense and suavity of manner are defects which disqualify a statesman for the leadership of his party. On the whole, we can recommend this work as an interesting review of Parliamentary history; but we fear that Mr. Molesworth, in aspiring to be an historian in any other sense, has been tempted beyond his depth.

PALMER'S DESERT OF THE EXODUS.*

NOT very long since the Lord Almoner's Professorship of Arabic at Cambridge, to which the author of this most interesting work has just been appointed, was more of a sinecure than it is likely to be in his hands. When the first half of the present century was well advanced, this honourable, if not lucrative, post was occupied by an estimable gentleman, afterwards pushed on by politics and good luck to an archiepiscopal throne, among whose qualifications for the chair an extensive knowledge of the sacred language of the Mohammedans was hardly the most conspicuous. His chief duty for years had been the issuing of a printed notice every term, announcing public lectures to be given in his College rooms at stated days and hours; when two young humorists, fresh from their first degree, resolved to take this formal invitation in sober earnest. Knocking therefore at the Professor's door at the proper time, they found themselves brought face to face with a large party which he was entertaining at breakfast. Their errand briefly told, the host rose from the table with many apologies to his laughing guests, took the unexpected pupils into his library, and forthwith began to ransack his books for any Arabic work that might chance to come to hand. After a short and fruitless search, the happy thought occurred to him of questioning the lads whether they could read the alphabet of the language. On their reply in the affirmative, he next asked what they knew of the verbs, of which that tongue is furnished with a formidable array, regular and irregular, trilateral and quadrilateral, surd and defective. On their answer proving less satisfactory, the Professor told them, with much dignity of manner and as grave a countenance as he could assume, that University lectures were not for those who were ignorant of the elements; let them first master the grammar, and he would then take them through some easy Oriental story. The pair departed, feeling that they had scarcely come off best in this encounter of wits; the Professor returned to his breakfast party, cheerful and victorious.

Mr. Palmer's Arabic studies are of a somewhat different stamp. He has made a perfect mastery of that most copious of all existing languages thus far the chief business of his life, and is so much at home with its almost infinite dialectic varieties, that, clad in Eastern garb, he will mix with Bedawin of the Desert around their evening camp-fire, and, listening to their simple tales, will tell his own in his turn, or even lead their public devotions; and then, like Mr. Palgrave, can withdraw from the company when he chooses, without incurring the least suspicion of being an unbeliever and a Frank. Yet it was not till the 8th of November, 1868, as he informs us, that he lay down to sleep for the first time in a tent, "the dark, mysterious Desert stretching far away behind me," when he joined the expedition sent out to explore scientifically the Peninsula of Sinai, and to execute the Ordnance Survey of that most interesting region:—

On the following morning we bade adieu to civilization. I shall not easily forget the impressions with which I entered the Desert. I had been for years familiar with the literature of Arabia, and had read with a certain vague interest the descriptions of Desert life; but here it was at last in all its reality before me.—P. 30.

The new situation for which he had schooled himself by long and elaborate preparation seemed natural to him from the very first. He found himself the more than interpreter of the whole party; and his sobriquet of Pundit among his European friends became with the Bedawin his proper name of Bundit, after they had transformed the consonant which their lips refused to pronounce.

Of the two parts into which this work is divided, though both are fraught with the most lively interest, the second has for us more of the charm of novelty. Some of the chief incidents comprised in the former part were admirably told in summary a year ago by Mr. Holland, one of the Honorary Secretaries of the Palestine Exploration Fund, who accompanied the scientific party in 1868-9, and had visited these regions three times before. Mr. Palmer also leads us over the beaten ground from Suez to Mount Sinai, and details the various processes whereby the officers of the Royal Engineers obtained their valuable results, and vindicated, apparently for all time, the claims of the traditional site of the Mountain of the Law, Jebel Musa, from the pretensions of its more western rival, Jebel Serbal. He takes us with him alike into the Greek convent of St. Katherine and into the Bedawin encampments, rendering us almost as much at home as himself with habits of life and modes of thought as different from each other as from our own. His account of the state of things at St. Katherine's is the least favourable we have yet met with. Besides the stagnation of mind and the dreamy irresolution only too natural in the circumstances of their dreary condition, the monks are represented as so careless of even the bare forms of their profession as to neglect the very Church services save when pilgrims are present; and those notably Russians, more zealous than themselves, as having "no enthusiasm, no hopes, no aspirations—no care for anything but indolence and rum." For the rest, their very alms are stones instead of bread:—

They do keep up, these holy fathers, a semblance of that charity which made the abbeys of old so famous, and every morning they dispense with an ungrudging hand loaves of bread to any Arab that chooses to apply. One of these loaves I brought back with me. An eminent geologist to whom I submitted it pronounced it "a piece of metamorphic rock, containing fragments of quartz embedded in an amorphous paste." No decently brought up ostrich could swallow one.—P. 61.

Of the Arabs of this portion of the Desert our author's report is much more pleasing. Those who do not understand them are wont to describe them as an irreligious people because they do not often perform the ostentatious prostrations of the Mohammedan ritual; but, says their partial, because better informed, friend, "I have frequently seen our guides grow silent and contemplative towards sunset as they walked along with their camels, and on riding up to them have overheard a simple prayer" (p. 95), to the full as intelligent as any poured forth in an English cottage home. Government, in its stricter sense, is unknown in these primitive communities. Each tribe has three sheikhs, the office being hereditary. "The sheikh," however, "is rather an agent and arbitrator than a ruler, his only duties being to collect and stipulate for the hire of camels, to represent his tribe in any dealings with the Government, and to settle disputes among the Bedawin themselves" (p. 87). Their marriages are arranged between the future bridegroom and the parents of the bride as a matter of barter and sale; but, to make some amends, the person most interested is formally apprised of it when the bargain is struck, and is allowed three days' grace to make up her mind. If she dislikes the match, a girl of spirit will take to the mountains or escape to some neighbouring tents till the unwelcome suitor is got rid of. In other particulars these children of the Desert, as depicted by Mr. Palmer, are just a little too much like the natives of Arcadia or fairy land:—

The Bedawin, in their social relations, present a favourable contrast to the more civilized inhabitants of the towns and villages of the East. Their simple food, and the pure uncontaminated air which they breathe, induce a healthful condition, both of body and mind. They are cheerful, and even inclined to jocularity, often enduring the greatest hardships and privations without a murmur at their lot. Their demeanour is courteous and gentle in a marked degree, and the little punctilios of etiquette and hospitality observed when Bedawin meet would not fall far short of a Chatterfield's standard. It must nevertheless be confessed that when they do dispute, which almost invariably happens when money is the point at issue, they are as violent, demonstrative, and abusive as the most advanced civilization could desire. In striking a bargain, an Arab will not hesitate to lie and overreach you by every means in his power; but, when the terms are once agreed upon, you may be perfectly assured that his word is his bond. Theft and fraud are absolutely unknown in Sinai.—P. 82.

All this is pleasant reading, but the distinctive excellence of Mr. Palmer's work consists of his narrative of his journeyings on foot, attended only by Mr. Tyrwhitt Drake as a naturalist, from

* The Desert of the Exodus: Journeys on Foot in the Wilderness of the Forty Years' Wanderings, undertaken in connexion with the Ordnance Survey of Sinai and the Palestine Exploration Fund. By E. H. Palmer, M.A., Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. With Maps and numerous Illustrations from Photographs and Drawings taken on the spot by the Sinai Survey Expedition and C. F. Tyrwhitt Drake. 2 Parts. Cambridge: Deighton, Bell, & Co. 1871.

December 1869 to May 1870, through the Wilderness of the Wanderings (Et Tih), the Negeb or South district of Palestine, and the region East of the Dead Sea, with the view of tracing the course of the Israelites during the thirty-eight years that they languished in those uninviting and almost unknown countries. It was his purpose to follow that people step by step, from one station to another, so far as their marches could be made out from the Pentateuch, and especially from the formal catalogue in the thirty-third chapter of the Book of Numbers. Amidst much obscurity in respect to details, the general course pursued by the Jews from Sinai (which Mr. Palmer made the starting-place of his second year's exploration, as it had been the extreme limit of his first) is abundantly clear. "There are eleven days' journey from Horeb by the way of Mount Seir unto Kadesh-barnea" (Deut. i. 2). But the actual progress from the Sinaitic Peninsula made by such a host was necessarily slower. Twenty-two stations are named in Num. xxxiii., and many more implied, of which Ezion-geber at the head of the Gulf of Akabah being one, it is certain that they travelled that way, "and did not enter the Tih by any of the passes in the southern edge of the plateau" (p. 508). Now one method of identifying sites mentioned in Scripture, of which until very recently little use has been made, is by ascertaining the names they bear at the present day; for so little have Eastern habits and language changed in historical times, that tradition is "fossilized" in the nomenclature, and thus often furnishes undying testimony to the truth of Scripture. Yet this mode of procedure is not without its disadvantages, as was distinctly perceived by an eminent traveller whom it often led wrong. "A tolerably certain method of finding any place at will is to ask an Arab if its name exists. He is sure to answer yes, and to point out some spot at hand as its location. In this way, I have no doubt, we might have found a Rephidim or Marah, or any place we chose" (Robinson, Biblical Researches, cited p. 14). Mr. Palmer's plan, as devised in his first winter, is rather more likely to lead to promising results:—

I accompanied the officers during the actual process of making the survey, and taking with me the most intelligent Bedawin that I could find belonging to the particular locality, I asked the name of each place as its position was noted down upon the sketch. I then made further enquiry in the neighbourhood from other Arabs, and never accepted a name without independent and separate testimony to corroborate the information I had at first received. Having in this manner satisfied myself of the accuracy of my information, I proceeded to enquire into the meaning and origin of the names, and set down against each one not only what I knew to be the signification of the word, but the meaning which my informant himself attached to it. I found this method invaluable for testing the accuracy of my orthography; and although the reasons given were not unfrequently trivial, or even ridiculous, they served the purpose of corroborative evidence.—P. 15.

Thus forearmed against false information, and resolved to search out the truth by painful inquiry even in matters of little moment, it would be strange if our traveller had plunged into that well nigh untraversed Desert to no good purpose. His daily progress, at least after leaving the Peninsula of Sinai, is distinctly traced on one of the elaborate maps which illustrate this sumptuous work, and some of the conclusions he arrives at are very remarkable. At Erweis el Ebeirig, one full day's march from the neighbourhood of Jebel Musa towards the North-east, he came upon the remains of a large encampment, differing essentially from any he had seen elsewhere in the country, and just outside the camp a number of stone-heaps, which, from their shape and position, could be nothing else but graves. A living Arab tradition, without connecting these remains with the Lord Moses, to whose history so many other spots are referred, affirms them to be the relics of a large Hajj or Pilgrim caravan, which in remote ages pitched here on its way to Ain Hudherah, and was afterwards lost in the Desert of the Tih (p. 258). This site is identified by Mr. Palmer with Kibroth-hattaavah, the "graves of lust," so called because they there buried the people that had lusted for flesh, and died of the plague. This identification is all the more probable inasmuch as not only is the place itself the first station from Sinai in that direction, but the next is still called Ain Hudherah, a modern form recalling the Hazereth of the sacred narrative (Num. xi. 35; xxxiii. 17), a spot which appears to have been visited before by no European except Mr. Holland. The distant view of the palm-grove of Ain Hudherah, as seen from a mountain gorge in the vicinity, and represented in one of Mr. Tyrwhitt Drake's numerous illustrations, is declared to be the most beautiful and romantic landscape in the Desert. "This picture, framed in the jagged cleft, and lit up by the evening sun, with the varied tints and shades upon its mountain background, and the awful stillness that might be seen as Egypt's darkness could be felt, was such a landscape as none but the Great Artist's hand could have designed" (p. 261). We will touch on but one point more. One of the most perplexing problems of Scripture geography is the position of Kadesh-barnea, the scene of the fatal murmuring of the children of Israel, in retribution for which they were driven back again into the great and terrible wilderness, to return to the same spot only when eight-and-thirty years were completed. During that long period the history of the doomed generation was almost a blank, its wanderings without aim or purpose, and there is much probability in the suggestion that, though the Tabernacle and the seat of government remained nearly fixed, the mass of the people spread themselves over the Tih, much as a Bedawin tribe does now (p. 519). The Kadesh from which they started and to which they came back at last is regarded by our author as Ain Gadia, on the very confines of Palestine, an open space immediately under the cliff (Sela) in which the spring (Ain) rises (p. 509).

Such is our general estimate of a work which the Biblical student will highly prize for the strong light which it sheds upon a most important portion of Scripture history, but which cannot be read without interest and delight by every one who is capable of taking an intelligent interest in manners and customs widely removed from our own. As critics must needs be grumblers, we cannot help giving Mr. Palmer one piece of advice. He knows so much about so many things that he ought to be under no temptation to talk of matters whereof he is plainly ignorant. We are his humble pupils in all that relates to Arabic and the Arabs, but he must really expunge from his second edition what he says (p. 69) about his Codex Aureus of the Gospels at St. Katherine's on Sinai, taking our word for it that he is talking unmitigated nonsense.

CHESTER AS IT WAS.*

IT is somewhat of a sign of the times when we find our ecclesiastical dignitaries giving themselves to the illustration of the great buildings over which they are set to preside. The present Bishop of Llandaff some years ago published an account of his cathedral church, perhaps the first example for a long time of such a work being undertaken by an episcopal hand. We have now the Dean of Chester following in the same track. In so doing he is eminently in his right place. A Dean should always be something of an antiquary in the higher sense of the word. He should understand and love the fabric whose guardianship is one of his chief duties; every stone of the building and every detail of its history should be a living thing to him. The question, What is the use of a Dean? which in some places there is a strong temptation to ask, is not likely to be asked at Chester just now. Dr. Howson is the life and soul of a great work of restoration, less striking than the work which Bishop Ollivant had to record at Llandaff only because Chester had never fallen into such utter ruin as Llandaff. And his lot is cast in one of those cities in which the cathedral church is not everything. Chester, as we once showed in some detail, is a city which emphatically has a history. As a place with its history from the earliest times stamped on the face of it, Chester ranks along with York and Lincoln. In the completeness of its history it almost surpasses them. Even York and Lincoln can hardly put forth such claims to historic eminence as the city which beheld the Briton sink before the sword of Æthelfrith, and which was the last city in England to hold out against the power of William. We wonder that the Dean has not given a continuous sketch, however short, of the history of the city. It is hardly enough to say

The departure of the Romans left this city more or less desolate; and for a time we find the space within the old walls entitled "Waste Chester." But the later Saxon times and the earlier Norman times brought Chester back to its old importance, and saw it strongly re-fortified. It is probably to a brave Saxon princess that we owe, within this enclosure, the mound on which the Castle now stands, and here was erected the Norman keep, of which some traces still remain, though these are very slight.

This hardly brings out the fact that Chester was the scene of events which set the seal to two of the great revolutions in the history of our island. It was not the departure of the Romans which left the city more or less desolate. It was the victory of Æthelfrith which left Deva for three hundred years in the state in which the victory of Ælle and Cisa has left Anderida for fourteen hundred. Deva, Civitas Legionum, became, like Anderida, "a waste chester," not "the Waste Chester," as if "Chester" had already been a proper name in the days of Ælfred. Now the victory of Æthelfrith is one of the foremost events in the history of Britain. It marks one of the great stages of the English Conquest. Following fast upon the great campaigns of Ceawlin, it shivered and split up the British power for ever. The two events broke in pieces that long continuous British dominion which still stretched from Exeter to Dumbarton. Ceawlin and Æthelfrith, by severing this great mass of territory into three detached fragments, really decided the struggle between Briton and Englishman. Æthelfrith moreover succeeded in that attempt on the great British stronghold in this corner in which Ceawlin failed. Ceawlin reached Fethanleah, but Æthelfrith destroyed the City of the Legions itself. He thus not only dealt a deadly blow to the Briton, but gave a lasting check to the rival English power. Wessex had to lay aside all hopes of Northern dominion till the days of Egbert. All this is local Chester history. So is the tale how the Danes turned the forsaken walls of the "waste chester" into a stronghold against Ælfred and Æthelred, and how the Lady of the Mercians, the renowned daughter of Ælfred and wife of Æthelred, who lurks somewhat unworthily under the name of "a brave Saxon princess," struck no doubt by the capacity of the site as shown by this incident, called the City of the Legions once more into being. To bring out things like these in a vivid way makes just the difference between making local history a dead or a living thing. Dean Howson has given us a good deal of Chester history here and there in his book, but he has not brought out the grand drama, for such it really is, of the varied fortunes of the city.

The joint book of the Dean and Mr. Rimmer is a very pretty one, but we are not sure that it does not suffer from being, as the Dean explains in his preface, not exactly an antiquarian book, and not exactly a work of art, but something which pretends to somewhat of both characters. We are a little afraid of what the Dean calls "poetry," of the attempt to make picturesque views of the past state of Chester or any other place. To our taste we should better like either a purely scientific representation of what Chester Cathedral or any other building must have been like at any given time—a work for which it is often possible to find indications which are quite enough—or else a representation of a mediæval city, which, as an individual portrait, may be purely a work of imagination, but which may rest on sufficient authority in all its detail. This last picture of course would not call itself Chester or any other place in particular. But views of the particular city of Chester, based partly on what is still standing, partly on a theory, however probable, of what things must have been, views which do not even profess to give a consistent notion of the city at any one time, strike us as something which lacks scientific precision. But all the world is not scientific, and a book like this may serve a very good purpose in giving people who are not professed antiquarian students a general notion of what a mediæval city must have looked like, a notion which is likely to be the more lively if it is based on some actually existing city. Many people will better understand the kind of changes which Chester and other places have undergone from this more picturesque kind of treatment than from the methods which we should look on as more scientifically exact. Still we think it would have been possible to bring out a more complete view of the great monastery of St. Werburgh, as it stood before the changes of the last three hundred years. The remains are so extensive that there would not be much need to draw on the imagination. The Dean's comments show that he thoroughly understands the history of the church and its relation to the conventual buildings. But the artist seems to have had his head too full of the "Cathedral" to bring out a complete picture of the Abbey. The one view which shows any of the monastic buildings does not bring them out with any force or at all show their relations to one another. Mr. Rimmer does not seem to understand what a monastery was. The parts of the book written by him are very inferior to the Dean's share, and they have a strong tendency to be twaddling and unintelligible. In one place he goes out of his way to make a long extract from a speech of Mr. Gladstone's which has no particular appropriateness to the Stanley House at Chester. And what is the force or meaning of such talk as the following about the Earl of Derby who was beheaded at Bolton?—

It is quite impossible now, with our present notions, to enter into the feelings of the interview between Lord Derby and his daughters—"my lady Catherine and Amelia"—as he met them about half a mile from Chester; but it is comfortable to think, so far from its partaking of the character of a last interview between a condemned criminal and his family of the present time, it probably had nothing in common with this. The heroic feeling of doing no wrong and yet suffering, fully bore them up under their trials, and imparted even a feeling of exultation; this may fairly be claimed by the delineators of old Chester, as a set-off against the painful feelings that the sufferings of the Stuart period might suggest, and almost reconcile us to the reading of the last interview between the grand old Earl and his family.

We have no kind of notion what this means, nor can we make much more of Mr. Rimmer when he deals with matters more in his own province. He says, truly enough, that a very small change may utterly ruin a fine prospect, or, as he oddly puts it, that "a new brick gable or modern shop" often spoils "a village or landscape that has been for many years a source of delight." He then adds:—

They manage these things much better on the Continent, and that because an eye for the comely has there been more encouraged. The small stalls and shops that nestle round a Continental Cathedral usually form a foreground of amazing picturesqueness. We are often struck with the seemingly shapeless massive appearance of Continental Cathedrals when seen from a distance.

He instances Beauvais, Amiens, and Strasburg, and goes on to say that in "Continental Cathedrals"

there are very rarely any base mouldings; these would be hidden; but all the efforts of designers seem to culminate in lofty naves and vast flying buttresses that are grouped in great numbers and variety, and form a splendid grey background for an artist.

There is something funny in the opposition between a base moulding and a nave, and we are altogether puzzled about the lofty naves grouped in great numbers and variety. We have no means of knowing what this kind of grouping would be like, but surely it would be something specially unlike the Base Mouldings at Beauvais. As for the flying buttresses, surely the position where they best show themselves is round the apse. Mr. Rimmer is evidently of the sect which looks on all "the Continent" as one concern, and which sometimes fancies that every big church is a "cathedral," sometimes that the presence of an episcopal throne somehow makes the church in which it stands altogether different in kind from a mitred abbey. As for the "shapeless massive appearance of Continental Cathedrals," it is the accidental character of some churches which were left unfinished, or which were built so high that it was impossible to furnish them with towers having any sort of proportion. There is nothing of "shapeless massiveness" about the great churches of Normandy, or the Romanesque churches of Germany. Mr. Rimmer then goes on to discuss his picture of St. Werburgh's from the north, and holds forth about the presence or absence of some cottages a long way off. "The present foreground," he tells us, "is sadly wanting in interest." He plainly does not see why, namely, because the chapter-house and refectory, having lost their high roofs, hardly stand out in the distant view, and so the church has too isolated a look. Mr. Rimmer then adds:—

But the English Cathedrals are more symmetrical than the Continental at any time, as far at least as the outline is concerned. They were designed to stand alone. Hereford, Lichfield, Salisbury, and Winchester especially, owe much of their imposing beauty to the grounds which surround them.

Mr. Rimmer seems to see no difference between monasteries like Winchester and St. Werburgh's and secular churches like Hereford, Lichfield, and Salisbury. We wonder whether he knows that St. Werburgh's is a "Cathedral" only in the same sense in which the High Church of Manchester is. We know nothing of the "imposing beauty" which any of these churches owe to "the grounds"—whatever those are—which surround them. But as Mr. Rimmer thinks that churches, monastic, we presume, as well as secular, were "meant to stand alone," we suppose that he sympathizes with the savages who robbed Salisbury of its campanile, and Lichfield of its gateways. We should be sorry to trust Mr. Rimmer either at Wells or at Pisa.

After Mr. Rimmer's talk, it is pleasant to turn to what Dean Howson has to say about the Chester rows. We had always thought that they were unique. Dr. Howson quotes an analogous example from Rome, but from an "obscure corner." He well points out their utter unlikeness to the arcades of Bern, with which, and even with those of Bologna, it seems they have been compared. Such a comparison only shows how few people can catch the real points of likeness and unlikeness between any two things. Bern, Bologna, Padua, Carentan in the Cötentin, the Piazza of St. Mark's if it comes to that, all have arcades, but none of them have rows, none of them have an upstairs street like Chester. But though the one parallel is at Rome, there is no chance of any "actual continuity in this mode of building connecting Ancient Rome and Mediæval Chester." Æthelfrith saw too well to that.

The book, we repeat, is a very pretty one, and it has its use, though it would have been well if Mr. Rimmer had at least kept himself to the use of the pencil. We wish that, instead of writing discourses on "the comely" and the interview between the Earl of Derby and his daughters, he had given us a view of what St. John's Minster must have been when it was perfect.

ACROSS THE FERRY.*

THE author of this book, who announces himself as Editor of the Leisure Hour, remarks that an "apology is due" for the republication from the pages of that periodical of these sketches of a brief visit to America. There are, as he tells us with much force, already many books on America. It seems, moreover, that he was barely two months in the country, and he cannot be expected to have penetrated within that time very far below the surface. We are rather at a loss to say whether an apology is really due or not. The casuistry of the whole question of publication has not, so far as we are aware, been properly considered. On the one hand, the press is free in England; and if a writer can obtain a publisher, and does not offend in some very glaring manner against the laws of decency, or blunder into a downright libel, no legal penalty can be inflicted upon him for rushing into print. We may even go further and say that he is not guilty of any appreciable moral offence. He has inflicted no wrong upon anybody, for no one need buy the book unless he chooses. On the other hand, it may possibly be urged that the practice of putting into a permanent form large quantities of matter which, it may be, did well enough in the pages of a periodical, is prejudicial to the interests of literature. When Lord Macaulay published his Essays, he thought it necessary to justify himself by alleging that American booksellers had already published them without his consent. Nobody thinks such a defence necessary at the present day; and the change of sentiment is perhaps a matter for regret. The literary digestion of the country is weakened by the masses of trash which are thrust upon it; and our power of appreciating excellence declines when we are overwhelmed with mediocrity.

Without discussing the knotty point at greater length, we may at once say frankly that if a person who writes an insipid and superficial book without necessity is bound to make an apology, then we certainly hold that an apology is due from the author of Across the Ferry. He has, indeed, the merit of frankness, for, as he tells us in his title-page, the book gives "first impressions of America and its people." Now, without any disparagement to Dr. Macaulay, who, for any thing we can see to the contrary, may be a very intelligent person, we have no hesitation in saying that neither his first impressions nor the first impressions of any other person on so large and so familiar a subject can be worth recording. If a young gentleman were to take to the study, say, of Greek history, and after spending a couple of months in reading the most obvious authorities were to publish his first impressions by way of a supplement to Grote, we should not admire his wisdom; but we do not see that his conduct would be intrinsically more absurd. Dr. Macaulay may perhaps have spent eight weeks in America, and, moreover, eight weeks during the "fall," when the opportunities of seeing the "most remarkable men in the country" are as limited as possible. In that time he visited New York, Boston, Niagara, Chicago, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, and Washington, and, in fact, made what may be called the regular American round. If we deduct from this the time necessarily spent in travelling by slow trains over great distances, the time spent in hunting up the friends to whom he had letters of introduction, the time wasted by all those petty inconveniences which necessarily await a traveller in a new country, we should say that a good half of his time must have been taken up in the mere preliminaries of observation. What could he really learn about a population larger than our own in the remaining four weeks? What, for example, can be the value of his opinion as to the relative merits of a denominational and a secular system of education, or as to the advantage of opening school by reading the Bible "without note or comment"? Or to take a still larger question, what can be the value of his judgment as to the religious movements of America? It appears to be his impression that America will reproduce the phenomena of middle-class Protestantism in England; that Anglicanism will perhaps be the prevailing persuasion amongst the rich, and that the great bulk of the nation will be substantially in sympathy with our Dissenters. The growth of Catholicism, he says, is simply due to the Irish emigration; the old Unitarianism is dying out, and infidelity disappearing along with it; whilst Spiritualism, Mormonism, and the other varieties of creed described by Mr. Hepworth Dixon, are mere trifles undeserving of a moment's attention. All this may be true, or it may imply a totally mistaken view of a very interesting subject. We merely say that Dr. Macaulay has not qualified himself to form an opinion on the subject, and that his testimony is not worth serious attention. We shall, therefore, confine our remarks to a different subject. We shall regard Dr. Macaulay as illustrating the spirit in which the ordinary Englishman visits the United States and the lessons which he draws from it.

The first thing which strikes such a traveller—and he takes great credit to himself for the acuteness of the observation—is that an American is a human being. He puts this commonplace in a great variety of ways, sometimes reflecting that Mrs. Trollope, Captain Basil Hall, and Dickens were guilty of caricaturing people whom, being men, they ought to have regarded as brothers; and sometimes remarking that Republicanism does not necessarily make people virtuous, and that evils are to be found under every form of government. Dr. Macaulay records with evident complacency a remark characteristic of this stage of sentiment, in which he has probably been preceded by many thousands of observers; it is that, in some sense or other of the words, England is as genuine a Republic as the United States. Whether there was any great value in this observation when it was first made may be doubted; but it has been repeated so frequently that we would fain hope that we shall not meet it much oftener. The next discovery which dawns upon the traveller is that Americans talk English, and many of them, moreover, an English dialect strongly resembling that of large classes in his native country. Mr. Spurgeon, for example, would find a thoroughly congenial atmosphere in America; and Mr. Ward Beecher would be equally at home in England. There is a continuity of religious and political feeling between certain social strata on both sides of the Atlantic, though it by no means extends throughout the whole nation. It is almost inevitable that the traveller should join himself to that class which most strongly resembles his own. If, for example, he is a good Scotch Protestant, like Dr. Macaulay, he falls at once into the hands of some of the leading members of the Presbyterian, or possibly of the Methodist, Church; if he happened to be a Radical of the ordinary type, he would probably be absorbed by the Abolitionists or their successors; but whatever may be the class with which he is most in harmony, he is certain to find it very hospitable, as all Americans are hospitable, and very much disposed to make him look at everything through its own spectacles. As a natural consequence, the traveller, during a tour of a few months or so, is handed on from one of the faithful to another, and the chances are that he never succeeds in obtaining even a glimpse of America as it would appear to one of the wicked. He has just time to learn the commonplaces current amongst the particular clique to which he has joined himself, and has no means of judging how far they extend, or of checking them by any external observation. One peculiarity, however, is common to all Americans, at least in the Northern half of the Union. Every traveller, unless he is made of abnormally tough material, is forced to go through a course of "institutions." The favourite institutions are, of course, the Common Schools. They are, speaking from the point of view of the superficial traveller, the great nuisances of the country. The great majority of Englishmen who do not belong to the scholastic profession never think of entering a school at home, and far less of examining an educational apparatus, or making a speech to the pupils; but they are expected, as soon as they land in America, to be consumed by a perfect passion for useful information on such subjects, and, as they have not generally such a passion in readiness, they do their best to work themselves up for the occasion. We have known a few persons of sufficient independence of character to revolt against this process, but the great majority (and we need not say that Dr. Macaulay is amongst them) abandon themselves with absolute resignation, and even—so great is the human power of self-deception—persuade themselves that they like it. When once a gentleman has yielded to the current, we know precisely what will be the pith of his work if he writes a book, though the details may vary. We shall have all the dismal old platitudes about the blessings of education, the advantages of local self-government, and the intelligence of the American people, mixed with observations as to the common language, common laws, and common religion of England and America. The extraordinary delight which the Americans take in all manner of statistical information will enable him to fill up as many gaps as he pleases with scraps of useful knowledge. We shall be told once more how many newspapers there are in America, what is the amount of annual contributions to Mr. Ward Beecher's chapel, how many pigs are annually killed in Cincinnati, what have been the numbers of emigrants during the last thirty years, how many gallons of water flow down the Croton aqueduct or over the falls of Niagara, how many miles of water navigation join in the Mississippi, how many millions of dollars of the National Debt have been paid off, and—last and most distressing—what has been the rate of increase of the population of Chicago. When we mention the fact that Dr. Macaulay, so far from sparing us the thousand-and-first repetition of this perfectly exasperating story, repeats it over again, and absolutely revels in it, we have probably said enough to indicate the nature of his book. And with this remark we will return one more to the question of apology. If Dr. Macaulay and his like have any cause for apologizing, it is that they bid fair to make the very name of the United States a kind of warning bell which will induce all reasonable people to close their ears or shut the book before them. We really believe, and we hope to continue to believe, that many very interesting remarks might be made about our cousins, if anybody would only take the necessary trouble to study the question as it deserves. The phenomena worth notice are not entirely confined to the two or three subjects on which we have been deluged with figures and overwhelmed with commonplaces. And yet we feel that our faith grows weaker in spite of ourselves, and that we are in danger of laying it down as an invariable law that the United States exercise a benumbing influence over the faculties of all travellers, which must be attributed to something soporific in the climate and in the manners and habits of the people themselves.

COWTAN'S MEMORIES OF THE BRITISH MUSEUM.*

WRITERS on the British Museum have been very active of late. It would appear as though the restless energy displayed by the promoters of the rival establishment at South Kensington had put the officials of "the old curiosity shop in Great Russell Street" on their metal. Handbooks and catalogues have within the last few months appeared in unprecedented numbers, and the work before us is the second of its kind which has been published within a little more than a twelvemonth. In the Lives of the Founders of the British Museum Mr. Edwards furnished us with a vast amount of information on the subject of the various collections, and now Mr. Cowtan has added, as it were, a supplement, in which he admits us into that part of the inner life of the Museum with which he is most intimately acquainted. It must necessarily be difficult for an officer of a department to write of his brother officials. In such a work it is inevitable that, if he discharges his duties with firmness and truth—unless his colleagues are all paragons of virtue and learning—he should give offence to some. But a writer who proposes to himself such a task should be willing to bear the resentment of those deserving of censure, and to seek his reward in the consciousness of having acted with impartiality and justice. We have the greatest respect for the erudition and learning of the Museum functionaries as a body; but, however anxious we may be to accept the evidence of Mr. Cowtan on these subjects, he puts too great a strain on our credulity when he eulogizes in rapturous terms one and all, from the Principal Librarian to the junior official, and backwards from the former to the earliest Librarian employed by the Trustees. We become suspicious when we find such expressions as "profound student," "able scholar," "accomplished gentleman," applied to each, and we long to meet with some who are shallow, ignorant, and bores. That such there are even among Mr. Cowtan's colleagues we have no doubt, and his book would have been less insipid had he told us so. It is not complimentary to the intelligence of the public, and it is an insult to those members of the Museum staff who have distinguished themselves above their compeers, to class a body of men such as that of which he speaks as of one rank in intelligence and ability. Mr. Cowtan appears to have adopted the principle of besmattering every one with as much praise as he can get into the space he devotes to the notice of each. The result is, that he has produced a book which must necessarily be utterly untrustworthy, and in the worst possible taste. By his indiscriminate adulation he has reduced men worthy of admiration and honour to the level of those of whom the world never would have heard but for the appearance of the work before us, and we venture to affirm that even the outrageous puffing bestowed on these latter in its pages will never float them above the level which they are formed by nature to occupy.

In proportion to the space he devotes to the rank and file of the Museum does he detract from the interest which would otherwise attach to his book. It is impossible to feel a passing touch even of curiosity about a gentleman whose only title to distinction is that he has carried Mr. Disraeli, when a boy, on his back; or about another who is immortalized in the work before us for no other reason than that he was in the habit of inviting its author to tea. This is the sort of twaddle which occupies page after page of Mr. Cowtan's book:—

I would not by any means omit the name of a lady who was kind to me from the morning of my first engagement in the Library: I allude to Mrs. Mary Bygrave, the Housekeeper, or, as she was termed in the Parliamentary Returns, "Chief Housemaid." This lady entered upon her duties as early as the 18th of March, 1799, and on my first connexion with the Museum I was a special favourite of hers. She had spent thirty and three years in the service of the Trustees, and though somewhat advanced in life, she still retained the remains of a beauty that must once have been very bewitchingly attractive. From my being the youngest man at that time in the Museum, she was particularly pleased with little attentions paid her. I remember presenting her one summer morning with a moss-rose bud, when I remarked that at one time it would have done for an emblem of herself. She told me, with a woman's pride, that she was once rather attractive, at least the young fellows told her so.

Fortunately for his readers, Mr. Cowtan's personal recollections of the Museum are not sufficiently voluminous to form of themselves materials for a book, and he has therefore been under the necessity of devoting some chapters to the contents and administration of the various departments. On these points his long service under the Trustees enables him to speak with authority.

At the time of his first appointment to the Museum, in 1835, Montagu House was still standing, and the only portion of the present building which then existed was that known as the King's Library. In this and the other libraries the total number of volumes was then about 230,000; at the present day they have grown to more than a million. During the first thirty-two years of this century "the net sum of public money applied to increase the only national library in the British dominions fell short of 20,000l.," now Parliament grants annually 10,000l. for the purchase of books. Such are some of the changes which have come over the Museum Library and its management during the last six-and-thirty years, and they illustrate in a marked manner the rapidity of the growth of national intelligence and education during that period. When we read Mr. Cowtan's description of the arrangements connected with the Reading Room of 1835, and compare them in our mind with those pertaining to the magnificent apartment which now annually receives upwards of 100,000 readers, the interval which has elapsed appears as though it should be counted by centuries rather than by decades:—

The approach to this room [the Reading Room] adjoining the Manuscript Department [says our author] was through a small archway from the courtyard, past Mr. Cary's apartments, and up a flight of narrow stone steps into a small lobby where the sticks and umbrellas of readers were left. This lobby was so small and so cold, and so uncomfortable, that the poor fellow stationed there as an attendant, who came to the Museum from the comfortable service of the Countess of Blessington, often told me a dog would not remain there except he was chained up.

A considerable improvement in the accommodation afforded to students was made when, in 1838, the completion of the Museum buildings placed at the disposal of the Trustees for this purpose the rooms in the north-east angle, which were fitted up with every available comfort. But as the number of readers increased, so many complaints were continually made of the bad ventilation and want of light, as well of room, in these apartments, that it became necessary to consider the advisableness of adding to the building a reading-room of sufficient size to satisfy the requirements of many years to come.

About this time the late Mr. Watts, in a series of papers on the British Museum which appeared in the Mechanics' Magazine, suggested that a building should be erected in the inner quadrangle of the new building, capable of meeting all the demands made for further library accommodation. Of this proposal no notice was taken at the time, and a like suggestion made by Mr. Edward Hawkins in 1842 was also entirely disregarded. Ten years later the same idea occurred to Mr. Panizzi, and owing to his great personal influence and indomitable perseverance, it was carried into effect. The first brick of the present Reading-room was laid in September 1854, and the building was completed in May 1857. Mr. Cowtan gives us some curious statistics as to the size of the room:—

The dome [he says] is 140 feet in diameter, and its height 106 feet. . . . Its shelves contain about 60,000 volumes; and the new building altogether will accommodate as many as 1,500,000 volumes. The building contains three miles linear of book-cases eight feet high; assuming them all to be spaced for the average octavo book size, the entire ranges form twenty-five miles of shelves. Assuming the shelves to be filled with books, of paper of average thickness, the leaves placed edge to edge would extend about 25,000 miles, or more than three times the diameter of the globe.

It is perhaps of more practical value to know that the room affords space for 302 readers, and that this number of students is often to be found at one time within its walls.

We should scarcely be giving a fair sketch of Mr. Cowtan's book were we to omit to mention the very prominent position which the figure of Panizzi occupies from the frontispiece to the last page. The indiscriminate praise bestowed upon him throughout will appear to many to be overdrawn, but at least it will be recognised as the genuine expression of the glowing admiration of a devoted follower. And it cannot be denied that it is mainly due to Sir Anthony Panizzi and the system he introduced that the nation now possesses the most perfect library in the world, and that its contents are made available to the public with the fewest possible restrictions, and in the most convenient manner. Those, however, who have not already formed a high opinion of his undoubted ability will scarcely be led to do so by the perusal of Mr. Cowtan's book. In conclusion, with almost every other part, the pages dedicated to his house are conspicuous for the bad taste in which they are written. A considerable amount of interest attaches to the chapters devoted to the statistical and historical accounts of the Museum; but Mr. Cowtan's personal recollections are worthless and insipid.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE Commune and the Prussians, the two sieges of Paris, the state of French society, and the means of restoring it to healthful life, such are still the topics discussed in the immense majority of works which we have to notice. Some years ago a distinguished magistrate, M. Dubois-Guchan, writing two thick octavo volumes on Tacitus, endeavoured to prove that France had reached a state of civilization corresponding exactly to that of Rome under the Cæsars, and that a strong personal government was the only one suited to a nation where all political life was extinct, where faith no longer existed, and where the thirst for enjoyment absorbed everything else. The publication of so plain-spoken an apology for despotism excited the utmost indignation at the time, and the liberal portion of the community had no expressions violent enough to denounce the unfortunate M. Dubois-Guchan. Events, however, seem to prove in the saddest manner that Liberalism alone is not sufficient to save a people from political decay, and that a society enervated by scepticism requires a panacea much more effective than the one embodied in the famous axiom, "Liberty, equality, fraternity." On this subject M. de Pontmartin speaks with all possible plainness; he compares the France of 1871 to the shipwrecked mariners crowded together on the raft of the Méduse; and whilst he is far from despairing of the rehabilitation of his country, he frankly expresses his opinion that a revival of religious life can alone bring about the desired result. The book which he now publishes, composed of feuilletons written during the last six months, is a severe but, we think, a very fair bill of indictment not only against this or that section of the Paris population, but against the whole community. Bourgeoisie, working classes, aristocracy, leaders of fashion, journalists, statesmen, all come in for their share of blame, all are made equally responsible for the calamities which weigh down upon unhappy France. M. de Pontmartin has devoted a chapter to an impartial discussion of the well-known statement which is so often repeated amongst our neighbours at the present time—namely, that the want of proper education must be considered as the original cause of the chronic uneasiness which every now and then issues, on the other side of the Channel, in civil war and attempts at political revolution. The objection, our author remarks, is true enough, but when the ultra-Republicans clamour for education, do they not always mean that the teaching of the young shall be in all cases carefully founded upon the theories of Messrs. Eugène Sue, Quinet, Michelet, Victor Hugo, and Balzac?

It may perhaps be said that M. de Pontmartin's statements cannot be altogether received, coming as they do from a writer who avowedly takes the side of religion; but here we are able to bring forward the testimony of another journalist, whose statements will not on this point be accused of partiality—we mean M. Alphonse Daudet. His Lettres d'un Absent are extremely amusing†; and they describe with a good deal of truthfulness, though at the same time with too much levity, the faults of his countrymen. The late M. Vinet reproached the French for being essentially fond of theatrical display; M. Daudet says exactly the same thing in the picturesque language of a journalist. The love of truc is the cardinal sin of Frenchmen, and any one who is acquainted with the mysteries of Parisian society knows exactly how display, sham, lying, feverish agitation, want of principle are represented and condensed in the small word truc. "The education of the Parisians," M. Daudet bitterly remarks, "is generally carried on in dancing-saloons"; M. de Pontmartin never said anything stronger. They feed upon unhealthy novels, and it is not long since a few young men really attempted to illustrate practically M. de Balzac's celebrated tale, Les Treize. When the state of society is on the whole sound, such absurdities do not lead to any dangerous consequences; but imagine the case of a revolution, and place at the Paris Hôtel de Ville half-a-dozen sans-culottes who seriously set about reviving 1793. Thus it is, adds M. Daudet, that we have had Rigault-Trenville, Vermerch-Duchêne, and Vermorel-Robespierre. The episodes described in the Lettres d'un Absent are, we repeat, very amusing, but it is a pity to see the horrors of civil war treated with so much indifference.

M. Jules Claretie writes the history of La Guerre nationale‡ from the Republican point of view, and his pen has the steadiness which we should have liked to see in M. Daudet's otherwise valuable book. He gives us a detailed account of the battles fought outside Paris from the month of September 1870 to January 1871, and he thus completes the series of volumes already noticed by us. The preparations for the war, the defeat of Forbach, and the catastrophe of Sedan formed the subject of La France envahie; in Paris assiégé we had the exact journal, kept day by day, of all the events connected with the siege; the present volume, therefore, may be considered as an intermediate link between the two others. M. Jules Claretie feels convinced that France will one day rise from its ashes, but he does not see any principle of renovation higher than knowledge and intellectual life, whereas moral development is the condition without which the greatest amount of mental culture, far from being beneficial, may be positively dangerous.

Bibliomaniacs are already spending money in profusion for the purpose of making complete collections of all the newspapers, bills, pamphlets, &c., published during the Commune. Such collections, we know, are extremely difficult to procure, and the British Museum itself has had some trouble in securing a set of the chefs-d'œuvre of modern Parisian revolutionary journalism. Let us then give our cordial thanks to "M. L. M.,"* for the very interesting and able summary he has published of the Communistic daily press. His two volumes contain, in the first place, all the really important part of the Journal officiel, such as laws, decrees, orders, military despatches, reports of sittings, &c. &c. We have then copious extracts from the other newspapers which sided with the Revolutionary Government, and, finally, a few quotations from the Versailles press. The whole makes up a very useful and readable book, deserving to be placed side by side with M. Maillard's Histoire des journaux de la Commune.

Captain Jacquemont relates† the share which the Pontifical Zouaves had in the campaign against the Prussians. He begins his narrative at the time when the French army of occupation quartered in Rome was obliged to yield before the Italian troops, and to embark at Civita Vecchia; he describes the last attempt made by General Kanzler to defend the Pope against the soldiers of King Victor Emmanuel; he then speaks of Baron de Charette's reorganization of the Zouaves, and gives a most interesting account of the various battles in which the small Pontifical army took a part.

The anonymous author who describes the "agony of the army of the Rhine"‡ is loud in his wishes for revenge, and he expects that the day of retribution will come at no distant period; but, in the midst of expressions of unreasonable fury, he points out in the clearest manner certain facts which few persons have as yet noticed, and which explain most naturally, to a considerable extent at least, the catastrophe of Sedan. France, he says, did not desire war, and, with the exception of a few ambitious or active officers, the army was fully convinced that nothing would be attempted to thwart the ambition of Prussia. As a natural consequence of such a state of things, no attempt had been made to introduce a better system instead of the old spirit of routine which paralysed the efficiency of the army; and whilst the enemies of France were busily engaged in bringing their military organization to a thorough state of perfection, matters remained on the opposite side of the Rhine much what they were thirty years ago. But a second and more fatal cause was at work to help the Prussians and to bring about the disasters of the French. Convinced that the army alone kept up the Imperial régime and supported Napoleon III. and his throne, the newspapers belonging to the Opposition had long been doing their best to sow amongst the soldiers the seeds of disaffection, little knowing that they were thus busily preparing the degradation of their country. It is strange and singular to say that M. Gambetta and his friends should have had, after the revolution of September, to restore the discipline which they themselves had been most instrumental in subverting.

M. de Freycinet's book, La guerre en Province§, with its two maps and its voluminous appendix of pièces justificatives, is one of the best books that have been published on the late war. The author's conclusions deserve to be recorded here; we shall state them briefly. M. de Freycinet thinks that the faults committed by the French commanders were not really greater than in other wars; if they appear more glaring and more numerous, it is because the idea of defeat seemed scarcely credible to men who lived intellectually upon the traditions of the old Napoleonic successes. Still, faults have been committed, and it behoves all Frenchmen to examine calmly what are the best means of preventing a repetition of such disasters. In the first place, the axiom tel peuple, telle armée must be admitted as beyond discussion; an emaculated nation, corrupted by luxury, scepticism, and vice, cannot expect to have an army well disciplined, well informed, and actuated by high principle. Let instruction be made strictly compulsory, so that no man shall reach his twentieth year without having given satisfactory proofs that he possesses a minimum of information on all essential topics. Military service should be made obligatory for all, and so arranged that intellectual training may replace the tedious drills which uselessly take up nearly the whole time when a soldier is on duty. Promotion should be given, not by favour nor by seniority, but as the result of severe examinations. Garrison life is the curse of discipline; instead of quartering the regiments in large centres of population, they should be made to encamp and kept as much as possible away from the excitement of cafés, public meetings, &c. The staff and the commissariat must also be thoroughly remodelled, and the old corps d'armée replaced by district brigades, which will enable the reserves to be organized without either trouble or waste of time. Finally, says M. de Freycinet, let the task of reformation be begun at once.

M. Michelet publishes a new edition of his History of France||, adding to it a kind of autobiographical preface in which he describes the growth of his work and the influences under which it was written. He parades rather unnecessarily and offensively his hatred of Christianity, and states as a singular fact that "the only man who had sufficient love within him to create anew and build over again the inner world of the Church was he (Michelet) whom the Church did not bring up, who never took the Sacrament (the italics are M. Michelet's), whose faith was only the belief in humanity, who did not accept a credo authoritatively imposed, and who was a free-thinker." This declaration is plain enough, and it would be curious to inquire how the author of the book before us can reconcile it with the following passage translated from his introduction to the Mémoires de Luther:—"I shall not, as so many others have done, expose to the public gaze the wounds of a Church in which I was born, and which is still dear to me. Poor old mother of the modern world! derided, insulted by her son (Luther), it is assuredly not I who would add another injury to those from which she has been suffering." M. Michelet should endeavour to be a little more consistent.

The first volume of M. Guizot's new History of France* has just been issued, and it takes the reader down to the reign of Philip the Fair—that is to say, it comprises the whole of the mediæval period. Historians have until lately been accustomed to consider the accession of Louis XII. to the throne as marking the beginning of modern times in the annals of our neighbours; but this date is evidently a mistake, for every student knows that to Philip the Fair belongs the honour of having given to the French Monarchy the form which it ultimately retained, and which constitutes, or rather constituted, its originality amongst the other political constitutions sprung from the alliance between the Roman element and the German one. M. Guizot's views are exactly the same as those which stamp his celebrated Lectures, and although the merely narrative style predominates in his recent work, yet philosophical generalizations are far from being neglected. The woodcuts added by way of illustration are in every way worthy of the volume.

M. Trognon is known chiefly as the author of a History of France, which we noticed some time since, and which is generally considered as one of the best works on the subject. He was also honoured with the friendship of the late Queen Marie-Amélie, who entrusted to him the education of the Duke of Montpensier. Such are the qualifications which led to his being chosen by the Princes of the Orleans family to write the life of their mother.† All the necessary documents were unreservedly placed in his hands; he was not only allowed, but requested, to use them with the utmost freedom, and he has given us in the shape of an interesting volume what must have been for him quite a labour of love. Without attempting to describe here the contents of M. Trognon's biographical memoir, let us merely say that it is a most valuable contribution to the history of the last sixty years, and that it bears fresh evidence of the firmness which has always been characteristic of the ladies of the French Royal family. Napoleon's celebrated mot about the Duchesse of Angoulême—C'est le seul homme de la famille—almost involuntarily occurs to us whilst we read the account of Her Majesty's behaviour at the Tuileries on the memorable 24th of February, 1848. Admiral Hernoux, a friend of M. Trognon, who happened to be present, observed:—"Every one around the King had lost his senses. Two persons alone preserved coolness and dignity; they were two old women (deux vieilles femmes), the Queen and Madame de Montjoye."

No writer was better fitted than M. Guizot to sketch the life and character of the Duke de Broglie‡, and we are glad to see that he has published in a collected form the articles contributed by him to the Revue des Deux Mondes on the biography of one of the best representatives of modern French statesmanship. M. Sainte-Beuve, in one of his earliest Causeries, spoke of the Duke of Broglie as the politician who, more than others perhaps, commanded the respect even of his adversaries; such is the idea which reigns throughout the pamphlet before us. The condition of France immediately after the Reign of Terror, the revival of literature through the joint influence of Madame de Staël and M. de Chateaubriand, the general craving for peace, order, and a powerful Government, are well described by the young man who, belonging to one of the first French families of the ancien régime, hailed the coup d'état of the 18th Brumaire as a wholesome repetition of the grand monarque's dealings with the Fronde; whilst at the same time he could not shut his eyes to the probable results of a system which was introduced by arbitrary measures, without having in its favour the prestige of hereditary right and of long-standing tradition. The close connexion between liberal ideas and the principles of religion and moral dignity is a phenomenon which deserves to be closely studied, especially at an epoch when order is too often regarded as a synonym for despotism, and liberty as a euphemism for licentiousness. If the statesmen of modern France had been more universally cast in the same mould as M. Guizot, noble friend, we should have been spared the horrors of the Commune.

Whatever opinion we may have respecting Napoleon III. and the Imperial Government, it is impossible for us to endorse all the statements contained in the first chapter of M. E. Brault's volume. This gentleman writes in such a spirit of partisanship, he talks so wildly about the empereur d'avenir and the "noble traditions" of '92, that he does not inspire us with the slightest confidence; and his narrative must be classed amongst the pamphlets which only two years ago were printed in Brussels and London for the edification of amateur revolutionists. It cannot be too often repeated that if the French army of 1870 had lost all the traditions of discipline and self-respect, it was entirely the fault of those who endeavoured to revive the "noble traditions" of '92.

M. Léonce Dupont takes the opposite view of the question*, and brings in a heavy bill against the Government of September 4. After the capitulation of Sedan, he observes, the military disasters of France formed the all-absorbing topic of interest. The most urgent thing then was to strengthen the Government, to give a more vigorous impetus to all the branches of the administration, and to organize throughout the country every available resource. Instead of this, a handful of ambitious men saw that the opportunity had now come for them to grasp the power which they had so long coveted; they marched without any opposition to the Hôtel de Ville, and made the disasters of their country the stepping-stone to greatness. M. Dupont argues that M. Jules Favre and his friends are really responsible for the civil war, because, in the first place, they gave to the Parisian mob the example of contempt for the law; and, in the second, many of the self-styled politicians who composed the Government of the National Defence were avowed friends of the Communists. Such is the theme of M. Dupont's preface; his book contains the journal of the sittings held by the military tribunals at Versailles from August 7 to September 20.

M. Champfleury continues his archaeological studies with the most laudable zeal, and his new volume gives us the history of mediæval caricature.† It will be understood at once that this title implies a great deal more than is generally meant by the word caricature. During the middle ages sculpture and wood-carving were almost the only means which satirists had of denouncing the vices and follies of society; and M. Champfleury's book consequently is to a great extent a history of church decoration. The author is a staunch adversary of the archaeologists who uphold the idea of symbolism, and who look upon the grotesque ornaments of our cathedrals as allegorical representations intended to convey striking lessons of good manners and wholesome doctrine. His book, profusely illustrated with facsimiles of old Gothic art, will be found very interesting.

M. Charles Garnier ‡, architect of the new Paris opera, is not unknown to our readers; but the volume we have now before us is of much higher pretensions than the one we noticed about a year ago. M. Garnier's architectural speciality is connected with theatres; for the last ten years he has studied every question referring to that subject, and he comes forward to give us the result of the experience he has derived from a personal survey of all the leading theatres in Europe. The first point to settle is that of the usefulness of scenic entertainments; for if dramatic representations are dangerous or unnecessary, we should not apply to them the resources of architectural art. M. Garnier contends that of all public institutions in modern society, the church and the stage are the only two which address themselves to the whole population, and which, therefore, should be under the special protection of the Government. It is impossible, he further argues, for private enterprise to build churches and theatres on a proper scale, and so as to combine all the indispensable elements of comfort, salubrity, and taste; the State alone can solve the problem in a satisfactory manner. After these general remarks, on which of course we need express no opinion here, M. Garnier goes on to examine in detail the numerous items connected with the building and decoration of theatres, taking as his guide the principles adopted by himself in the construction of the Paris Opera House. The documents he has added to his volume enable the reader to study the comparative arrangements of all the great European theatres.

With the exception of M. Cousin's Histoire générale de la Philosophie, and of a few translations from the German, French literature cannot boast of any important work on the history of various metaphysical systems; nor can even the volume of the late Sorbonne Professor be looked upon as complete, for it does not take us further than the beginning of the present century. M. Alfred Weber § has accordingly endeavoured to supply the deficiency, and his Histoire de la Philosophie européenne is intended as a handbook for students who want to unravel the mysteries of metaphysical science. The author aims, of course, at being strictly impartial; but still he adopts a point of view from which to examine the wide subject before him, and that point of view is clearly expressed in the following motto:—"La vérité métaphysique ne se trouve ni dans le matérialisme ni dans le spiritualisme dualiste, mais dans le spiritualisme concret, qui tient la force et l'intelligence pour les attributs distincts, mais inséparables, de l'esprit." M. Weber begins by showing the relations which exist between metaphysics and the other sciences, he then marks out the divisions of the philosophical field, and concludes his introduction by giving us what is called the literature of the subject. His last chapter enumerates the objections which may be raised against the various systems existing now. Materialism, he says, is so far wrong that it fails to explain the logical side of nature and of history; Spiritualism should shake off the old Cartesian tradition; and, finally, Positivism must acknowledge that, as all science worthy of the name is the search after a law, or a system of laws, so it is a partial system of metaphysics, and philosophy is the metaphysics of the universe, or it is nothing.

EASTERN EUROPE.

THE Russian Government has lately issued several manifestoes to its own people explaining the foreign policy of the CZAR. It has thought it necessary to show that it is doing all that can reasonably be demanded of it for the extension of Russian influence and the consolidation of its position at home and abroad. There are enthusiasts who think Russia might go on much faster than it does, and assume the position of the head of a great Slavonic community. To these critics the Government replies that Russia wants, not war, but peace, because peace, while it permits the country to become rich and strong, gives it all the political advantages it needs; and, secondly, that to do anything more for the Slavonic provinces of neighbouring Powers than to take care that they have a fair chance of developing themselves in their own way would be the very worst course possible in the interest of these provinces themselves. The first task of the Russian Government was to show that there is a fair probability of the peace of Europe being preserved, and of this peace, if preserved, turning to the profit of Russia. That peace is likely to be preserved is, it owns, an expectation not in accordance with the views of PRINCE BISMARCK. The German Chancellor not very long ago remarked to a traveller that the main reason why the Prussian Government tried hard to avert a war with France was not because it had any doubt of the immediate result, but because it was convinced that war, if once begun, would last half a century. This is a very dreadful look-out; but even if PRINCE BISMARCK's calculations were true, the Russian Government thinks that the late war between France and Germany is itself a guarantee that Russia will not be drawn against her will into the wars of the next half-century. Germany chose to impose exceedingly hard terms on the unfortunate nation which she conquered. Russia does not pretend to judge Germany in the matter; but she may legitimately study the inevitable consequences of the course which Germany thought proper to adopt. The result of the late wars that Germany has on her Western border a nation of thirty-five millions of persons burning to take revenge on their hard-hearted conquerors. Germany cannot, therefore, act with freedom against the great Power that borders her on the West. There is no great Power that can really hurt Russia much except Germany, and Germany will henceforth know that France will rush to arms as the ally of Russia if Russia is attacked. If France assumes the war, Russia can, if she likes, remain neutral, and demand as the price of neutrality some concession like that by which she has lately made herself once more mistress of the Black Sea. All this seems to us very true. The late war was very advantageous to Russia. It is scarcely possible that a war between two great Powers should not turn to the advantage of some of the bystanders. The Crimean War enabled Austria to throw off the fetters of dependence which Russia had imposed on it, and it enabled Piedmont to start on its career of unifying Italy. Austria and Piedmont, it is true, were not mere bystanders, but it was because other nations stood the real shock of the war that they got what they wanted. The late war between France and Germany has in the same way improved the political position of at least three Powers—Russia, England, and Italy. Russia can now play with a French alliance as she likes, in order to keep Germany quiet, showing seal for this alliance if Germany seems inclined to thwart Russia, and coolness if Germany lets Russia have her way. England is certainly more secure for a time, as France, the only nation that at present could think of attacking us on our own shores, has been compelled to reduce its expenditure on its navy, while Italy has taken advantage of the war to absorb the possessions of the POPE. These are patent facts, and it is quite right that each of the nations concerned should be reminded of them by its Government; and it is for each nation to see that its Government does not adopt a wrong policy in consequence of regarding these facts in a false light. England has to see that the invaluable opportunity now given us of re-organizing our defences with the maximum of efficiency at the minimum of cost is not thrown away. Italy has to see that the POPE has no real ground of complaint, and that the attention of the Government is henceforth mainly directed to internal reforms. Russia in the same way has, according to Russian views, to see that the Government does not neglect the interests of inferior nations or populations allied to it by race or religion; and that it is not neglecting these interests is what the Russian Government proceeds to show, after it has established to its satisfaction the general proposition that peace may be preserved, so far as Russia is concerned, in a manner very advantageous to her.

Austria is the quarter from which, in the opinion of Russian alarmists, danger is likely to come. Germany, it is said, may be tempted to profit by the Austrian crisis, and to annex the German provinces of Austria, leaving Austria to make up for its losses in the East. Possibly Germany might be tempted to co-operate with Austria and Hungary in the prosecution of this process of compensation to Austria. Those who go furthest fancy that the integrity of Russia will be menaced, and that the Galician Pole, always ready to do Russia an injury, will be used to open a way into the heart of the Empire. The language used by the Russian Government in criticizing these suggestions is very remarkable. It acknowledges its duties as the protector of outlying Slavonic populations, and it owns that the crisis in Austria inspires it with some apprehension. It therefore explicitly declares that, if Slavonic populations are oppressed or threatened by Austria, or if any serious source of danger to Russia is opened in Galicia or otherwise, it will at once act promptly and efficaciously. But, on the other hand, it wishes all Russian patriots to understand that the best thing that can happen in the interest of these populations is that they should continue to thrive in peace under the government of Austria; and what is said of Austria may be also said of Turkey. These populations are, it must be admitted, for the most part in a very backward state, and what they want is time and leisure to make progress in the arts of peace and of civilized life. It would neither suit Russia nor them that they should be at too early a date attached politically to Russia as members of a great Slavonic Confederation like the new Confederation of Germany. The Germans have had a thousand years of civilization, and even in Germany there are not wanting signs of a strong separatist tendency. If the Slavonic populations were prematurely attached to Russia, they would be wanting in the qualities the existence of which is necessary if a Confederation is to endure, and a movement towards the disruption of a Confederation might possibly imperil the unity of Russia itself. The best thing, therefore, that Russia can do for itself and its Slavonic neighbours is to uphold the actual position of the Austrian and Turkish Governments, using these Governments as the means by which the humbler members of the Slavonic family are to be encouraged to make material and intellectual progress. If this progress is in any way unduly thwarted, then Russia will put forth its great strength, and obtain by force, or the threat of armed force, what its nationalists fairly demand; and that it would do so successfully is tolerably well assured by the circumstance that humiliated and revengeful France will be always lying in wait on the left flank of Germany, preventing Germany from interfering in the East. From the Russian point of view, according to which Russia has no objection but to declare itself the champion and of all Slavonic populations and of all members of the Greek Church, the programme of its policy thus put forward by the Government seems well founded and conceived with much foresight and good sense. But it is obvious that, according to this view, the Austrian Government must conduct its affairs under the perpetual supervision of Russia, who will let it alone and calmly and benignantly patronize it so long as it treats its discontented subjects in a manner of which Russia approves; but who will reprove it, and even coerce it, if it does not.

That the exposition of this scheme of Russian policy should have been received with much disfavour at Vienna is only natural. That Russia should consider her position with regard to Austria to be that of a superior keeping watch over the behaviour of a useful inferior is bad enough; but it is much worse that the Russian Government should say this openly, and thus humiliate Austria before the world. The very arguments by which Russia seeks to tranquillize Austria are themselves new sources of irritation. It is evident that Russia does not want to hurt Austria, the Russian Government says, because it has never profited by the very numerous occasions in the last half-century when Austria was at her mercy. There is nothing new, it is alleged, in the peaceful policy of Russia, for the Emperor ALEXANDER is only treading in the steps of his peace-loving father. It is at last acknowledged, the Russian Government states with a grand audacity of assertion, that the Emperor NICHOLAS never threatened any one. If the document in which this statement is made had been exclusively intended for Russians, it might have allowed that it was for them alone to judge whether they would accept the pious fiction that the father of the EMPEROR was a singularly harmless and inoffensive man. But Austrians are not likely to forget the famous proposal to divide the inheritance of the Sick Man; and Austria is scarcely well enough herself to feel quite easy if it is true that the policy of the two CZARS is really identical. Still, for the moment, Austria may be no doubt content that Russia disclaims any intention of stirring up her disaffected provinces against her. The documents published by the Russian Government may at any rate be taken as showing these provinces that it would not be convenient to Russia that their disaffection should come to a head just at present; and the new Austrian Ministry may have been wise in giving indications of a friendly disposition towards Russia. Turkey is in much the same position as Austria, and ever since the results of the recent negotiations regarding the Black Sea proved to Turkey that it could not count on the active support of England, the Porte has shown an inclination to adopt a new line of policy, and to be on the best of terms with Russia. One curious consequence of the new relations between Russia and Turkey has been seen in the last few days. Prince BISMARCK has for many months been trying various methods of putting enough pressure on the Roumanian Government to make it accede to a fair compromise with the bondholders of a line of State railways who happen to be for the most part Germans. For a time the Roumanians steadily resisted and baffled his efforts, until he hit on the device of making Turkey threaten to interfere as the Suzerain Power of Roumania unless justice was done. To the threat of this interference the Roumanians have reluctantly yielded, and a Bill sanctioning a compromise acceptable to the bondholders has been passed by the Roumanian Legislature. Prince BISMARCK has thus been successful, as he generally is sooner or later. But his success would have been impossible, or must have led to an open rupture between Germany and Russia, had Russia persevered in its traditional policy of seeking to emancipate the Principalities from the authority of their Suzerain. Turkey would never have dreamed of threatening to send troops into Roumania unless it had been satisfied that Russia would not object to such a very demonstrative mode of asserting the dubious and ill-defined authority of the SULTAN over the Principalities. Turkey feels, like Austria, that it will within certain limits receive the countenance of Russia if it uses its legal or semi-legal power over its subjects; although Turkey, like Austria, must be aware that there is no saying how long a power exercised by the sufferance of a foreign Government will retain any reality.

THE UNITED STATES AND CUBA.

THE American Government still abstains from any participation in the civil war in Cuba; but its acts form an effective commentary on the scandalous document which is about to be presented on its behalf to the Tribunal of Arbitration at Geneva. In the view of international law the insurrection against the authority of the Spanish Government is far less plausible and respectable than the secession of the Confederate States from the American Union. The rebels in Cuba have had no organized Government, either before or after the commencement of the war; nor have they at any time been able to place a regular army in the field. With the moral or political merits of the dispute foreign Powers have no concern; but it is remarkable that, while the colonial authorities have not yet abolished slavery, the insurgents have never formally committed themselves to the doctrine of emancipation. It is possible that the PRESIDENT may be justified in his interference with the internal policy of Cuba, and in the indirect assistance which he has given to the rebels; but his proceedings are curiously contrasted with the scrupulous neutrality which is supposed to entail on England a liability heavier than the penalty inflicted on France by the victorious Germans. Mr. HAMILTON FISK thought himself at liberty to urge on the Spanish Government the emancipation of slaves in the West Indian Colonies. Lord RUSSELL never took the liberty of addressing Mr. SEWARD on the protection of State rights against Federal usurpation. In 1870 and 1871 the officer commanding the American squadron on the coast of Cuba was ordered to station his vessels in such a manner as to cover the escape of insurgents from the island. There can be no doubt that any similar employment of English ships during the Civil War would have provoked an immediate rupture. The position of the United States as a neutral Power during the insurrection in Cuba has in fact in some respects modified the extravagant pretensions which had been advanced by the American Government in its belligerent character. The PRESIDENT found it convenient to assert the discretionary power of recognizing the existence of a state of war, although the QUEEN'S Proclamation had been previously treated as a hostile measure; and the precipitate concessions of the English Commissioners were voluntarily limited by the Government of Washington so as to exclude liability for the breach of blockades by private adventurers. In other respects the Americans, confident in the deference of England and in the weakness of Spain, have not been solicitous to maintain perfect consistency. The despatch of men-of-war to places from which insurgents may conveniently escape is more likely than the captures of the Alabama to prolong the war by discouraging submission.

Although the Americans have been systematically unjust to England down to the date of the outrageous invective of Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS and his colleagues, their policy in relation to Cuba must be regarded without passion or prejudice. It may be doubted whether the persons or property of American citizens have been really exposed to danger during the recent troubles at Havannah; but it was natural that the indignation provoked by the conduct of the Volunteers should find official expression. The anarchy and demoralization which prevail in Cuba have never been more painfully exemplified than in the transactions of the last autumn. A Spanish loyalist visiting a suburb of Havannah in consequence of a challenge, for the purpose of fighting a duel, was basely assassinated by his political adversaries. Some time afterwards a body of medical students were guilty of a foolish riot at the cemetery where he was buried, and some of them were said to have defaced his tomb. The Spanish Volunteers, in spite of the protests of the Governor, immediately proceeded to try the offenders by court-martial, and several young men of respectable parentage were shot in punishment of their boyish irregularity. As soon as the account of the judicial murder was received at Washington, two or three ships of war were ordered to proceed with all haste to Havannah for the protection of American citizens. On their arrival the commanding officer informed his Government that the city was perfectly tranquil; but the despatch of the squadron will have been rightly interpreted as a reproof and a warning. Notwithstanding the theoretical equality of States, and the general doctrine of non-interference, great Powers, confident in their security from retaliation, commonly exercise a moral censorship or supervision over their weaker neighbours. In former times petty Italian potentates were frequently reminded that they were not strong enough to claim absolute freedom from responsibility in their capricious oppression of their subjects. The Americans regard Cuba as a property of their own in reversion, and they have no difficulty in devising excuses for the protection of their contingent interests against the tenant in possession. It is thought desirable to remind those who may suffer by the weakness or misconduct of the actual Government that they have a powerful protector within reach; and, even if the Americans were sensitive to foreign opinion, they are secure against serious disapproval when they resent such an atrocity as that committed by the Spanish Volunteers. For many good reasons they are in no hurry to annex Cuba; and they would rather allow the inhabitants to detach themselves from their allegiance to the mother-country than accelerate the process by intervention. They will certainly not directly abandon neutrality until the decision of the arbitrators is given at Geneva. The sacred right of Governments and insurgents to fight out their own quarrels must be respected as long as American advocates are pretending to impute officious partiality to a detested Government and nation. When the temporary reason for non-intervention has ceased to operate, there will still be a reasonable disinclination to a rupture with Spain, which, if it involved little risk, would be expensive, and barren of glory. No prudent man gives a price for that which he believes that he can ultimately acquire without payment. There is no use in fighting for a territory which, according to the general belief, must inevitably drop into the Federal system by force of gravitation. There are also thoughtful politicians in the United States who appreciate the inconvenience of conceding a share in the government of the Republic to a population which, though it will acquire equal rights, will in reality be neither free nor equal to the genuine citizens of the Union. The rioters and the assassins of Havannah would not be eligible fellow-countrymen, and the planters and slaves of the interior are still less ripe for free Republican government. The Senate of the United States has shown statesmanlike wisdom and firmness in quietly suppressing General GRANT's imprudent eagerness for the annexation of San Domingo. Throughout the Spanish colonies there is not one man in a thousand who understands the meaning of freedom, and there is not a single Protestant.

How far it is possible that the authority of Spain should be re-established it is difficult to judge. For three years all parties have professed entire unanimity of determination to retain the colonies, and in that time fifty or sixty thousand regular troops have been sent to Cuba without perceptible result. It is scarcely known who are the leaders of the insurgents, or what is their object; but experience shows that the power of the Government is non-existent in a part of the island, while even in the capital there are many proofs of disaffection. The colonists of European blood are jealous of the Spaniards; but at the same time they have no desire to accelerate the extinction of slavery, and few of them can regard with complacency the prospect of annexation to the neighbouring Republic. From time to time the local Government reports that the rebellion is almost entirely extinguished; but after an interval the normal condition of anarchy is once more acknowledged. It is to the credit of the people of Spain that they cherish a patriotic regard for the national honour and greatness; but it is perhaps not too much to say that the era of colonial empire is at an end. England, which is far more vigorous than Spain, has been gradually compelled to concede practical independence to the colonies; and, if the recognition had been delayed, it is probable that the insurrection of Cuba would have been anticipated by Canada, Australia, and the Cape. The Spaniards are not yet prepared to content themselves with a nominal sovereignty over their colonies; and they will find it impossible to govern them from home. Yet it would be rash to foretell the continuance or success of the present insurrection. A commander of genius, an original statesman, might discover the means of conquering or conciliating the rebels; and the Americans, though they might be disappointed by the result, would acquiesce in an accomplished fact. If the King could be spared from the Peninsula, his offer to proceed in person to Cuba might perhaps be accepted as the most promising mode of terminating the struggle.

THE FRENCH BUDGET.

AFTER having got rid of the project of a general Income-tax, the French Government has had to ask the Assembly to seek in other directions the augmentation of revenue necessary to meet the estimated expenditure. This week has been devoted to a discussion of the proposal to tax certain forms of personal property. But before an estimate can be formed of the best mode in which the necessary money can be raised, it is important to understand what are the new taxes already voted by the Assembly. In his speech on the Income-tax M. THIERS attempted to prove that the system of taxation prevailing not only under the Empire, but under all Governments since the Revolution of 1789, was in all substantial respects perfect. The poor were taxed, but not too much, and the holders of property paid, as they should do, to meet the requirements of the State. From twenty-five to twenty-six millions more a year are needed now than were paid before the war, of which sum fifteen millions are said to have been already voted, and the question now before the Assembly is how the other ten millions are to be raised. The new taxes voted in August were as follows:—There is an increase of the duties on registration and of stamp duties, to the amount of nearly four millions. These duties would depreciate the saleable value of all property, and would so far be a tax on the small landowners. But the bulk of the new taxes fall on the wealthier classes. 80,000*l.* is to be obtained from horses and carriages, and as much more from an impost on the subscription to clubs and on billiard-tables. A quarter of a million is to be derived from a tax on cards and licences, and over a million from a tax on railway passengers. Taxes on lucifers and paper are each to produce nearly half a million, and the Post Office is to give an additional million. Coffee, tea, cocoa, tobacco, and sugar are to yield four millions and a half, and alcoholic liquors nearly three millions more, while gunpowder and petroleum are to furnish what is necessary to make up the rest of the fifteen millions. The basis of the whole of this new mass of taxes is the extraction of new indirect taxes from the luxuries of all classes, or rather from that which is something beyond the bare necessities of life in all classes. What is novel in these new taxes is chiefly the novelty of getting at the pockets of the comparatively wealthy in hitherto untried ways. But on the whole the poor will bear, under the taxes already voted, quite their fair proportion of the fresh burdens imposed on the country by the late war. These new taxes, however, brought the Government almost to the end of what it considered could be realized by new charges on articles of consumption beyond the bare necessities of life. Accordingly it proposed to open up new sources of revenue in order to procure the ten millions which have yet to be voted. It is true that the taxes on sugar and lucifers are to be augmented, so that the former shall produce 800,000*l.* and the latter 200,000*l.*; and thus one million sterling of these further taxes is a mere augmentation of the charges already voted by the Assembly. But the remaining nine millions are to be derived from new sources, of which there are three principal ones. A tax on raw materials is to give nearly four millions, and a tax on textile fabrics is to give upwards of two millions. An impost on securities other than the funds and the shares of Co-operative Societies is estimated to yield upwards of a million. The mode in which the Assembly, under the guidance of the Government, has dealt with the Ministerial project, is first to discuss and decide against an Income-tax; then the question has been debated whether the tax on securities shall be imposed, and this has been discussed in the past week, with the result that the Government has virtually consented to abandon this part of its project. Finally, the question will be decided whether the taxes on raw materials shall be imposed. The only alternative which the Government allows to be possible is a general augmentation of all direct taxes; and the Assembly is to be made to choose between this, which would be highly unpopular, and a tax on raw materials, which the Assembly regards with great disfavour. This is the corner into which the ingenuity of M. THIERS has driven the Assembly. But this is not all. Matters have been so arranged that the door has been firmly closed against the discussion of the preliminary question whether this money is really wanted. Private members get up and suggest that the large new expenditure on the army is unwise and unnecessary; but the Government does not condescend to take any notice of what they say; and the Assembly is so much under the mastery of M. THIERS that it quietly follows him in discussing how the money for the new expenditure on the army is to be provided, before it is decided whether this extra expenditure is justifiable.

The mode in which the Budget is discussed is so extraordinary that it is difficult to say whether the proposal to tax securities was ever seriously made or defended by the Government. M. THIERS threw it over directly he began to discuss it, but M. POUYER-QUERIER resolutely defended it. There are, however, so many objections to every possible tax that no proposal has a chance of being accepted unless it is sustained with the whole force of the Government, and is maintained on tolerably satisfactory grounds. But not only did M. THIERS show his dislike of the tax on securities, but the grounds on which M. POUYER-QUERIER defended it were of the weakest possible description. The speakers who had objected to the proposal before the FINANCE MINISTER spoke had divided their opposition into two heads. In the first place, they said that the great object of France at the present crisis was to attract foreign capital into the country, and that the readiest mode of doing so was to keep up the marketable value of French marketable securities. If shares and obligations were specially taxed, they would of course fall in value, and the present holders would lose the difference, thus undergoing a diminution of their capital, instead of merely paying an Income-tax. There can be no doubt that this would be the case, unless foreigners residing abroad were exempted from the tax; but although this would keep up in a great measure the value of the securities, it would to an equal extent diminish the receipts from the tax. M. POUYER-QUERTIER did not deny that the tax would have the effect of lowering the value of French securities in the European market, but the general tenor of his remarks on the second head of the arguments of his opponents made anything he said as to the first head of no importance. His critics objected that there was no difference between one portion of personal wealth and another, and that the holders of securities, such as those of railway obligations and shares, ought not to be subjected to a special Income-tax from which merchants and manufacturers were free. M. POUYER-QUERTIER replied, that the general Income-tax had been rejected because of its inquisitorial and arbitrary nature, and that, although it would be very inquisitorial and arbitrary to tax the profits of merchants and shares, as the Government could get at the exact amount to be paid without asking a question of any one. A more dangerous doctrine could not have been broached by a Finance Minister. It simply comes to this, that a Government in difficulties is to lay its hands on the form of property that is most easily plundered. But M. POUYER-QUERTIER had not only to draw a distinction between merchants and the holders of securities, but between the holders of Rentes and the holders of other securities, as the Government proposed that the new tax should not extend to Rentes. The real reason of this proposed exemption was, of course, that a new loan to an immense amount will soon be necessary, and the tiny hoarders of capital in France would never dream of investing in the new loan if they thought that the interest they were promised might be diminished by special taxation. M. POUYER-QUERTIER had, however, to find some basis for the distinction which he was endeavouring to create. Railway shares and obligations really represented, he said, the fruits of gigantic monopolies created by the State for the benefit of private persons. Were such persons, enjoying in ease the benefits of the State's favour, to be compared with good merchants and traders labouring to make their country rich? or, as he might have logically added, with patriotic citizens subscribing to loans in order to get the foreigner out of the country? This was a most astonishing kind of talk for a responsible Minister to use. The State wanted its railways made, fixed the terms, found subscribers, and got the main railways it wanted. M. POUYER-QUERTIER proposes that the State should now turn round on these subscribers as on a description of public enemies, and make them bleed. They were once public benefactors subscribing for the railways which the country wanted; but the country has had their money and does not need any more from them, and therefore it can afford to mulct them, while it must humour the fundholder, as it has new loans to ask for. It is superfluous to consider how far a fair tax on railway securities would lower their value, when we find a Finance Minister treating these securities as tainted in their origin and nature, and as proper objects for a special burden of taxation of an indefinite amount by way of penalty. If these are the views they entertain, French Ministers may entirely spare themselves the trouble of considering how far French railway shares and obligations are likely to be purchased in the European market at anything like their present price.

By securing the rejection of the Income-tax and of the tax on personal securities, M. THIERS has imposed on the Assembly the choice between his scheme of laying heavy duties on raw materials and the imposition of the necessary number of additional centimes on the direct taxes. It is a curious illustration of the present state of France, that while all agree that he is intending to make a catpaw of the Assembly, one set of gossips is sure that he means to get the duties imposed on raw materials, and another set is equally sure that he means to make the Assembly incur the odium of augmenting the direct taxes. That the odium of such an augmentation will be very great, and very dangerous to the party at whose door it is popularly laid, is incontestable. When he was describing the general system of taxation in his speech on the Income-tax, M. THIERS, in order to show that the French poor are very lightly taxed, was pleased to consider all the owners of property as belonging to the easy classes. Nothing could have been more inaccurate so far as the description applied to the landowners. Out of seven millions and a-half of French landed proprietors, five millions hold on an average six acres each. These landowners are mostly very poor men, struggling hard to keep their heads above water, and they are already very heavily taxed. They pay the direct duties to the State and to the local bodies, they have to bear exceedingly heavy charges on every transmutation of property, and they pay, when a cottage is part of their wealth, the door and window tax. They already groan under this taxation, and their sole idea of politics has long been to find some ruler who will relieve them from a portion of their existing burden. "I was told," says M. RENAN in his recent work on France, "by one of the most capable administrators of the Empire, à propos of the elections of 1869, that the 'part of French institutions which appeared to him in the 'greatest danger was that of the direct taxation on land, 'every peasant wishing to make candidates enter into engagements to support changes which would involve France 'in financial ruin.'" PREVOST-PARADOL, after a candidature in the Loire-Inférieure, described to M. RENAN as his main impression that the peasantry would soon bring the State machinery to a standstill, and M. RENAN learnt the same lesson from his experiences in Seine-et-Marne. What will these peasants say if they hear that the new Government has actually increased the very taxes which they are burning and hoping to see diminished? Theoretically, the best way of filling up the deficit in the Budget is no doubt to get a little more from each person who already pays; and, as M. THIERS says that the system of taxation is perfect in France, the fairest thing would naturally seem to be to increase what each person pays under this perfect system. But to make the peasants pay more direct taxes would be politically very dangerous. If it is to be done, M. THIERS wishes the peasants to understand that he was their friend, but that a tyrannous Assembly would insist on adding to their burdens; so that they ought to hate the Assembly and not him. He, in fact, stands to win either way. The duties on raw materials will be accepted by the Assembly, and then he will have a Protectionist system to his heart's content; or they will be rejected by the Assembly, and then the wrath of the peasants may be expected to fall on the Assembly, and not on the good PRESIDENT of the Republic.

LORD HOUGHTON ON THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

A DEFENCE of the House of Lords by Lord HOUGHTON in the January number of the Fortnightly Review shows that the conductor of that periodical still maintains the liberal practice of allowing all parties to be heard. The wide range of political controversy in the present day is illustrated by the publication, in the same number which contains Lord HOUGHTON's apology for the House of Lords, of an unqualified eulogy on CHAUMETTE, one of the most brutal and ferocious ringleaders of the Paris mob during the first Revolution. One of ROBESPIERRE's few good deeds was the execution of the leaders of the Commune, including CHAUMETTE, who introduced the worship of the Goddess of Reason, and perhaps devised her costume. A few years ago the vindication by LAMARTINE and LOUIS BLANC of the character of ROBESPIERRE was thought a sufficiently immoral paradox. M. REGNARD, the admirer of CHAUMETTE, now denounces ROBESPIERRE as a middle-class reactionist who was base enough to believe in a God according to the gospel of ROUSSEAU. From the question whether CHAUMETTE or ROBESPIERRE deserves the lower place in the revolutionary Malebolge, the transition to an inquiry into the merits of the House of Lords is as wide as if three or four thousand years had intervened between the publication of the two contemporaneous articles in the Fortnightly Review. It may at once be admitted that in a Socialist Republic an hereditary Chamber would be an inadmissible anomaly; and indeed, as Lord HOUGHTON observes, Professor FAWCETT, who is neither a Socialist nor an impatient Republican, is naturally surprised to find himself discussing the expediency of preserving the House of Lords. CHAUMETTE, and probably ROBESPIERRE, would have effected a sweeping reform by cutting off the heads of the peers, and proscribing their descendants; but in England the controversy has not yet advanced to the stage of decapitation. It is possible that Mr. Dixon's Birmingham failure may have arisen from incidental causes, nor is there any reason why he should not yet organise an agitation as formidable as Mr. MIALI's attack on the Church. Both factions rely on the aid of the professed revolutionists, who, until they are in a position to sweep away Mr. DIXON, Mr. MIALI, and the class to which they belong, will readily and consistently do their utmost to overthrow all the outworks and securities of property and of order.

Lord HOUGHTON naturally and properly assumes in his argument that the existing system of society is to be maintained. The House of Lords could scarcely have taken a part in the shameless worship of Mrs. MONRO in her character of Goddess of Reason, although M. REGNARD "can find nothing to condemn in the ceremony except its preposterous simplicity." As might be expected, the genial and experienced advocate of hereditary legislation is not extreme or fanatical. He gives reasons for believing that public feeling is not unfavourable to transmitted privilege; and he endeavours to show how the energies of the House of Lords might be more usefully employed. His remarks on the vitality of titular distinctions are acute and deserving of attention. In France and some other Continental countries where privilege has long since been abolished, titles are still used and respected; and it may be added that a few years ago a law was passed by the French Legislature imposing penalties on the unauthorised use of honorary designations. The nobility of France eighty years after the Revolution still form a caste, and the old grandees of Spain, possessing no kind of political power, refuse to admit to social equality the dukes and counts who have been promoted by recent Governments. On the other hand, the use of titles of nobility has been effectually suppressed in the United States; and the designations which indicate civil or military rank have there no tendency to become hereditary. In England, unless a subversive revolution were accomplished, it is probable that the use of titles would survive the privileges which some of them at present imply. The preference which, as Lord HOUGHTON remarks, is habitually given to peers and to other men of rank, might have been even more strongly stated. If the members of the House of Lords receive their peerages by descent, they hold innumerable offices by virtue of popular election; and in many instances their constituents have the strongest interest in securing the fittest incumbent of the place which they voluntarily bestow on a nobleman. As Chairmen of Quarter Sessions, of various kinds of Boards, of commercial and of charitable institutions, peers possess, and for the most part justify, the confidence of some of the most intelligent sections of the community. The idlers, the gamblers, the libertines, who are necessarily to be found among four or five hundred persons selected by the accident of birth, bear but an insignificant proportion to the entire body. Lord HOUGHTON's inference from the practical popularity enjoyed by men of rank is more questionable than his statement of facts. "This must mean," he says, "that there is a conviction—and who in the present state of physiological investigation will treat the theory with contempt?—that there is a transmission of hereditary qualities which excites admiration and respect." It is perhaps premature to assume that physiological science has advanced far enough to distinguish between the qualities respectively transmitted to their offspring by peers and by commoners. The heir of the Marquis of STREYN, or of the Marquis of MONMOUTH, if he had been a man of business, would have been preferred to all the honorary offices which are customarily conferred on the great men of the neighbourhood; but the selection would scarcely have implied universal admiration and respect for the epicurean heroes of Mr. THACKERAY and Mr. DISRAELI. The preference given to a great peer over a less fortunate competitor indicates, not so much respect or admiration for the virtues of his ancestors, as a rational appreciation of the securities which his position provides for the due discharge of certain functions. In the absence of proof to the contrary, it may be taken for granted that a peer is not an adventurer, and that he is a gentleman. There are no TWEEDS, or FISKS, or SWENZYS in the House of Lords, although there may be an ordinary proportion of simpletons who are soon found out by those who have any interest in judging of their capacity. According to the hackneyed passage in BURNS, the man may be the gold, and the rank but the guinea stamp or mark of coinage; but in practice it is more convenient to judge whether coins have the proper stamp and superscription than to assay unstamped ingots. Twenty peers taken at random would certainly be equal in knowledge and natural ability to as many educated gentlemen without titles. It is useless for them to claim a higher degree of superiority, except that several of them have received an exceptional training as statesmen. Commonplace agitators at Birmingham and elsewhere tauntingly ask whether hereditary legislators are not as anomalous as hereditary tradesmen or hereditary professional advisers. It is not the custom of the shallower herd of political declaimers to look round them before they speak, or to profit by every-day experience. It is notorious that bankers and brewers, solicitors and doctors, tailors and shoemakers, are in innumerable cases hereditary, and that customers and clients prefer the natural successor, or even the purchaser of the good-will of a business, to an equally meritorious stranger. Their choice is determined, not by admiration or respect founded on the present state of physiological science, but by habit confirming a well-founded belief that it is convenient to have some guarantee of respectability, and that it is much less easy to test exceptional ability. The House of Lords would not be more competent to discharge its duties if it were appointed by any conceivable process of election. It contains a great majority of men of independent means, of liberal education, and of average natural powers; and its leaders are always among the principal statesmen of the time. Its chief claim to popular respect is founded on wealth and rank, and both attributes to some extent impose on the general imagination. An orator may be, and a demagogue is, a charlatan, and a reformer is sometimes an impostor; but there is no doubt that the peers are men of rank, and that many of them are rich.

Lord HOUGHTON, in common with other members of the House of Lords, frets under the compulsory idleness to which the House is exposed during the greater part of every Session. It is a cause of regret that so much capacity for business should be wasted and impaired by the want of sufficient material for activity; but there are always causes of existing effects, and in this case the result follows from intelligible reasons. From the time of the Reform Bill to the present day, the House of Lords has never, except during the four years of Sir ROBERT PELL's Administration, been in harmony with the House of Commons. A majority has always been opposed to Liberal Governments, and Lord DERRY and Mr. DISRAELI, who were supported by the House of Lords, were in a minority in the House of Commons. While all serious legislation practically devolves more and more entirely on the Executive Government, it is not to be expected that great measures should be introduced by Ministers in a hostile assembly. When the experiment has been tried, the labours of the peers have been wasted, because they have always modified the Ministerial measures so as to make them unacceptable to the House of Commons. It is true that in dealing with certain social and economic questions the peers may be more independent than the members of the House of Commons; but it must not be forgotten that the external pressure is equally applicable when a Bill has come down from the Upper House. The whole question deserves full consideration, and Lord HOUGHTON's contribution to the controversy is reasonable and useful.

THE PARIS ELECTION.

THE return of M. VAUTRAIN for Paris by 121,000 votes against 93,000 obtained by M. VICTOR HUGO has been a universal surprise. Frenchmen of all parties and foreigners of all countries have grown so accustomed to regard Paris as a city altogether given up to revolutions, that the election of a moderate Republican has furnished occasion for almost as much speculation as if the new deputy had been the Count of CHAMFORD himself. The most hopeful reading of M. VAUTRAIN's success would be to accept it as an indication of the rise of a new party in Paris. Certainly there is an ample opening for something of the kind. The Radical Republicans are discredited morally by the excesses of the Commune, and intellectually by the extravagances which characterized M. HUGO's canvass. The old Party of Order are discredited by their physical and moral cowardice, by their impartial dislike of the rifle and the ballot-box, and by their inextinguishable conviction that it is somebody else's duty to protect them. If it be true that M. VAUTRAIN's return is due to a combination of seceders from both these factions, that his supporters are politicians whose love of liberty does not lead them to stomach anarchy, whose love of order does not breed forgetfulness that there are times when every man's hand may have to guard his own head, there is more hope for the permanent tranquillity of Paris than there has been for a long time. A body of opinion strong enough to command 121,000 votes would have an immense advantage in the midst of so many discordant elements, and the fact of its having once asserted itself successfully would bring over a large body of recruits to its flag. If the election could be repeated to-morrow, M. VAUTRAIN might be returned by a much larger majority. Indeed the future of a new Party of Order would to some extent be endangered by the very number of the accessions to it. The ruin of its predecessor has been the dead weight of cowardice and irresolution included in it. There is such a thing as brute weakness as well as brute force, and brute weakness has been precisely the characteristic of the Paris Conservatives. Their numerical preponderance has been a simple disadvantage to them, something to be deducted from their effective strength, instead of something to be added to it. An army is paralysed by the presence of too many camp followers, and the mass of the bourgeoisie of Paris have been little better than the camp followers of order. If M. VAUTRAIN's victory is to be the earnest of others like it, the most prudent policy for his supporters will be to maintain themselves as a distinct organization under whatever name they may think best designates them. As such they may continue to hold the balance between Conservative violence and revolutionary violence, until by degrees they have won the best of their opponents to their side, and made peace and good government equally secure whatever may be the political party actually in power. Paris, like France itself, has work cut out for it which must be done alike under a Monarchy or under a Republic; and the good sense of its citizens, as of Frenchmen generally, would be best shown by this work being taken up alike by Monarchists and Republicans, leaving the question of the ultimate form of government to remain in necessary abeyance. Hereafter M. VAUTRAIN's supporters may be found in opposite camps, but they will have discharged the duty laid upon them if they ensure that the constitutional controversy shall be determined by the consideration of what will most promote the peace of the country. There are many persons who would profess, and perhaps feel, a desire that the controversy should be settled by peaceful methods. M. Hugo himself has declared that henceforward votes must do everything and muskets nothing. The mark of genuine patriotism in France is readiness in a Monarchist to accept a Republic, and in a Republican to accept a Monarchy, according as a Monarchy or a Republic can conciliate that measure of popular adherence which is needed to give permanence to any form of government. No Government can hope to be more than a passing accident so long as its title to power is the fact that there are eighteen millions of Frenchmen in its favour and only seventeen millions against it.

Within certain limits, of course, it is the duty of every man to promote, so far as he has the power, the spread of the opinions he thinks soundest; but at present there is a more immediate duty incumbent upon Frenchmen. They have to ascertain what opinions are really held by the intelligent majority among the French people, which solution of the constitutional problem out of those which conform to the essential conditions of free government is best calculated to gain the acceptance of a united nation. Where the facts are so hard to discover and appreciate, honest men may easily arrive at different conclusions upon this point; but much would be gained if it were generally recognized that it is the one point upon which they are bound to form a conclusion. The fanatical Monarchists, the Radical Republicans, and the Bonapartists equally sin against this law. The two former avow that the form of government they are endeavouring to set up ought in their opinion to be set up irrespectively of consequences. The adherent of the Count of CHAMBORD maintains submission to the descendant of St. Louis to be the bounden duty of every French subject; the Radical holds that the right of the Republic is superior to the will of the people upon whom it is to be imposed; or rather that a man who is not a Republican is not one of the really sovereign people, but merely a slave, who has no rights except such as he enjoys by the complaisance or the contempt of his master. The Bonapartist has no theoretical aspirations of this sort. He is either the adventurer who has staked his fortune upon the eventual triumph of NAPOLEON III. or NAPOLEON IV., or the tradesman who, amidst the ruinous confusion of the last eighteen months looks back with excusable but uninstructed fondness to the time when he was by the fleebots. But in practice all these factions seem to agree upon a common line of conduct. The majority among them vote for no candidate who does not exactly represent their own shade of politics. The bolder minority vote for whatever candidate they think most likely to embarrass the Administration which, notwithstanding its many and glaring blunders, represents most nearly that rational patriotism which alone can give repose to France. This latter statement must be qualified probably as regards the Radical Republicans. There have been instances, it seems, in this very Paris election, of Legitimists and Bonapartists voting for M. VICTOR HUGO, but we do not know that there have been instances anywhere of Radicals voting for an avowed Legitimist or Imperialist.

It is possible, however, that this whole notion of the rise of a new party in Paris may prove to be baseless. M. VAUTRAIN, it must be remembered, has been returned under circumstances which are not likely ever to recur. It had been understood that in the event of his election the whole influence of the Government would be used to induce the Assembly to return to Paris, while, should M. HUGO be chosen, M. THIERS would have no choice but to leave the Assembly to take its own course. The belief in the power of a Government to do what it likes is still strong among the Paris bourgeoisie, and it is quite possible that a large proportion of the 121,000 electors who voted for M. VAUTRAIN did so with the simple intention of voting for the return of the Assembly. If so, they voted under the pressure of a very strong material inducement. To have the Assembly back again means a revival of those forms of industry which have been especially injured by the war, some amount of Court splendour, and a brisk trade in all the articles of luxury which are everywhere identified with Paris. The powers that be are rarely in a position to offer a bribe of this magnitude, and it is possible, to say the least, that when the consideration money for M. VAUTRAIN's return has been paid and Paris is once more the seat of Government, the instinct of abstention will reassert itself, and the Paris shopkeeper will take as little trouble as heretofore to keep the advantages he has gained. If the Assembly consents to return to Paris on the score of M. VAUTRAIN having beaten M. VICTOR HUGO, it will show that it was only seeking for a colourable excuse for reversing its former decision. The 93,000 Radicals who compose the minority are not less dangerous because the majority has for once, and under the protection of a state of siege, plucked up courage to go to the polling-booth.

MR. SCOTT RUSSELL AGAIN.

MR. SCOTT RUSSELL'S pretensions as an economist and politician may be questioned; but in one department he has proved himself a master. No recent projector has so successfully practised the art of pulling. The crude and yet stale Socialism of his scheme for the regeneration of England would, if it had been simply published in a pamphlet or a newspaper, only have suggested the question, "Who is 'Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL?'" The question has now been answered by anticipation, because the author of the so-called Social Movement has induced half a dozen well-known politicians to recognize to a limited extent his claim to conduct a negotiation between different classes. It may be safely assumed that the persons who are pompously described as a Council of Legislation supposed that their correspondent spoke with some kind of authority; yet their suspicion might well have been excited by the assumed title of a "fellow-workman." Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL, who pursues the respectable occupation of a contractor, is a workman in the sense in which all persons who are not absolutely idle are also workmen. A doctor, a lawyer, a shopkeeper, even an active member of Parliament, works; and a day labourer contracts for his wages with his master, and for the necessities of life with his tradesmen; but a contractor is a workman only in the same sense in which a workman is a contractor. It is convenient to describe men according to their characteristic employments, and not with reference to accidents which are common to themselves and to the rest of the world. Having provided himself on one side with the support of a few working men, who were naturally willing to take anything which they could get in the way of concession, and having gained a hearing from some Conservative noblemen and gentlemen, Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL propounded the Seven Resolutions which have attracted at least as much attention as they deserved. As soon as the document was published, every member of the imaginary Council of Legislation peremptorily repudiated the extravagant doctrines which they were supposed in some sense to have sanctioned. It would have been easy for Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL to correct any misapprehension which might have arisen; but he announced that he was detained by business at Vienna, and that he must postpone explanation till his return to England. It is not known whether any private communications have since passed between Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL and his former correspondents; and it is of course possible that they may all have retracted their disavowal of his projects. Unless he has received from them some fresh authority, it is not easy to understand his recent address, which contains no reference to their published denial of the charge of tampering with revolutionary Socialism. He announces the intention of soon laying "before the Council of Legislation the communications" which they are awaiting of measures calculated to remove "the disadvantages which affect the condition of the working class." If there is any meaning in words, Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL's correspondents were awaiting no such communications; and they had expressed strong disapproval of the Resolutions which are now formally submitted to their consideration. The commentaries which are now for the first time appended to the Resolutions are far more audacious than the original text. If Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL sincerely believed that a body of Conservative peers and landowners would sanction a project for taking a part of their property on the assumption that they had been guilty of robbery, he must take a singular view of the nature which is common to peers and to the rest of mankind. It is certain that not one of the members of the supposed Council is so ignorant as to accept Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL's statement that the commons which have from time to time been enclosed were the property of the artisans on whom an equivalent is to be bestowed, or of the people of England. Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL has apparently not mastered the rudiments of the subject on which he proposes to legislate; but those whom he addresses know that the commons were only divided by inclosure among those who already possessed the exclusive estate in the land. Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL cannot but have suspected that, among several landed proprietors, some at least must be in possession of lands which were formerly held in common. His own theory, indeed, is that those who profited by inclosures were not merely the lords of manors and the commoners, but the class which he significantly designates as the rich. All revolutionists and all students of revolution are familiar with the label which is habitually attached to the intended victims of spoliation. That Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL believes in the adoption of his doctrines by his Council of Legislation is credible only on the supposition that he is too innocent a recluse to have any right to meddle with worldly transactions.

It is hardly worth while to discuss proposals which could only be realized at the cost of a subversive and probably bloody revolution; or it might be more accurately asserted that a large part of the scheme would in any circumstances be impracticable. As an illustration of Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL's ignorance or carelessness, his estimate of the average agricultural value of land at 50s. an acre may be worth noting, though it has no bearing on his arguments. In the first instance, he proposes to raise for the purchase of land 150,000,000l., to be secured by rentals of cottages and gardens, and another sum of indefinite magnitude to be levied by a property tax on "the rich." On the land which is to be so purchased skilled artisans are to be settled with the legal privilege of working only for eight hours a day. There is not the slightest reason why the favoured class, or the unskilled majority of workmen, should not on the same principle relieve "the rich" of the remainder of their superfluities; but revolutionary projectors are always minutely specific in defining the limits of plunder. Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL's Preamble, as he calls it, or detailed exposition of his scheme, is framed in the imperative terms of an Act of Parliament; and perhaps he may be regarded by DILKE, BRADLAUGH, and ODGER as a competitor for the office of Dictator in the future Republic. In one respect his aims are more ambitious than those of any of his rivals, for he intends to abolish in respect to food, and probably as to other commodities, not only the class of tradesmen, but the distinction between wholesale and retail prices. The State is to take care that food is conveyed direct from the producer to the market, and that it is there divided, without superfluous charge, according to the wants of the consumers. It is to be part of the duty of the mayor of every village and town "to see that a market is established on the common land as one of his public buildings, and to see that market provided first hand and wholesale with the best food at the cheapest price, and to ensure full weight and honest delivery." It will of course also be his duty to take care that the three-hooped pot has ten hoops, and generally to effect in the ordinary course of administration the other reforms in which Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL was long since anticipated by JACK CAPP. A final appeal to "my lords, gentlemen, and fellow-workmen" to take all these measures proposed into consideration is perhaps intended to be ironical. The follow-workmen who are to buy by retail at wholesale prices for the supply of households established at the expense of "the rich" would probably not object to the adoption of Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL's scheme, although most of them have sufficient sagacity to distrust his ability to effect his professed objects. His reason for keeping up the solemn farce of a Council of Legislators who are to discuss and pass Socialist laws is probably the same which induces dealers in patent medicines to advertise the infirmities and the miraculous cure of some unfortunate nobleman. The puff in the first instance succeeded beyond expectation; but it is now reinserted with diminished effect. The plan is itself neither new nor ingenious; and it would have been better adapted to English tastes if the greater part of it had not been plagiarized from French books and pamphlets. The mayor who is to superintend the distribution of food at wholesale prices is not an insular functionary. It will be long before even skilled artisans will be disposed to allow public officers to manage for them all their own private business. The purchase of land at the expense of "the rich" for the benefit of skilled workmen is but an awkward substitution for the more sweeping measures of the International Society, the Land and Labour League, and the other revolutionary Clubs. It is highly probable that Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL has calculated on the unwillingness of the members of his Council of Legislation to contradict once more the implied assertion that they are in any way connected with his project. On the whole, they will perhaps show sound judgment by maintaining silence. The intellectual food which Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL provides ought, according to his own system, to be conveyed direct from the producer to any consumer who can be found; and the mediating peers who are to find customers and manage the distribution of nonsense to the populace ought, like private butchers, to be superseded by the State.

LORD DERBY AT LIVERPOOL.

THERE is no reason to doubt the sincerity with which Lord DERBY has repudiated the idea of aspiring to the formal leadership of the Conservative party; but if he had any intention of reconsidering his refusal to occupy that position, he could not have produced a more judicious and persuasive manifesto than was embodied in his speech to the Conservative Working-Men's Association at Liverpool. Although nominally addressed to working-men, it was evidently intended for the serious consideration of the two sections into which the Conservative party happens to be divided, as well as of an important and highly influential section of those who still profess allegiance to Mr. GLADSTONE. There are, it is known, Conservatives who are eager for the ostentation and patronage of official authority, who believe that if their party had the distribution of places, the control of the finances, and the privilege of drafting Ministerial measures, even under the peremptory and contemptuous dictation of their most violent opponents, it would be a gain to the body of opinion which they represent, and at least a personal gratification to those who have espoused their cause. There are others who hold that the object of a great party should be, not the mere official advancement of its leaders and members, but the practical ascendancy of the principles with which it is identified, and that the promotion of Conservative policy is more important than the promotion of Conservative politicians. To them it is a comparatively small matter on which hand of the Speaker their representatives may happen to sit, as long as they are assured that revolutionary changes are vigorously resisted, and that the old lines of the Constitution are respected and maintained. In their view the first aim of the party should be to secure leverage for its opinions, and there is a disposition to believe that this leverage can be more effectually and securely obtained in Opposition than in office. It is to this division of the Conservatives that Lord DERBY has proclaimed his adhesion. He warns those who still hanker after place of the danger and ignominy which, judging from experience, are certain to attend any attempt to form an Administration with a minority in the House of Commons. If a genuine majority can be created, it would of course be a breach of duty to evade the responsibilities of office; but in the meantime the wisest course is to support the moderate Liberals in restraining the subversive ardour of the more advanced sections of the party, and to be content with power rather than place. The Education Act is a very good example of the legislative results which may be expected from a policy of judicious compromise; and most of the questions which demand attention, might, Lord DERBY thinks, be dealt with in a similar manner.

and with no less satisfactory results. The argument which is thus addressed to the Conservatives appeals with equal force to the class of Liberals whose co-operation is desired, and who are justly assumed to have no sympathy with the revolutionary crudities and anarchical violence of the agitators with whom they are accidentally associated.

The advantage of the course which Lord DERBY recommends to his party is that in following it they will be not only turning their present minority to the best account, but taking the most effectual means of converting it into a majority, and strengthening themselves for office should an opportunity of entering upon it be legitimately presented. It is impossible that an active Administration can be established on a policy of pure negation; and it is a conspicuous and welcome feature of Lord DERBY's speech, which distinguishes it from most of the addresses that have been delivered by Conservative orators during the recess, that he has a distinct practical policy to propose on each of the questions upon which he touches. He may be assumed to be expressing his own personal experience when he remarks that new subjects of controversy are taking the place of the old Liberal programme, and that on these new questions public opinion inclines to Conservative rather than to Radical views. It is probable that hereditary influences have determined, in more ways than one, the peculiar position which Lord DERBY has hitherto occupied in politics. He appears to have taken up the principles which his father espoused in early life, and to have found himself unable to resist the logical conclusions to which they carried him. The Reform Act of 1832 justified in advance the demand for an extension of the franchise at a subsequent period, and the disestablishment of the Irish Church was in principle conceded by the emancipation of the Catholics from civil disabilities. The crop of measures which seemed to follow naturally and in logical sequence upon the legislation of former years is now exhausted, and Lord DERBY is less embarrassed in dealing with the new subjects which have been brought forward. It is a safe but irrelevant admission that if we were framing a Constitution for the first time we should not establish an hereditary assembly similar to the House of Lords. The question is not what should be done under an imaginary and impossible set of circumstances, but what should be done with an existing institution in the actual state of society. The chief recommendation of the House of Lords is that it owes its existence, not to a theoretical conception of what might be best in an ideal Constitution, but to the gradual and historical developments of our political system. Lord DERBY does not agree with Lord MALMESBURY's doctrine that a peerage carries an endowment with it in the commercial value which a titled family enjoys in the matrimonial market; and in order to remove what he considers the scandal and danger of pauper peers, he would try the experiment of a limited number of peerages for life, to be created, however, under Parliamentary regulation and not by the Royal prerogative which has now become only another name for the arbitrary will of a majority of the House of Commons. In stating the necessity which in his opinion exists for a more scientifically organized Court of Appeal, Lord DERBY did not explain what relation he desires that it should bear to the House of Lords; but the legal profession may perhaps see reason to be apprehensive of a reformer who is audacious enough to attack the Long Vacation, and to hint that the Lord Chancellor ought not to be a member of the Government.

It may be assumed from Lord DERBY's remarks on the Ballot that, although he believes that the political importance of the measure has been much exaggerated, he is disposed to assent to it, if provision can be made for a scrutiny as a check upon personation. It is difficult to say to what extent frauds of this nature might be practised, but the experience of France and America would seem to point to the dishonest enumeration of votes as a more serious evil. In establishing a system of secret voting, it is necessary to remember the peculiar temptations which it will create, and that there is no security for the returning officers, upon whose integrity so much will depend, being henceforth chosen from the same class as at present. Recent disclosures at New York have shown how simply and effectually a community can be enslaved by the appointment of one or two unscrupulous officials, who at once become masters of the situation. It was not to be supposed that the intolerant fanaticism of the United Kingdom Alliance would find favour with a politician of Lord DERBY's temper. He leans to the plan, which the exceptional experience of Liverpool is certainly not sufficient to condemn, of leaving the liquor trade open, and enforcing very strict regulations as to hours and management. After the reception which Mr. GOSCHEN's Rating Bill met with last Session, it is scarcely conceivable that it will again be brought forward, even in a disguised form; and Lord DERBY's warning on the subject is perhaps less necessary than his indication of a possible danger into which the Government may fall in attempting a vast scheme of sanitary reform on a national scale, instead of being content merely to provide more effective machinery for enforcing existing laws and more minute and careful supervision of small local details, which may appear to be comparatively insignificant in themselves, but which, like the infusoria, are very serious in the aggregate. Lord DERBY's prayer for a commonplace Budget will be widely echoed; but his recommendation that something should be done at this season of prosperity to reduce the Debt should, considering to whom it was addressed, have been qualified by the condition that a reduction should be effected only in the most direct and simple manner, and that care should be taken not to pay off with one hand what must immediately be put on again with the other. The caution against Socialist projects for emptying towns into the country, cutting up the fields into flower-gardens, and making everybody happy by Acts of Parliament, was certainly not uncalled for, and it is to be regretted that the fantastic scheme which Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL borrowed from Continental Communists was not received in the first instance with equally distinct and emphatic repudiation by the politicians to whom it was disclosed. As to Ireland, Lord DERBY agrees with the IRISH SECRETARY, that all that can be done for the present is to be patient and firm, and expresses a hope that the firmness will include a determination not to depend on the priests as a means of governing the country. His tone on foreign affairs is perhaps too much that of a man who hugs himself with the thought of stout shutters and a snug hearth, whatever storms may rage without. Of course, if there is no chance of our doing any good by interfering in a foreign quarrel, there may be consolation in the thought that at least we can keep ourselves out of it; but mere neutrality for its own sake should hardly be the highest aspiration of statesmanship. Perhaps the best way to appreciate such a speech as Lord DERBY's is to read it along with Sir J. PAKINGTON's speech at Rochdale on the succeeding evening. Sir JOHN has nothing to offer us but a réchauffé of laments over the legislation of the last three years, and all the old stories about Ministerial mismanagement, without the faintest suggestion of a principle or policy for future guidance. His speech is a dirge for the dead rather than a prescription for the living. If politicians of this class would only reflect that recent legislation, whether for good or evil, has been the work, not of the Ministry alone, but of the Ministry and the country together, they would perhaps see that, unless we are to sit down in despair and bury our heads in ashes, the proper course is to accept conclusions which cannot be altered, and try to make the best of them, not by mere wailing, but by practical proposals.

SANITARY REFORM.

THE first move in the sanitary reform of next Session ought not to be a very troublesome undertaking. It will be to create the authorities by whom the law is to be administered. A short Act of Parliament may constitute the Town Council, the Local Board, the Commissioners administering special Acts, the Board of Guardians, or whatever other body the Government may determine on, the local authority for all purposes of public health within the area over which they severally have jurisdiction. As soon as this measure has become law, there will everywhere be some one sanitary authority, and nowhere more than one. All confusion and uncertainty as to who are the proper persons to apply to on sanitary matters will thus be removed. This will of itself effect a considerable improvement. Wherever the inhabitants of a district are really anxious to guard against disease, they will be able to give effect to their anxiety by electing Town Councillors or Guardians, who will put into action the powers conferred on them by the existing law. The seed of sanitary reform will have been universally sown, and it may be trusted even without any further care to grow up in favourable soils. Later on will come the consolidation and amendment of the statutes relating to public health. It is of the utmost importance that the duties of the sanitary authorities should be so set forth as that every person living within the area they administer shall know exactly what it is he is entitled to demand of them. At present no one knows even to whom to apply, but the bringing this knowledge within the reach of everybody would be an imperfect victory if it were not accompanied by the knowledge under what circumstances to make the application. The statute which consolidates all previous sanitary Acts ought to constitute the entire code on the subject of Public Health. It should be prepared with a view to its being referred to by the public, as well as by officials or experts, and it should be edited under the direction of the Local Government Board with such notes and examples as may put every reader in possession of the services which the sanitary authority is bound to render him. Even if nothing more were done than to designate the authority and to remove all uncertainty as to what the functions of that authority embrace, an immense reform would be secured. Much of the prevailing sanitary neglect is due to the confusion that exists almost universally on these two points.

It is not, however, to be desired that this consolidating process should immediately follow upon the creation of the administrative authorities. Important as it is to get such a code as has been described, there are good reasons why its preparation should not be hurried. In the first place, if the Act is to have the right effect, it must be drawn with unusual care. It would be better to wait a year for a thoroughly satisfactory code than to get one forthwith which might turn out to want amendment the following Session. In the next place, there is a good deal that must form part of any perfect code which is not included in any of the statutes now in force. Either, therefore, amendment must precede consolidation, or consolidation and amendment must be effected by a single process. Where sanitary matters are concerned, the latter alternative is objectionable on two grounds. It wastes time and it provokes opposition. If the Government are able to say that the Consolidating Bill makes no alteration in the law, they may fairly hope to get it passed without much comment. If they have to admit that some of the provisions are new, they may not find it possible to confine the debate to the new matter. The discussion may travel over the whole contents of the Bill, and clauses which in a measure of simple consolidation would have excited no remark may be hotly contested because they occur in a measure which is also one of amendment. It seems the wiser policy, therefore, to invest the sanitary authorities, whether local or central, with such additional powers as may be required before consolidating the law, and then to incorporate these new provisions into the final code. Probably this undertaking may prove less troublesome than it may at first appear. Very extensive powers have already been conferred upon the various bodies which now occupy the ground, and when these bodies are reduced to unity, it may be found that by a little extension of their powers, and a general substitution of "shall" for "may" in the clauses which confer them, all that is really needed will be secured. If those alterations had to be set out in the first instance in connexion with the enactments to which they are designed to give vigour, they might excite more opposition.

To define what new powers are required would be to draft the Sanitary Bill. But, without going to this length, it may be possible to indicate the direction in which it seems desirable to move. It must be borne in mind at starting that the standard of sanitary administration is necessarily a varying one. What are now regarded as the best established conclusions of sanitary science may be discredited in a few years, and precautions supposed to be unimportant to-day may by to-morrow have come to be accepted as essential. It will be a serious hindrance to the ordinary business of legislation if a Sanitary Reform Bill has to be included in the programme of every Session. Unless the public are to be disgusted by the irrepressible vitality of this unsavoury subject, some means must be devised by which the required improvements can be introduced from time to time without the passing of an Act of Parliament. The machinery of the Education Act seems to suggest an expedient. The conditions which schools must fulfil in order to obtain a Parliamentary grant are contained in the minutes of the Education Department; but no new minute can come into force until it has lain for a month on the table of both Houses of Parliament. In like manner the sanitary conditions on which the Local Government Board intend to insist might be embodied in a set of minutes to be added to or varied from time to time. The final adoption of any such addition or alteration would of course be deferred until there had been an opportunity of raising a discussion on them in both Houses of Parliament; but in the great majority of cases the changes, as in the case of the Educational Revised Code, would become law as a matter of course. In this way the omissions or mistakes incident to the subject and to the novelty of the work to be done would be supplied or corrected with the least possible trouble. The Education Act may furnish some other hints as to the relations between the central and local authorities. The mode of dealing with a sluggish or refractory School Board might be applied almost as it stands to the case of a sluggish or refractory Town Council or Board of Guardians. The 18th Section of the Education Act provides that, "if at any time the Education Department are satisfied that a School Board have failed to perform their duty," they may send them a peremptory requisition, and if the School Board do not comply with this requisition within the time prescribed in it, "such Board shall be deemed to be a School Board in default." The Education Department may then take their choice between two modes of proceeding. The 66th Section gives them power to dissolve the School Board, and to order another election. The 63rd Section authorises them to nominate a new School Board, the members of which shall hold office until the Department are satisfied that the default has been remedied. The Sanitary Commissioners recommend that, on the default of a Local Health authority, the central authority should have clear power to recover penalties from the defaulter, or itself to execute the works ordered, and to charge the outlay on the rates of the defaulting district. Stringent clauses to this effect should certainly be included in the new sanitary statute, so far as they are not already conferred by previous Acts. But the milder methods of a new election in large districts, or of nominating a new authority in districts where a new election might fail to change the composition of the local authority, would in most cases be found adequate to the need, while they might give less offence than the performance of the duty by the agents of the Local Government Board.

It may also be a matter for consideration whether the machinery of Parliamentary grants might not be called in to lighten, as regards the most deserving cases, the money pressure of sanitary improvements. The knowledge that if a school is not maintained in a proper state of efficiency the whole instead of a portion of the expenses will fall on the rates, will probably exert a wholesome influence on many economically minded School Boards. If the same principle could be applied to the sanitary expenditure of the Local Health authorities, they might often find it cheaper to do the work thoroughly, with the prospect of having the outlay defrayed in part out of the Consolidated Fund, than to do it imperfectly, with the prospect of having their application rejected. It would be the business, of course, of the Local Government Board to see that no unnecessary expense was incurred from this motive; but, as between two outlays equally sanctioned by the central authority, there seems no reason why the larger, if it were also the more beneficial, should not obtain a proportionate amount of aid.

THE TRADE-UNIONISTS' CONGRESS.

THE National Congress of Trade Unions has met this week at Nottingham, and there has been much discussion of an Act of the last Session of Parliament intended to check practices which had become intolerable. The processes of rattening have been described in the Report of a Commission, and they have furnished Mr. CHARLES READE with material for a novel which was afterwards turned into a play. Few persons will believe, after all that has been written on this subject, that no special legislation was required. But we find that the Congress objected not only to particular provisions of the Act, but to the Act itself. There has been a conviction under the Act before the magistrates at Bolton, and an appeal to Quarter Sessions, which, according to a speaker at the Congress, "involved an expense of 200l." We should think it must be rather a nice thing for a lawyer to be employed by the Society which took up this appeal in such an exceedingly handsome manner. The appeal was from Petty Sessions to Quarter Sessions—held at the same place, Bolton—and there was no dispute as to the facts; so it is difficult to understand how it could be possible to expend any sum like 200l. upon the case. Complaint was made that if a man had no funds he could not appeal, and must suffer the punishment awarded. This complaint, however, might be brought against other provisions of this law, or against any criminal law. Unfortunately it does, and always will, make a difference whether an accused person can pay lawyers to defend him. There has been, however, if we may trust to ordinary channels of information, a large number of cases in which there could not be any doubt as to the commission of acts which are offences under the new law; and, in truth, the persons committing the acts avowed and gloried in them. Without entering at this moment into discussion of the Bolton case, we may venture to say that magistrates would do well not to convict in any except clear cases. As we do not expect Parliament, with or without the assistance of this Congress, to define the word "coerce," it must be left to magistrates to say whether acts proved before them amount to coercion, and if they feel doubtful on this point they must abstain from conviction. We think, however, that, subject to an appeal as provided by the Act, magistrates may be safely trusted with the jurisdiction which the Act confers on them. To call this Act "class legislation" appears to us to be unmeaning vituperation. It was primarily intended to protect some members of a class against other members of it, and unless we are entirely mistaken that protection was strongly needed. The clause against which complaint was particularly directed at the Congress was that which makes it criminal to "watch or beset" the house or place where a person resides, or works, or carries on his business. According to Mr. MUNDELLA, who, together with Mr. AUBERON HERBERT, "looked in" at the Congress, this clause in its present shape was introduced in the House of Lords, and he and other members of the House of Commons were outvoted in opposing it when it came before them in the small hours of the morning. We are not concerned to maintain that the words of the clause are the best that could be chosen to express the meaning of its authors, and we certainly think that the House of Commons between 1 and 2 A.M. is the worst possible place for discussing a verbal question of criminal law. It will be open to Mr. MUNDELLA to propose any amendment of this clause in the ensuing Session, and there are very few chapters in the Statute-book of which the language could not be improved. But we may at least say that Parliament knew what it meant when it passed this Act, and we doubt whether the speakers at this Congress will induce Parliament to depart from its intention of protecting working-men against each other. We think it very unlikely that any person convicted under the Act will be unable to find the means of prosecuting an appeal; and, indeed, in the Bolton case, complaint is made that, whereas the defendant appeared to support his appeal at an expense of 200l., the magistrates who had convicted him did not appear by counsel to support their decision, and he had a very narrow escape of seeing his conviction quashed without argument, which would have been regarded by himself and his friends as the crowning grievance. It certainly is hard, after spending 200l. in law, not to have what is vulgarly called a run for your money. However, in the nick of time the prosecutor turned up, and the case was argued, and judgment has been given on it.

It is remarkable that, while this Congress demanded the repeal of the Act against coercion, it was equally urgent for the passing of an Act for the regulation of mines. As Mr. MACDONALD rather too eloquently says, the periodical slaughters which occur in mines "shake the heart of humanity to its centre," and it appears probable that the Government will hardly be able by any mismanagement to avoid accomplishing legislation upon this subject in the ensuing Session. We should have thought, however, that Mr. READE, or somebody else who writes as powerfully as Mr. MACDONALD speaks, might have called the system of rattening at Sheffield a "Juggernaut of destruction" quite as reasonably as Mr. MACDONALD applies that term to the neglect to inspect mines. There is, indeed, this difference, that an Act against rattening would operate in restraint of workmen, whereas an Act compelling more frequent inspection of mines would be inconvenient to masters. We do not find that any speaker at the Congress denied Mr. MUNDELLA's statement that rattening at Sheffield had done more injury to the working-men of England than all that their opponents could have done. The delegates do not like the Act, and that is all they have to say. They admit that the Trade Unions' Act, passed at the same time, is a valuable measure, although in some points capable of amendment; but they refuse to register their Societies under this Act until the Criminal Act of the same date is repealed. There was indeed a difference of opinion in the Congress upon this question, and Mr. ODEAN sensibly proposed that, as this was the case, they should not talk any more about it. The members of Parliament who "looked in" at the Congress could not, of course, go far in the utterance of unpalatable truth; but it might be well if any person to whom these Unionists would listen with respect would tell them plainly that it will be time enough to propose the repeal of the Criminal Act when they are able to show Parliament that it is unnecessary. A learned gentleman who read a paper at the Congress objected to this Act, on the ground that cases of actual violence which had been punished under it might have been punished more severely under the general law.

After this we cannot help thinking that there is not much to be said against the Act, except the vague complaint that it is an "implied stigma" on Trade-Unionists. One speaker urged that there should be no conviction under the Act except upon the verdict of a jury; but a case could not well come before a jury unless sent to them by a magistrate; so that a magistrate must, under any circumstances, give a decision upon the case. We think that the law is necessary, and that magistrates may be trusted, subject to appeal, to convict under it, but we would repeat our advice to them only to convict in perfectly clear cases. When the law can be shown to be unnecessary, all political parties will gladly concur in its repeal. But revolutions only a few years old have fixed in our mind an impression of the blind submission of the working class to unscrupulous leaders, which cannot be immediately dissipated even by the fact that Mr. AUBERON HERBERT condescends to address their Congress.

A case occurred at the Hammersmith Police Court on Thursday which opportunely illustrates the working of the Criminal Act. A man named JOHN TURK was summoned by Mr. HENRY GWYNNE, engineer, "for molesting him by watching his premises to coerce him." The men at Messrs. GWYNNE's works had demanded the nine hours' rule, but their employers declined for the present to accept it. Hereupon the men gave notice to leave, and left. On Monday last JOHN TURK distributed in front of Messrs. GWYNNE's works handbills appealing to the men employed there not to enter into any engagement except under the nine hours' rule, and adding, "by so refusing you will forward our cause, as well as your own as working-men." It was proved that TURK used a threat to a man named PIKE, but the summons was for watching Mr. GWYNNE "with a view to coerce him." The magistrate held that the words "by so refusing you will forward our cause" showed intention to coerce Mr. GWYNNE. He, in effect, found that TURK "beset" the premises of Messrs. GWYNNE to compel them to alter the mode of carrying on their business, and this is an offence under the Act. The defendant was convicted, but there will probably be an appeal, and a liberal subscription for the costs of it. Judgment was also given on Thursday on the appeal in the Bolton case, and the learned Recorder of Bolton held that the conviction could not be supported. In that case a man named COOPER owed a fine to a Society, and the defendant WEARDEN, who worked at the same place as COOPER, represented to the employers that a man was on the job who was objectionable because he would not pay his fine. To put the matter shortly, WEARDEN applied for COOPER's discharge as a means of compelling him to pay his fine; but he did not "watch or beset" the place where COOPER worked, with a view to coerce him to pay the fine. Being employed at the same place, he spoke to the employer about COOPER, but he cannot be said to have "watched or beset" a place where he was doing his regular work. When the facts are clearly stated, it becomes manifest that the magistrates were wrong in convicting, and it is to be regretted, although it is inevitable, that magistrates should sometimes make mistakes. It would have been easy for the Home Office to supply a clear exposition of the Act which would have prevented this mistake; but that is too simple and obvious a step to be adopted in our legal practice.

THE ALMANACH DE GOTHÄ.

IN these revolutionary days it is pleasant to find that there is no falling off in the pious loyalty of the Almanach de Gotha, which still holds fast to its old faith in kings and princes, although it has been compelled, after a severe struggle, to accommodate its theory of divine right to the exigency of events, and to admit that the people of a country may deserve some notice as well as the sovereign and his Court. It now boasts of an existence of more than a century, and during that period has been the witness and historian of a succession of startling changes in the condition of Europe. It has seen three monarchies, two Empires, and three Republics succeed each other in France. It has seen Prussia overthrow France, and France overthrow Prussia; the collapse of the Holy Roman Empire, and the establishment of a new German Empire; the ejection of the Bourbons from Spain, as well as from their other principalities, and the deposition of the Pope as a temporal sovereign. In its early days it had a bitter contest with the first Napoleon, whom it endeavoured to ignore as a usurper, and who in turn revenged himself upon it for its fidelity to the Bourbons. "The last Almanach de Gotha," the Emperor wrote in 1807, "is irregularly done. In the first place, it contains the name of Count de Lille (Louis XVIII.), and then it mentions all the princes of the Confederation, as if no changes had taken place in Germany; likewise the names of the family of France appear in improper terms. Send for the Minister of Gotha, and make him understand that in the next almanack all this must be changed." There were some years when the Almanack hardly dared to appear at all, and for a time its publication was fitful and irregular. In more recent days it has also had to struggle between its political sympathies and its duty as a chronicler of events. It evaded as long as possible an acknowledgment of the changes which followed the Italian war, and dethroned princes still find friendly and respectful shelter in its pages. The Royal exiles—with whom Candide supped at Venice were six in number, but some of them had never actually reigned. A large party of ejected sovereigns might now be got together. The Almanack has not forgotten, if the world has, Ferdinand IV. of Tuscany, Francis V. of Modena, Robert of Parma, and Francis II. of the Two Sicilies, who still cling to their titles, although they appear to have abandoned the ceremony of fictitious Courts and nominal Ministers. The Elector of Hesse and the King of Hanover, Queen Isabella of Spain, and the Emperor Napoleon might also be bidden to the dimal feast, together with the Count of Chambord and the Count of Paris, one at least of whom considers himself a monarch in everything save territory and subjects. The Pope, too, might run up from Rome to bless the gathering. Even the Almanack has given up the territorial sovereignty of the Pope, who now figures under a personal heading, "Le Pape," while the Cardinals are enumerated under the title of "Saint Siège Apostolique," which oddly enough comes by alphabetical arrangement between St. Domingo and the Sandwich Islands. This, however, is not so grotesque as the toy duchy of Anhalt following immediately after the German Empire in the catalogue of Royal Houses. Until this year the editor, with local reverence, placed the Duke of Saxe-Cobourg first of all sovereigns, but the German Emperor—the Almanack says Emperor "of," but we had a notion it was to be "in" Germany—now occupies the post of honour, and Saxe-Cobourg has to take its turn alphabetically with the rest. France has always been a source of great embarrassment to the compiler of the modern Book of Kings. He has never been sure what might not happen from month to month in that volcanic country, where the constitutional architecture is of that light temporary character which is suitable to constructions on a crust of lava. Last year he was driven to the expedient of putting France at the very end of the book, so that additions or corrections could be made down to the latest moment before publication; and this year he has done the same, showing very plainly his opinion of the stability of the existing arrangements. The address of the heads of the "Maison Bonaparte" is at present "England"; and as the cautious remark which was appended last year—actuellement non régnante—is not repeated, it may perhaps be inferred that an Imperial restoration has ceased to be considered imminent. The two other pretenders to the throne appear under the head of their respective families.

After the reigning sovereigns and those who assert a right to reign come the princes and counts who have no pretensions to sovereignty—a large and motley swarm. This is perhaps the most characteristic part of the volume. It is possible to take an interest in kings and emperors without being intensely monarchical; they are at least substantial facts, and possess an historical importance which even the most violent Republican would not attempt to dispute. But princes who are princes only in name, the disembodied ghosts of departed principalities, or mere modern nobles dubbed "prince" for the sake of the empty title, without having ever been associated with a principality of any kind—these must be loved and worshipped purely for their own sake. A register of them is valuable, of course, for historical purposes, just as any peerage or parish directory might be; and it is natural that people who live near them and have to do with them in the flesh should be anxious to know all about them. We are not aware that Burke or Debrett has been translated into French for European circulation, although these works are reputed to enjoy a kind of Biblical authority in certain sections of British society. That even in Gotha it should be imagined that keen international curiosity exists on the subject of the Pücklers and Pappenheims, the Lobkowitzes and Quadt-Wykradts, and all the interminable tribe of Salms and Hohenlohes, is surely amazing. We have no doubt, for example, that Count Ferdinand Wurmbrand-Stuppach, Baron of Steyersberg, Stickleberg, Reitenau and Neubaum, Seigneur of Stuppach, "Grand-Écuyer de Bouche héréditaire" in the Duchy of Styria, Chamberlain, and captain of Austrian cavalry, proprietor of the majorats of Steyersberg, Stickleberg, and Forst, &c. &c., is a great man in his own neighbourhood—almost as great, perhaps, as a Chairman of Quarter Sessions who also represents his county in Parliament; and possibly people at Stuppach and Stickleberg are never tired of reading about him and his brothers and sisters, and aunts and uncles, and all his cousins to the third and fourth degrees. We question, however, whether this kind of reading is likely to be much in request away from Stickleberg. The only consolation is that the number of princes seems to be gradually diminishing. A new one was made this year, and we can fancy that it may have rather strained Count Bismarck's loyalty to consent to be mixed up with the shadowy princelings among whom he is now enrolled; but, on the other hand, the Pückler-Muskau have just flickered out. If we turn back to any early copy of the Almanack, before the Holy Roman Empire had collapsed, we shall find that some 300 minor sovereigns, sovereign or quasi-sovereign, were enumerated; but, with the exception of a few reigning princes, these have now been reduced to 468 families, not counting subdivisions.

out sovereignty, of whom 49 enjoy the distinction of being addressed as "Most Serene," or rather "Most Transparent" (Durchlaucht), Highness, which was conferred on them by the German Confederation in 1825. In addition, there are 30 "Majestés comtales," the heads of which have a right to the title of "Most Illustrious" (Erlaucht). Prince Bismarck, it may be mentioned, is one of the Serenities, and is, we suppose, entitled to wear a red hat if he chooses. Of course the counts and princes are not all German; there are French, Italian, Dutch, and Polish families among the number; a strange collection of old and new, some genuine relics of territorial chiefs, and some descendants of the mushroom growth of princes which sprang up after the dissolution of the Empire, while others are of quite modern manufacture.

When the editor of the Almanack had so far mitigated the rigour of his divine right principles as to admit actual sovereigns into his catalogue whatever might have been their origin or the means by which they ascended the throne, there seemed to be no reason why he should not take notice of any form of government which happened to be in existence, whether monarchical or not. Logic and sentiment, however, do not always run together, and we can conceive what a pang it must have cost to find a place, not only for the President of the United States or of a French Republic, but for the chiefs of dusky commonwealths, such as Liberia and St. Domingo. The diminutive Republics of Andorre and San Marino are not overlooked in the enumeration of the different States of Europe. Andorre is under the protection of France and the Bishop of Urgel, to each of whom it pays in turn a tribute of about 35*l.* a year. It is governed by a Council-General of twenty-four members, which is elected for four years by a constituency composed of four heads of families from each parish, while executive functions are entrusted to a Syndic appointed by the Council. The area of the Republic is about 400 kilometres square, and the population is variously estimated at from 4,000 to 12,000. San Marino is governed by a couple of Captain-Regents, who are changed every six months, and possesses a couple of Secretaries of State and a Commander-in-Chief. About 7,000 inhabitants occupy the mountain ridge which constitutes the territory of the Republic. By the side of these tiny Republics may be placed the microscopic monarchy of Monaco, covering 15 kilometres square. The Prince has his Council of State, three aides-de-camp, a couple of maids of honour, and some 3,000 subjects. The most significant change in the contents of the Almanack is the continually increasing space which is given to statistics and other information relative to the institutions and population of each country. The early editions of the work were made up exclusively of genealogical notices of Royal and princely personages, with some slight padding in the shape of sentimental anecdotes, tales, and scraps of natural history. The padding has disappeared, and more than half of the volume is now filled with the "Annuaire Diplomatique et Statistique." "I wish," Lord Palmerston wrote to his brother at Naples in 1834, "you could contrive to put something more into your despatches than the movements of the Royal family. Tell us now and then about the internal state of the country as to commerce, finance, army, &c." The diplomatists have taken the hint, and the veteran courtier of Clutha has followed their example. This part of his annual volume is always growing, and one of these days we shall perhaps find the "Serenities" and "Transparencies" cut out to make room for more information about the domestic and constitutional features of each country. From this section of the Almanack it may not be amiss to borrow a few figures which should interest the sanguine politicians who profess to believe in an unbroken reign of peace. The reorganization of the Russian army which has just been decreed will supply, in addition to local troops and militia, a body of 1,234,460 men in the European portion of the Empire, ready to be mobilized for war at any moment, while there will be a standing army in time of peace of 730,000 men, without counting the Cossacks and militia. The peace army of the German Empire numbers 383,899 men, the war army 1,261,081, of whom 651,716 will be ready to take the field at once. It might be worth while to have these figures read out in the House of Commons occasionally.

COMPETITIVE EXAMINATIONS IN AMERICA.

PRESIDENT GRANT recently appointed a Commission in order to consider the best means of reforming the Civil Service of the United States. The Commissioners have made a Report recommending substantially the adoption of a system of competitive examinations after the English model. There seems to be a fair prospect that their recommendations will be adopted in practice. The President proposes to give effect to them during his own tenure of office, and invites Congress to pass a law in order to make the system binding upon his successors. Up to a certain point we can see in the proposed change nothing but reasons for congratulation. The mode of appointment which has hitherto prevailed in the United States has been one of the greatest blot on their system of government. All the degrading influences of party politics have been intensified by the habit of regarding public offices, from judgeships down to postmasterhips, as spoils to be distributed amongst the adherents of the conquerors. Every intelligent American has been perfectly willing to admit the greatness of the evil; but hitherto it has been generally regarded as an evil from which no relief could be anticipated. Lately, however, it appears to have dawned upon the mind of the people that, on the whole, it is a mistake to allow the Government to be in the hands of thieves; and they even appear to be drawing the further inference that their system should not be such as to offer the greatest possible attraction to thieves. It would be too sanguine to anticipate that an evil which has struck such deep roots will be extirpated at a single blow. Though the Tammany Ring appears for the time to have utterly collapsed, it may be found difficult to render the growth of such combinations impossible for the future; and though at last a President has had the courage to attack a system sanctioned by the practice of forty years, we cannot be sure that perfect purity will be instantaneously produced, and health be immediately restored to the shattered constitution of the body politic. And yet we would not undervalue the importance of the change. It is something that public opinion is turning in the direction of serious efforts at reform; and it is encouraging to remark that the powers of cohesion of romes are less than might have been supposed. If American politicians should once get it into their heads that genuine assaults upon corruption will be more useful at the poll than general denunciations of corruption in party platforms, it is not impossible that very great improvements may be effected within a moderate period.

Considered, then, as a symptom of this very desirable change in public opinion, we can hardly speak too emphatically of the merits of President Grant's proposal. If it is successfully carried out, he will have done more to suppress a profoundly demoralizing system than any of his predecessors, and we shall not grudge him any of the credit which he may receive. In political questions, however, we can only speak relatively. Given the actual circumstances of the country, that measure may be the best which has any chance of adoption. Any mode of appointment is better than downright corruption. It is better to make a man postmaster or keeper of a lighthouse because he can pass a good examination than because he is the friend of somebody who has the ear of another man who has in some way made himself convenient as a party tool. In other words, if the effect of leaving free powers of appointment to any man in authority is that he will abuse his power, it is better to adopt some mechanical test of merit which is at any rate free from that corrupting influence. If the choice lay between appointment from electioneering motives and appointment according to a candidate's weight, or the colour of his hair, or his skill (as was the practice in Lilliput) in jumping over a rope, there is something to be said in favour of any of the latter modes of selection, which at least are not directly mischievous. We congratulate the Americans on having made an effort to extricate themselves from what appeared to be a hopeless slough of despond; and if we were writing for American readers, we should be too much pleased at this result, and too unwilling to throw the slightest damp upon their new-born enthusiasm, to say a word against the proposed plan. We should simply wish to see it carried out as speedily and applied as fairly and decisively as possible. In England, however, we have not to encounter an evil of anything like the same magnitude. Places in public offices were certainly not always given from the highest motives before the introduction on its present scale of the system of competitive examination; but neither was there anything like the unblushing jobbery and total disregard of public interest which prevailed amongst our cousins. We may, therefore, venture to point out without reserve that, if the new system is better than the worst, it is almost equally far from being the best method of appointment. If the Americans adopt our plan, an impetus will doubtless be communicated by way of reaction to ourselves. Some seventy millions of English-speaking people on both sides of the Atlantic will be looking upon success in competitive examinations as the natural aim and end of youth; and they will be inclined to imagine that a practice which is universal amongst the only part of mankind with which they are acquainted rests upon something like infallible authority. They will speedily find it difficult to imagine the bare possibility of any other system, or will at least believe that the only alternative to competitive examination is corrupt influence. In one respect, if we rightly understand the Report of the Commission, the Americans are inclined already to go beyond their model. The Commissioners propose that every branch of the Civil Service shall be divided into grades; and that not only the admission to the lowest grade, but promotion from any grade to that above it, shall depend upon competitive examination. The highest officials alone are to be exempted from the operation of this rule. We have not yet arrived at this pitch of perfection; though, if we go on as we have begun, it is not impossible that we may some day arrive at it. People are in the habit of talking about appointment by competitive examination as if it were identical with appointment by merit; and if that assumption be granted, it is plain that we ought not merely to choose the subalterns of our Civil Service by these means, but also to use the same test in promoting colonels to be generals. In reality, however, the two systems are so far from being coincident that they are mutually exclusive. You are bound in the case of competition only to take into account one particular sort of merit. The whole system would be upset if you could look outside the written papers to select a man who had failed to get as many marks as his competitor, however certain you might be that he was superior to him in every other respect. The moral or intellectual virtues which are not capable of being tested by winning marks are absolutely prohibited from being taken into account. In order that the appointment may not be determined by undue influences, it is forbidden to allow the most weighty considerations to affect the decision. Within the service this is palpably true. The head of an office can tell incomparably better than any Board of Examiners which of his clerks is best calculated for promotion. He is daily applying tests of far more delicacy, and including a far wider range of qualifications, than any written papers of examination; and in this case the injustice of promoting men, not because they were generally deserving and had shown honesty, diligence, and fitness for their employment, but because they had crammed most successfully for an examination, would be too glaring to need exposure. In the primary admission of candidates the same objection does not precisely apply, because, however inadequate the examination test may be, there is no other available means of distinguishing merit, and less harm is therefore done by the assumption that the order of merit in a wider sense corresponds to the order in which the candidates are placed by the examiners. Perhaps, in the absence of any other means, it may be as well to be satisfied with a rough approximation; but it is well to remember that it is nothing more than a rough approximation, and that you must of necessity more or less discourage excellence of any kind, when you not merely do not insist upon its being noticed, but positively forbid any attention being paid to it.

The unfavourable results of such a system may best be seen in its bearing on education. We have applied a great stimulus to learning, but it is distinctly a stimulus to learning of inferior quality. We have before us, for example, a little handbook intended to point out to aspirants the most probable mode of success. It is not badly done for its purpose, and some of the recommendations are sensible enough—such, for example, as the advice to avoid all attempts at “high-flown, flowery, or magniloquent language.” Nor are there any suggestions for deliberately unfair or injurious modes of cramming. The general tendency of the system, however, is obvious. In the first chapter we find the student at once advised to spread his efforts over a good many subjects. It would not be safe, for example, to go in for some examinations resembling those for the Indian Civil Service without studying elementary mathematics, physical science, English composition, history, and literature, and two of the following subjects—French, German, Italian, moral sciences, jurisprudence. The programme is certainly not a very wide one for a liberal education, but it is wide enough to make economy of labour desirable. How this is to be accomplished appears from subsequent details. The student of English history, for example, is to get two books—one an abstract in about a hundred pages, and the other one of the ordinary student's histories of six or eight hundred pages. He is to work these diligently into his mind by constant reading, making abstracts, and setting himself papers. A study of these two works will enable him to answer an amazing variety of questions on history, constitutional law, and biography. Any attempt to go to original sources, or even to study other compilations, would of course be so much waste of time. The marks gained could not be proportional to the labour. A terrible warning is held out of an enthusiast who happened to be well up in geography. He exhausted all his time in elaborately answering one question about certain remote countries, and thus had no time to get marks. This “piece of folly” is properly denounced, and it is obvious that the best safeguard against such eccentricities is not to acquire superfluous knowledge. You will then never be tempted to produce it, and you will make a great saving of time. The student is expressly warned on these principles that he need not acquire more than “a superficial knowledge of physical geography,” though he is recommended to acquire such refreshing pieces of information as the names of all towns with a population of more than fifty thousand. One other recommendation is sufficiently characteristic of the whole system. The examiners have a habit of testing the knowledge of English literature by asking for the authors of certain well-known passages. These questions, we are told, appear “overwhelmingly difficult” to the uninitiated. In fact, many genuine students of English literature would probably be unable to identify off-hand the source from which many such passages are taken. But let the student get Bartlett's Familiar Quotations, and the difficulty vanishes. The test which to the innocent-minded Examiners of an earlier generation appeared sufficient to discover the degree of a lad's acquaintance with literature really discovers nothing more than the fact that he has gone through the improving process of learning a dictionary by heart. Nobody would be fool enough to take the round-about course of exploring the whole field of literature in order to gather opinions for himself when they are all brought together and neatly ticketed for him. It is of course necessary to put a boy through a certain course of studies to many of which he can only be introduced by means of summaries, abstracts, and other aids to knowledge. It may be very proper that he should learn English history on some such system as we have described, if he has no time for anything better. But what we desire to bring out is the obvious and inevitable tendency of all schemes of competitive examination to give an undue premium to the superficial method of study. It not merely fails to encourage more thoroughgoing methods, but it teaches a youth to regard them as positively injurious. He considers that reading books, when you can have summaries of books, is foolish waste of time; and every attempt which the Examiners make to probe the soundness of his knowledge is met by a corresponding move on the part of the “grinders.” The whole art may be said to consist in such devices as substituting for the study of English literature the study of a dictionary of quotations. The more effectually this can be done, the greater the advantage given to the judicious crammer over the systematic learner; and, to judge by the book from which we have been quoting, the art has been brought to a very high degree of refinement.

THE LORD CHAMBERLAIN AND PUBLIC AMUSEMENTS.

THE contradiction which was given by the Daily Telegraph to the report that the Lord Chamberlain had excised from the pantomimes all uncomplimentary allusions to the Ministry, has been followed by an official statement that the excisions were actually made, not indeed by the Lord Chamberlain himself, but by his deputy. The Examiner of Stage Plays has followed the example of his predecessor, Mr. Kemble, in expunging from the manuscripts sent to him for revision all "personal or personally political questions," as well as all passages or words, names or phrases, which seemed to him to be likely to give offence on religious or moral grounds. Mr. Donne, in fact, has done this year only what he has done in all previous years; and it is remarkable that a customary practice should have been resented by managers and authors as if it were a startling innovation of a peculiarly oppressive and injurious character. It is impossible to resist the inference that those whose business it is to make people laugh feel that the interdict against any reference to the Government is at the present time a more serious deprivation than usual. Indeed, they seem to have felt this so strongly that allusions to Mr. Lowe's Budget and Mr. Gladstone's temper have been retained even in defiance of the Lord Chamberlain's authority. The Ministerial jokes were the plums of the pantomime pudding, and could not possibly be spared. De minimis non curat lex, and there is no necessity for enforcing a reasonable and useful law too rigorously against the drolls of the theatre. If humanity revolts at the idea of condemning a learned and accomplished gentleman, not only to read through a score or more of pantomimes and baguettes, but to attend the actual performance of them, and to observe how far his directions have been complied with; and it is obvious that in order to carry out this supervision effectually, Mr. Donne would require to be reinforced by relays of able-bodied assistants, who would have to be very highly paid for so exhausting an occupation. This is perhaps enough in itself to condemn the project in the eyes of an economical Administration. We are afraid that the resources of Scotland Yard, as at present organized, are scarcely equal to the suppression of "gagging." M. Thiers is said to have given strict orders that no jokes against the Prussians are to be permitted on the French stage, and as far as the spoken dialogue is concerned the command is literally obeyed. But when an actor fumbles for his watch and cannot find it, and resignedly makes a gesture descriptive of the spike of a Prussian helmet, the audience has no difficulty in appreciating the jest. The censorship of the stage must always be, to a great extent, a matter of discretion. Mr. Donne is of course bound to adhere to the instructions of his chief and the precedents of the office, and to point out any passages which appear to be objectionable under the rules which have hitherto been observed. But it is no reproach either to him or to the Lord Chamberlain that they do not attempt to ferret out and punish every small infraction of their orders. The censorship is useful rather as the assertion of a principle and as a warning of powers which may, on occasion, be enforced than as a fussy active institution.

Some of our contemporaries have jumped somewhat rashly to the conclusion that, because it is desirable that the censorship of the theatre should not be too minute and meddlesome in its operation, it had better be abolished altogether. The Examiner of Plays has told us in his evidence before the Select Committee of the House of Commons that his interference is rarely called for, and that managers and authors generally endeavour to conform to the requirements of propriety and good taste of their own accord. It does not follow, however, that they would do so to the same extent if all supervision were removed, and if they were free to do as they liked without fear of an interdict from the Lord Chamberlain, or the withdrawal of their license. Good order is generally supposed to be a testimony rather to the efficiency than the uselessness of the police; and the fact that theatrical managers are so conciliatory to the Examiner of Plays, and rather anticipate than infringe his injunctions, may perhaps be regarded as a proof of the usefulness of his office. According to Mr. Donne's evidence in 1866, he had read one thousand eight hundred pieces in the course of twelve years, and of these only nineteen had been condemned. Some of these were French pieces of an unsavoury kind, others were highly flavoured examples of the criminal drama, such as The Blood-Spot; or the Maiden, the Miser, and the Murderer; Old Rotherhithe, or the Female Highwayman; and the Gipsy of Edgware, or the Crime of Gilt's Hill Lane. This last piece was founded on the murder of Mr. Weare, which once before, indeed immediately after the crime was committed, had been produced on the stage, with "the real gig" to add to the attractions. Baron Parke, who tried the murderer, was included in the dramatis personæ. Another condemned play, called the Last Slave, related to the civil war in the United States, which was in progress at the time. A curious passion for Scriptural drama has occasionally broken out in Paris, and the fashion has sometimes spread in a mild way to our own shores. Some years ago the Parisians flocked in crowds to see Daniel surrounded by postboard Hottis and lively ballet-girls, whose scandalous proceedings must have been a severe trial to the prophet. Another popular piece was devoted to the adventures of Susannah. In our own country in recent years dramatic enterprise once took a similar turn. The Prodigal Son and Esther appear to have been tolerated in a modified form, but the Hebrew Son, which was a version of Joseph and his brethren, found a place in the Examiner's Index Expurgatorius. It is possible that a similar predilection for Biblical melodramas might again be displayed, under the stimulating influence either of Paris or Ammergau, and it will be admitted that it is just as well to have an officer whose business it is to restrain such dangerous experiments. As to the rule which excludes party politics from the stage, it is surely reasonable and wholesome. A few good-natured jokes in a pantomime may be hardly worthy of the solemn intervention of a high officer of State, but the general principle involved is a sound one and ought to be sustained. There was once, it seems, a piece ready to be produced at the Adelphi in which the House of Commons was to be represented, and Mr. Buckstone had got himself up as Lord John Russell, when the Lord Chamberlain interposed, and the piece was abandoned. A similar interdict was launched at a version of Cummings, which had been prepared by Mr. Shirley Brooks. Not long ago, however, Mr. Gladstone was nightly personated at the Alhambra by an actor who made up for the part very cleverly, and who sang some verses about "flesh and blood," in a vindictive manner which seemed to gratify the audience. The argument that it is superfluous and inconsistent to maintain a censorship over the stage while the press is free from any such supervision, is open to the obvious remark that, if a man finds a book or a newspaper not to his taste, he has only to put it down, and refrain from reading any more of it; whereas the production of anything on the stage which is offensive to a large portion of the audience is naturally provocative of dissent and disorder. When Addison's Cato was produced, the two great parties of the day attended in order to applaud passages to which they chose to give a political construction favourable to their respective views; but an avowedly political piece, full of hits at public men and questions of the day, would now be apt to provoke something different from a flattering competition of applause. If the drama were to become political, it would be necessary at least to have separate theatres for each set of partisans. It must be an indispensable condition of any entertainment which is offered to a mixed audience that subjects on which there is likely to be any violent disagreement should be scrupulously excluded from it.

It is perhaps significant that one of the most vehement advocates for the abolition of the censorship complains that "the general tendency of the Licensor's influence is to promote mildness, which is pretty much the same thing as tameness, in dramatic literature." It may be inferred that if this restraint were removed, the public would be treated to performances which would be unmistakably free from the reproach of being mild and tame. We are very much disposed to agree with our contemporaries as to the probable result of relaxing the supervision of the stage, although we should regard such a result rather with apprehension than satisfaction. The complaint that the censorship produces "tameness" in dramatic literature is clearly inconsistent with the argument which is coupled with it, that, if there were no system of licensing, managers would of their own accord adhere to those rules of propriety which are now enforced by the Lord Chamberlain. The remonstrances which have from time to time been addressed to managers in regard to the nudity of ballet-girls and the indecency of the dances sufficiently indicate the readiness of some at least of those who cater for the amusement of the public to provide any kind of entertainment which they think will "draw," as well as their opinion of the sort of thing which is likely to prove most attractive. Within a few days a poor wretch has been killed and half eaten by the lions which he professed to have tamed, in the presence of spectators who, to do them justice, were no doubt horrified at the tragic turn which the performance had taken, but whose enjoyment of it on ordinary occasions was greatly heightened by a sense of the danger of the feat. Some years ago lion-queens were put down by the Lord Chamberlain, after one of them had been torn to pieces and two others dreadfully mangled; and perhaps Masarti's fate may cause the interdict to be extended to lion-kings as well. It is obvious that the good taste and delicacy of the public or of its entertainers afford a very imperfect security against disgusting and offensive exhibitions. We have no doubt there is a large body of people who may be trusted not to patronize gross or brutal entertainments; but all they can do is to stay away, and the class to which managers are too often tempted to appeal is sufficiently numerous to render them indifferent to the absence of the more refined and modest section of the community. Even if it could be shown that the censorship does no good, at any rate it does no harm, and the arguments upon which the demand for its abolition are based afford perhaps the best justification of its continuance.

MR. FERGUSSON, MR. STREET, AND THE LAW COURTS.

THE great Law Courts fight has passed into a tangible and satisfactory phase, since the prosecutor-general, Mr. Fergusson, has contributed his acte d'accusation to Macmillan's Magazine, and Mr. Street has published his personal rejoinder. Mr. Fergusson's charges may be summed up under four principal heads. The first is, that Mr. Street has chosen "to devote his undoubted talents to reproduce the art and fashion of the thirteenth century, resolutely shutting his eyes to the fact that he and we are living in the nineteenth." At the same time our critic teaches us, in a rapid précis of the growth of Gothic architecture, that in the fifteenth century on the one hand—

The baronial halls were lighted with tall and spacious windows, and roofed with carved and gilded wood-work of the most elegant designs, and were fitted up for feasting and gaiety, in strange contrast to the gloom of the refectory. Bower and bedroom with large square-headed windows superseded the long gloomy dormitory with its pointed loopholes; light and air were everywhere introduced, and space and brightness symbolized the fulness of manly enjoyment, in contradistinction to the gloom and solitude of the cloister, which was even then fast fading into a thing of the past.

while in regard to the practice of our own age we learn that—

In the early part of this century an attempt was made to obtain galvanic life, by introducing the Grecian style, with all its superior refinements and grace. It was thought that its exquisite elegance and purity would reconcile the public to its manifest incongruity and inconvenience. The effort culminated in the new buildings of the British Museum, which at last opened the eyes of all the world to the absurdity of the attempt, and drove them at once to the opposite extreme.

The second of Mr. Fergusson's charges is that—

To Mr. Street was awarded the Law Courts, because his design was the worst—a perfectly competent tribunal having awarded him only three marks in the competition, while it had assigned Edward Barry forty-three.

The result of the selection of Mr. Street, which we recapitulate in the third place, is that—

It is the accuracy of imitation pervading every detail that makes it so perfectly intolerable. According to this Joshua of architects, the sun of art stood still when Edward III. died in 1377, and has not moved forward since that time. Hence the lawyers of the nineteenth century must be content to lounge in vaulted halls, with narrow windows filled with painted glass, and so dark that they cannot see to read or write in them. They must wander through corridors whose gloom recalls the monkish seclusion of the Middle Ages. They must sit on high straight-backed chairs, and be satisfied with queer-shaped furniture, which it is enough to give one the rheumatism to look at; and no higher class of art must be allowed to refresh their eyes than the heraldic devices, or the crude, ungainly, nightmare paintings of the Middle Ages. It is strange that educated men in the nineteenth century should desire this; but if they do, it is well they should have it in perfection. The more complete the reductio ad absurdum, the sooner the reaction will set in.

The fourth and final charge is that—

The particular crotchet which, besides its anachronism, renders the principal façade so unsatisfactory, is Mr. Street's determination to insist on his great vaulted hall. In his first design this hall was placed east and west, in the centre of the building. It was not seen from the outside, and was useless inside. It was therefore harmless, except that it increased the expense enormously, while it darkened the lights, and rendered the courtyard passages around it noisome and inconvenient. In addition to these trilles, however, it may be added that it is not Gothic, for so far as I know no such vaulted hall was erected for any civil purpose in any country of Europe during the Middle Ages.

In the new designs the hall is placed north and south, and comes so near the front that the temptation was irresistible to justify its introduction by showing it, and making it a feature in the design. It could not, without destroying its supposed use, be brought quite to the front, like Westminster Hall, thus making it the central feature in the façade. It must consequently be seen in perspective at some distance behind, but in order to enable this to be done the façade must be cut in two; and more than this, all the nearer features must be kept small and subdued, so as not to dwarf the distant hall.

On the first of these heads Mr. Street does not vindicate himself so fully as he might have done, although the following statement points to the elements of a defence which would seem, if worked out, to be amply sufficient:—

Any one who will take the trouble to look at my plans will see that they are not inconvenient. Almost all the windows are large, square-headed openings, of an average width of four feet, and they are always placed in the most convenient part for lighting the room. The whole building is most carefully fire-proof in its construction, and in no part have I ignored any modern appliances or uses which present any real advantages. The style I have adopted makes it quite unnecessary that I should do so. It is perfectly free and elastic, and lends itself so easily to every useful requirement as to be infinitely more suitable for a building of such varied requirements than any variation of Classic or Renaissance architecture.

But upon the accusation which we quoted in the third place, although it is little more than a repetition, in other terms, of the first, Mr. Street retorts very roundly (having previously explained that there were on each side of his hall eight of the large windows of two lights apiece):—

My vaulted hall is not a lounging-place for barristers. It is the Westminster Hall of these New Courts—the passage-way to the whole of them—but not likely to be used by barristers at all or ever. The "narrow" windows have each light 5 ft. wide by 30 ft. high. There is no intention on my part to fill them with stained glass. There is not a gloomy corridor in my building; they are all lighted directly from the open air without borrowed or artificial light. I have proposed no "high, straight-backed chairs."

By this it appears that the sum total of the side lighting only of the hall, not to reckon the huge end windows, was an area of 4,800 feet of glazing, embodying surely "the tall and spacious windows" of halls found in Mr. Fergusson's ideal Gothic; while the numerous square-headed windows, in contrast to "pointed loopholes," which are very generally adopted throughout the building, with a breadth to each light of four feet, almost actually fulfil the conditions which have induced Mr. Fergusson to stop and bless that Gothic of the fifteenth century.

Mr. Street might have gone on to show with truth and force that his final scheme not only was not, but could not be, mediæval in any other sense than that in which a Roman building must be classical, from the fact that it had gradually resulted and come together in its multiplied arrangements, and in the dimensions of Law-Courts and rooms, of corridor and courtyard, from the sum total of the hardly consistent injunctions of the many lawyers whom he had to serve, and whose only desire was to realize the maximum of nineteenth-century comfort. But he sums up the principles on which he has acted in the following terms:—

The more I have thought the more certain have I been that there is only one way in which such a building can possibly be made all that it should be, and this is, by setting before myself, as the first object to be obtained, the perfectly convenient arrangement of the floor-plans in every part. The drawings which I have now just completed are the fourth complete scheme which I have had to make. And each scheme has, I feel sure, as far as arrangement goes, been rather better than its predecessor. The details have all been sifted over and over again by all the persons best qualified to judge whether they are suitable for the purpose. They have been thoroughly approved and endorsed by those authorities, and I may assume that in this important respect they may now be held to leave little to be desired. The alterations from the plans approved by the Courts of Justice Commission are in no case alterations of principle. The number of Courts is decreased, and various offices are omitted, but all that remain are arranged in the same manner as in the plan approved by the Commission.

Mr. Fergusson's second charge, involving a distinct imputation of unfairness upon those who appointed Mr. Street to the position, wears a very different aspect in the more extended statements of facts which it has provoked:—

The competition designs were sent in in January, 1867; and in order to assist the judges of design in arriving at a conclusion, four separate investigations were carried on by direction of the Courts of Justice Commission.

(a) A Joint Committee of Barristers and Solicitors was appointed to report on the plans. This was the most important inquiry of all, as the final plan had to be founded on this very report, to the exclusion of all others.

(b) The designs for each department were sent to the several heads of departments, and their opinion was asked as to the comparative merits of the several office-plans in detail.

(c) In December, 1866, two gentlemen (Messrs. Shaw and Pownall) were also asked to make a separate report on the plans.

And—

(d) Finally, Mr. Gardiner was employed to estimate the cost of carrying into execution the several designs.

When Mr. Fergusson talks about "a competent tribunal" having awarded Mr. Barry the first place, he refers solely to the third of the preliminary inquiries referred to above.

The first inquiry resulted most unfavourably for Mr. Barry. The second Report (b) was very unfavourable to Mr. Barry's plans, and much more so than it was to mine. The third Report (c) is that to which Mr. Fergusson chooses to confine himself; and the fourth (d) was extremely against Mr. Barry, whose design was estimated as being likely to cost no less than 87,000*l.* more than mine was.

The judges of design, when they came to a decision, made, as is well known, an equal recommendation of Mr. Barry and myself; and finally, not "because my design was the worst," the Government appointed me to the sole conduct of the work.

We do not think it necessary to quote the foot-note in which Mr. Street illustrates his assertion of the unfavourable results of the first inquiry in regard to Mr. Barry's design. It is sufficient to say that they are condemnatory of the project in nearly all its principal features.

At last we reach an objection in which Mr. Fergusson condescends to be specific. He condemns the hall which Mr. Street offers, and he calls it that architect's "particular crotchet," and speaks of his "determination to insist." No one who is even a little conversant with the history of the projected building can be ignorant that the central hall has been all along a sine quâ non with those who have controlled the plans, and the system on which Mr. Street obeyed the order can best be explained in his own words:—

My "imporferato" vault was and is to be lighted by very large windows, at the north and south ends. It has also on either side eight enormous windows, each containing about 300 feet of glass, and there is absolutely no single portion of the surrounding buildings which can by any possibility obscure the light from any portion of these windows.

Unless the Courts of Justice Commission, and all the authorities that have been consulted from first to last, are entirely in the wrong, a central hall is not "useless," but indispensable. I prefer to cover it with a stone vault, for the very practical reason that on any other terms it would be impossible to make it fire-proof, or to avoid the greatest risk to the whole enormous building in case any part of it were set fire to.

I maintain that both were deliberately chosen more than three years ago, and that it is not fair now to argue as if they had not been. Mr. Fergusson naturally tries to call off attention from this point to discussions as to whether a central hall, such as mine, may be vaulted in stone in the absence (so far as he knows) of "mediæval authority for such a vault." It would be about as reasonable to inquire whether or no there is "mediæval authority" for eighteen courts of justice in one great building! He settles, next, that my hall being, in spite of its want of precedent, "so correct in all its details, must be ornamented with richly coloured glass;" and I suppose, when he finds that this does not enter into my conception of what is desirable in any part of such a building, he will again complain of my want of respect for the "authorities," of which, after all, it would seem that he is the most slavish worshipper. It is not to the point to compare the lighting of the Manchester Hall with that of my buildings. I do not believe that the conditions are the same. But it would be very much to the purpose to compare the area of my hall with that of Westminster Hall, and to notice that the proportion of glass to area is very much greater in my design than it is there.

To be sure Mr. Fergusson is kind enough to throw his straw to the man whom he has tried to drown by proposing the substitution for Mr. Street's "vault" of a "glazed court," such as the hall which appeared in Mr. Waterhouse's competition designs, with the charitable purpose of enabling the architect "to close up the front, and introduce a central feature with appropriate wings." On this proposal Mr. Street provocatively recalls to Mr. Fergusson's memory that, in his History of Modern Styles of Architecture, he argues that the façade of Somerset House would have been improved had the centre been thrown back some 70 or 100 feet, and crowned by some prominent feature. We cannot find a flaw in this esquisse. No doubt the Great Hall in the Law Courts is thrown back, but as assuredly it is only thrown far enough back to produce that break of line and those effects of light and shade which relieve the outline of every great building which pretends to the attribute of regularity, while the Strand elevation still preserves the character of a single balanced facade. As to the prominence of the Hall, the dimensions above the Strand line of 131 feet height to the apex of the gable, and of 191 feet to the summit of the stone fleche which shoots up from its ridge, stand in lieu of any demonstration. In fact, demonstration finds no place in this particular discussion. A central hall of the outline which Mr. Street proposes, and relieved as he relieves it by so dignified a fleche, unless blundered in its dimensions, as no one has the hardihood to assert that Mr. Street has done, must always be a grand and pleasurable object to those whose architectural eye has been trained to appreciate sky line and pyramiding outline—that is, to all who understand and appreciate the principles of Pointed architecture.

It is the possession of these qualities which helps to give their charm to the Sainte Chapelle and the Cloth Hall of Ypres, to Westminster and Guildhalls, and the Hall of Trinity College, Cambridge, and to the noble army of mediæval cathedrals up and down the cities of Europe. Those who have no eyes for the beauty of these buildings may with consistency join Mr. Fergusson in his cry for a glazed court, but we should imagine that the persons who could willingly confess their preference for this expedient would be chiefly found in the class in whom all culture and all love of beauty is dead. The fact is that Mr. Fergusson will not make a clean breast of his dislikes, and cannot make one of his likings. His criticisms lead us directly up to the general condemnation of Gothic as the style appropriate for the Law Courts of the nineteenth century, but they leave us there. The true key to the feelings under which he wrote the articles in Macmillan must be found in his earlier writings, and we cannot be much mistaken in turning especially to the conclusions of his History of the Modern Styles of Architecture, in which he successively lays down the following propositions:—

(1) "Few will dispute the assertion that there is no Renaissance example equal as a work of art to any Gothic or Saracenic building, or that even attained to the picturesque appropriateness of these styles. Nor has any modern building ever worked out the intellectual elegance of the Greek or Roman or the sublimity of the Egyptian."

(2) "If the style ("of the future") "is to be a true style, it must take many years to elaborate, and many minds must be employed in the task." If so, it will be "perhaps" more "good and beautiful" than any which has preceded it.

But (3) "it will certainly not be Gothic, if for no other reason at least for this—that the mediæval is a complete and perfect style"—(In which of its phases? and how does Mr. Fergusson reconcile this dictum with the history which he gives, even in Macmillan, of their gradations?)—"and progress in it is consequently impossible without a recurrence of the circumstances under which it was created" (and yet the article gives a history of the alleged progress of this "style" in consequence of marked social changes between the thirteenth and fifteenth centuries).

(4) "The same is true of the pure classical styles, from which we are separated by even a longer interval of time, and also by a geographical barrier which renders them unsuitable for our climate;" although, according to Mr. Fergusson, the "educated classes at least know more and feel more for the age of Ictinus than for that of William of Sens, and are more capable of appreciating that of Vitruvius than of Wickham or of Waynflete"—i.e., of pagan Greeks and Romans than of Christian Englishmen. "But be this as it may, the Classical is also a perfect style" (the Classical of Athens, of Rome, "or of Spalatro?") and progress in it is unattainable "unless we can put ourselves in the position of the Greeks and Romans when they were elaborating it" (at Athens and at Rome, not to mention Spalatro), "and without progress it is impossible to adapt any art really to our use or purposes." The upshot of all the argument is that—

(5) "The Renaissance Italian is by no means worked out or perfected, and from the causes pointed out in the preceding pages" (i.e., a merciless dissection of it in detail), "has hardly yet had even a fair trial of its merits."

The general drift, therefore, of this string of assertions is, that because there is no Renaissance building equal to the Gothic and Saracenic buildings in existence, because the "mediæval is a complete and perfect style" (the number of the styles of mediæval architecture, taking both centuries and countries into account, being past enumeration); and because "Classical," under which term Mr. Fergusson expressly includes the widely differing architectures of the Greeks and of the Romans, "is also a perfect style," therefore the architecture of the future is to be built upon the lines of that one especial style which, upon Mr. Fergusson's own showing, has hitherto broken down—namely, the Renaissance Italian (itself a deduction from the unreplicable Classical in its Roman phase)—because, from the inability which Mr. Fergusson finds in our again placing ourselves in the social attitude either of mediæval Englishmen or classical Greeks and Romans, he is led to assume that we may very easily adopt the attitude of Italians of Leo X.'s time, and that although those Italians were able to mould the old Roman style into one suited to their wants, we are cursed with an inability to do the like with our own old English style.

But even for this blessed consummation "many years" and "many minds" are requisite, and so in the meantime the Lord Chancellor may continue to occupy Lincoln's Inn Hall, and the Common Law Judges to oscillate between Westminster and Guildhall, until the great Fergussonian development of Renaissance Italian shall have at some day, not too early in the twentieth century, brought forth its fruit in a faultless Palace of Justice. What the lawyers would say to this modest proposal we can easily imagine. Perhaps, indeed, Sir George Bowyer and Mr. Cavendish Benbow may hate Gothic so much more heartily than even they love the convenience of their profession, that their voices will be heard in approbation of the great policy of delay. But besides them we leave Mr. Fergusson's objections, now that we have shown the basis on which they stand, to the common sense not only of the legal profession but of the world. In fact, Mr. Fergusson is so acute as a dissector of morbid architecture that he has well nigh contracted an antipathy to healthy organism. He can find no trace of deep-seated disease in Gothic or in Classical, and therefore he will have none of them. Renaissance Italian is full of morbid malformations, and the kindly surgeon nurses the manifold diseases of his patient as a symptom of future healthfulness. How far the Goths who love not Street, and who have therefore been pleased to enlist under the Fergussonian banner, are prepared to follow their leader to his legitimate conclusions, we leave to their own consciences.

In the meanwhile we make an offer which we hold to be perfectly fair and reasonable to Mr. Street's antagonists. They are in possession of the requirements of the legal profession, they have the plan of the site available, they know how much the Chancellor of the Exchequer is prepared to pay; let them then, instead of inditing long-winded letters to the papers, put their heads together, and give us, in general outline, their own idea of the solution of the problem. After they have done so, and if the persons for whose benefit the Law Courts are to be built pronounce themselves as well satisfied with the practical results as they are with Mr. Street's project; if that portion of the public who are competent from knowledge and taste to speak out approve the suggestion as equal in dignity to Mr. Street's design; and if, in the third place, the contractors who are willing to build Mr. Street's Courts within the stated sum see no difficulty in accomplishing the rival scheme with a similar outlay, then we shall be prepared to consider whether it is worth while to add a couple or more to the many already wasted years for the pleasure of humiliating Mr. Street. On other conditions we must refuse to listen to the dilatory pleas of a host of discontented critics.

CHURCH AND STATE IN SWITZERLAND.

WE return to the debates in the Swiss Federal Assembly in order to say somewhat on some of the more interesting questions which have been started in them. In so doing we shall not confine ourselves to the exact order in which these questions were raised; or rather we will follow an accidental order. It was a little ominous that an ecclesiastical point should have been raised very early in the debates, and that too in discussing an article in the Federal Constitution which at first sight would not seem to have any ecclesiastical bearing. We will therefore begin by giving a sketch of those discussions which have anything to do with the relations of Church and State. In Switzerland, it must be borne in mind, those relations have hitherto, with two exceptions, been left wholly to the competence of the Cantons. In a country so divided in religion as Switzerland this has obviously been the right course. For the Federal authority either to establish any particular form of religion or to decree the universal disestablishment of all would have been utterly unjust in a country where one Canton is almost wholly Protestant, another almost wholly Catholic, while a third is pretty evenly divided between the two Churches. The Constitution of 1848 contented itself with decreeing that no political or civil disabilities could be imposed in any part of the Confederation on any member of a "recognized Christian confession" on account of his religion. Vaud cannot refuse a vote to a Catholic elector nor Luzern to a Protestant one. Perfect mutual toleration was secured to the two dominant Churches, and that was all. All questions about establishment and endowment, about the status of the clergy, about religious and secular education, about the lawfulness or unlawfulness of monastic institutions, were left to each Canton to settle for itself. Each Canton might establish either, or neither, or both of the two dominant Churches; it was simply forbidden to impose any secular disability on the members of either. It would even seem that, till the constitutional amendment of 1866 on behalf of the Jews, persons not belonging to either of the "recognized Christian confessions" were left wholly to cantonal legislation. In two points only did the Federal power step in. The order of Jesuits and all orders affiliated to it were declared unlawful throughout the whole extent of the Confederation. A provision like this, approaching so nearly to the nature of a privilegium, would at first sight seem by no means in place in a Federal Constitution. But it was a natural, perhaps justifiable, result of the events which led to the legislation of 1848. Switzerland had certainly had quite enough of Jesuits, and the triumphant enemies of the order might be excused for wishing to keep them out by any manner of means. Otherwise the question of Jesuits or no Jesuits does not seem in itself to be a constitutional question, and the existence of such an article in the Constitution might naturally be used, as it seems to have been used, as a precedent for further Federal encroachments on the ecclesiastical independence of the Cantons. The other provision bearing on ecclesiastical matters is that by which the clergy of both persuasions are made ineligible to the National Council, and therefore to the Federal Council, whose qualification is the same. "Wahlfähig als Mitglied des Nationalrathes ist jeder stimmberechtigte Schweizerbürger weltlichen Standes." No such restriction is made in the case of the Council of the States, and the Committees of both Houses propose to leave it out altogether in the present revision. But it happens that restrictions of the same kind have been enacted by the internal legislations of several Cantons, in some of which the vast majority is Catholic. Such a restriction plainly comes within cantonal competence. Now, oddly enough, at a very early stage of the debates, a strong supporter of cantonal right, the representative of Uri, Herr Arnold, proposed an amendment which would have had the effect of narrowing cantonal competence in this matter. To the fourth article of the Constitution, which declares the equality of all citizens before the law and abolishes all traces of the old oligarchic distinctions, he proposed to add a provision which is given in the French version:—"Nul ne peut être privé de ses droits politiques à cause de son état"; or, as another member proposed that it should run, "de sa profession." The object of this was to hinder any Canton from laying any disqualification on the clergy. The storm then broke forth in a form which shows how men's minds are stirred by late doings at Rome, and which, to our thinking, adds another to the many proofs of their utter impolicy, even from a Papal point of view. More than one member, among them a representative of Catholic Ticino, bitterly denounced the Catholic clergy as "soldiers of the Syllabus," men who had Rome for their first country, who were Romans before they were Switzers—the last description seeming to imply a failure to catch the point of the famous saying of the Venetian captain. Other members on both sides took a more dignified tone, and argued the question from its proper constitutional point of view. In the end Herr Arnold's amendment was rejected by a large majority.

But the chief subject which has led to the stirring up of ecclesiastical controversy has been, as might have been expected, a question of national education. Hitherto primary education has been a matter of cantonal concern. This has been according to the principle of leaving to the Cantons whatever the Cantons can do, and giving to the Confederation only such things as it is thought that the Cantons cannot do. On this latter principle the Federal Constitution has given the Confederation the power of founding a Polytechnic School, which it has founded, and also a Federal University, which it has not founded. Beyond the foundation of the Polytechnic School, everything has been left to the Cantons, and in most Cantons primary education has been both compulsory and gratuitous. The commune, the local division which lies at the root of all Swiss institutions, has been the immediate authority in matters of education. But in many cases education has come more or less into the hands of the clergy of the two Churches, and in some of the Catholic Cantons even into the hands of members of the religious orders. This has been especially the case with female schools, which have been largely placed under the care of teaching sisters. The proposals made by the Committees of the two Councils show no disposition to meddle with the state of things; they do not go in any way to narrow the liberty of the Cantons in educational matters, but only to give power to the Confederation to found other institutions for the higher education (d'autres établissements supérieurs d'instruction publique), besides the existing Polytechnic School and the possible University. But this has not been enough for that school of reformers who would have everything everywhere beaten out to one uniform level, and to whom education bestowed by clerical, and above all by religious, hands seems very like the traditional red flag to the bull. Here again, to our thinking, reformers have been somewhat too eager to press such changes as they think good in the abstract, in utter forgetfulness of the rights of independent commonwealths. The history of the debates on this matter is very curious. A crowd of amendments were brought forward tending to enforce some general scheme or other of education upon the Cantons in general, and most of them aiming at shutting out all ecclesiastical influence of every kind. An outsider is tempted to agree with the majority of the Committee of the National Council in thinking that the matter might very safely be left in the hands of the Cantons, when he reads in the debate that primary education is already compulsory in every Canton except Geneva, and that in Geneva, though education is not compulsory, it is gratuitous, and that it is in contemplation to make it compulsory also. He may also think with the Committee that the question whether primary education should be gratuitous is one on which there is much to be said on both sides, and that, in a country like Switzerland, where the circumstances of different districts differ so widely, the wisest course was to leave the question to be settled by local experience in each case. He may further think with them that there may be many small and isolated places in which to shut out altogether the influence of the priest or the pastor, or even the influence of the monk and the teaching sister, may be pretty much the same as shutting out education altogether. The majority of the Committee were therefore satisfied with adding, possibly as a sop to Cerberus, a provision which makes the article against the Jesuits yet more stringent, forbidding the interference in educational matters of any class of men who could be suspected of Jesuitry. A minority of the Committee had proposed to make it a constitutional provision that primary education throughout the Confederation should be compulsory and gratuitous, and that it should not be entrusted to members of any religious order; but even the minority saw that wholly to forbid the agency of the secular clergy of either confession was, at least in the present state of things, hopeless. These two views of the majority and the minority of the Committee were set forth in temperate and well-reasoned speeches by their respective spokesmen, Herr Landammann Heer, and Herr Stämpfli, of Bern. But the proposal even of the minority of the Committee was far from being enough for the zealots of reform. The occasion was tempting for declamations against the Catholics, especially the regular clergy, and impartial spectators, and one would think moderate Catholics also, cannot help feeling that late events have given them a certain force. Other speakers on the same side insisted on the absolute necessity of education and on the duty of the Confederation, in centralising its military system, to provide for the instruction of those whose military service it calls for. Catholic speakers, on the other hand, appeal to cantonal rights and to the liberty of conscience, besides maintaining the actual good quality of the education in the schools managed by sisters and other religious persons. And again Protestant members from the West, showing, we venture to think, a truer Liberalism than some of their German brethren, give more or less of support to the same arguments. One speaker objects to the exclusion of the clergy on the ground that it is establishing a distinction between laity and clergy which he holds ought not to be recognized at all. And M. Pictet de la Rive of Geneva uses language which in itself is worth transcribing, and which ought to be read with special pleasure by any man of English blood on either side of the Atlantic:—

Quant au mot laïque et à ce qui concerne les ordres religieux, l'orateur s'éloigne des opinions des proposant. Il croit bon en soi que l'instruction soit laïque et qu'elle soit autant que possible tout-à-fait en dehors des ordres religieux. Si l'on pouvait se borner à un conseil et même à une invitation pressante, il l'accepterait; mais il ne croit pas qu'on puisse et doive imposer à tous les cantons une pareille disposition.

Il a été élevé dans des idées de libéralisme qui sont aujourd'hui un peu vieilles, quoiqu'elles aient fait la grandeur de l'Angleterre et des États-Unis. Ces idées sont remplacées aujourd'hui par un radicalisme autoritaire qui lui plaît moins. Il ne croit pas que tout soit permis aux majorités. Il ne se sent pas le droit d'opprimer une minorité respectable. Et ici il s'agit en particulier des petits cantons primitifs, le berceau de la Confédération. L'orateur n'a aucun motif de se méfier de leurs populations. Il ne peut pas considérer qu'il y ait un danger réel à ce que les petites filles de canton d'Unterwald soient élevées par des sœurs comme l'ont été leurs mères et leurs neules, et chacun connaît l'énergie d'indépendance dont ces dernières ont donné le glorieux exemple.

Le vrai progrès est lent. Il doit venir du peuple lui-même et des autorités cantonales d'accord avec lui. Il jette ainsi de profondes racines et est bien plus certain et vrai que s'il est imposé.

A crowd of amendments were put and rejected, and the final result for the present was that the clause was carried as proposed by the Committee, the effect of which would be to leave primary education, as now, wholly in the hands of the Cantons. On this a power was exercised which is doubtless parliamentary in Switzerland, but which strikes an Englishman as odd, though its practical effect is much the same as that of raising a debate on the third reading among ourselves. Herr Kaiser of Solothurn demanded that the debate should be opened afresh, which was accordingly done almost at the end of the session. We do not see that any specially new arguments on either side were brought forward in this second debate; but when it came to the final vote, the exclusion of the clergy and of the religious orders was rejected by fifty-nine votes to fifty, and the resolution, which was at last carried by the casting vote of the President, stood in the French version as follows:—

Les cantons pourvoient à l'instruction primaire obligatoire et gratuite. La Confédération peut fixer, par voie législative, un minimum de ce qu'on doit exiger des écoles primaires.

Another proposal which led the way to ecclesiastical disputes was also a proposal of the Committee to introduce into the Constitution a provision with regard to the law of marriage, another matter which has hitherto been left in the competence of the Cantons. The proposal of the Committee did not touch any ecclesiastical question, but it declared two or three civil principles, having chiefly in view the abolition of certain vexatious restrictions on marriage which had been established in some cases by local law. But this debate was of course made the opportunity of further attacks on anything like any relations of Church and State. A number of members pressed for a distinct assertion of the civil character of marriage. One member, Herr Hungerbühler of St. Gallen, announced openly that the marriage between Church and State must be dissolved, and that marriage in the school were the two points on which this could practically be done. Again we find a voice from the West, that of M. Ruchonnet of Vaud, calling for the omission of several provisions which he looked on as excellent in themselves, but as unfitted for a place in the Federal Constitution. The result of this debate was that the proposal of the Committee was adopted with the insertion of words declaring that marriage could not be hindered on any ecclesiastical ground ("aucun empêchement au mariage ne peut être fondé sur des motifs confessionnels"), a provision of which we do not very clearly see the effect.

The other ecclesiastical question arose on the constitutional provision with regard to the Jesuits. The old provision stood thus:—

L'ordre des Jésuites et les sociétés qui lui sont affiliées ne peuvent être reçus dans aucune partie de la Suisse.

To this the Committee of the Council of the States proposed to add the words—

Et toute action dans l'Eglise et l'école est interdite à leurs membres—

while the Committee on the National Council proposed further to add—

Il est interdit de fonder des couvents ou de rétablir ceux qui ont été supprimés.

Both these proposals were carried after a debate in which violent attacks, somewhat in the style of Mr. Whalley, were made on monastic institutions in general, and were showered on the principle of cantonal independence. One Catholic member called for the repeal of the law against the Jesuits, and another, Herr Segesser of Luzern, the distinguished historian of his Canton, proposed, seemingly in irony, that if Jesuits and monks were to be forbidden, Freemasons should be forbidden also.

We have read these debates with deep interest, and with some concern. We can put ourselves into the position of the Catholic members, who must have constantly felt that their religion was being made the subject of ungenerous attack. We can also put ourselves into the position of those Protestant members who looked, and surely not without reason, on some of the doctrines which have been lately set forth by Papal authority as subversive of all civil, and especially of all republican, government. But even on this point of view it is well to bear in mind the weighty words of the Federal Councillor Cérésole:—

Ce n'est que par la liberté que nous pouvons lutter contre l'Encyclique et le Syllabus. Les mesures autoritaires ne nous conduisent qu'aux luttes intestines, aux conflits stériles et aux déceptions. Faisons comme l'Italie, la Belgique, l'Angleterre, les États-Unis. Ne suspendons pas l'exercice de la liberté contre ceux qui ne pensent pas comme nous; ne froissons pas dans les sentiments respectables une minorité du peuple suisse à laquelle nous devons égard et respect précisément parce qu'elle est minorité.

Ce n'est pas en fermant des couvents que nous combattons le Syllabus, c'est en ouvrant des écoles.

Throughout the debates our sympathies lie with those Protestant members who, holding fast to their own principles, to their own views of what was abstractedly best, could still see that, in framing a Federal Constitution, the question is not always whether such and such a measure is abstractedly the best, but whether it is one which ought to be enforced by Federal authority. It is a true and keen discernment to see that the maintenance of those cantonal rights which are the very life and soul of Swiss freedom is a higher object than forcing upon unwilling Cantons even the very best provisions about schools, convents, or marriages.

THE LATE SIR JAMES A. HOPE, G.C.B.

THE retreat upon Corunna and the expedition to Walcheren occurred in the same year, and it is not wonderful that an officer who had survived both these operations should live to the mature age of eighty-five years. The late Sir James Hope saw the military character of Great Britain reduced to the lowest point in 1809, and he shared in nearly all the battles by which in the next five years she taught the rest of Europe to contend successfully against Napoleon. We have been usefully reminded by Lord Derby of the burden of taxation which our fathers were content to bear, and certainly it is wonderful to observe that so much money could have been raised, and still more how it was spent. The campaign of Sir John Moore in Spain proved at any rate that British soldiers could fight, which after all is the first requisite in war; but the special characteristic of the unfortunate expedition against Antwerp was that nearly half an army was lost without a battle. There were good reasons for undertaking this expedition and good hopes that it would have succeeded if it had been promptly executed. Napoleon had made Antwerp a principal naval station, and he contemplated that at some convenient time it might become a basis of operations against the east coast of England. At the time when the expedition was undertaken he was engaged upon the Danube in a doubtful struggle against Austria, and if a British force could have seized and held Antwerp, it is possible that Northern Germany might have risen against the French with the vigour and unanimity which it displayed a few years later when Napoleon had sustained a heavy blow in Russia. The battle of Aspern or Essling was fought on the 22nd of May, and Napoleon at the close of a day of unparalleled anxiety saw himself repulsed from the left bank of the Danube and driven into the island of Lobau, which his ablest officers advised him was untenable. He, however, held fast to his position, and during the next six weeks he drew reinforcements from every quarter, including Antwerp, and prepared himself for a second attempt, in which failure would have been destruction. The British Government, hearing of the battle of Aspern, determined to attack Antwerp; but the battle of Wagram had been fought and Austria had made peace with Napoleon before that determination was carried into effect. "In the meantime," says an impartial historian, "the object of our preparations had, by the aid of the English journals, become as well known on the Continent as it was at the Horse Guards or the Admiralty." The battle of Wagram was fought on the 6th of July, and on the 28th of the same month an immense fleet, carrying an army of 40,000 men, sailed from the Downs for the Scheldt. The fleet was commanded by an Admiral of undoubted vigour and capacity, Sir Richard Strachan, and he had under him several officers of high distinction. The army was commanded by the Earl of Chatham, whose only title to military employment was that his father and his brother had been eminent in civil life. The Ministers who directed this expedition were not only dilatory in the execution of it, but they committed the grievous error of dividing the military resources of the country between Antwerp and Spain. The battle of Corunna was fought on the 16th of January, and after the death of Sir John Moore and the severe wound of Sir David Baird, the command of the British army devolved upon Sir John Hope (afterwards Lord Hopetoun), who embarked the troops without disturbance from the enemy, and returned to England. Thus it happened that Sir John Hope and a portion of the army which had shared in one abortive expedition shared also in another in the same year.

Sir John Hope was accompanied both in Spain and on the banks of the Scheldt by Captain Hope, the subject of our present remarks. His division was the first to arrive at the scene of intended action, and it took part in such fighting as there was. It has been said by a French writer of authority that the army should have been landed at Blankenberg, a few miles north-east of Ostend, and marched thence by Bruges and Ghent upon Antwerp, while the fleet forced the passages of the Scheldt. But, by landing on Walcheren and the other islands, and laying siege to Flushing, time was given to the French to send troops to Antwerp and strengthen its fortifications, and also to the fever of the country to do its destructive work upon the invaders. This great army and fleet did take Flushing, and also Fort Bantz, which lies further up the Scheldt, and thus it occupied four weeks. On the 26th of August a council of war was held, which determined that the enterprise had better be abandoned; for sickness was increasing daily, and the enemy had completed his preparations, besides which the French fleet had been removed five miles above Antwerp, so that even the capture of that place might not ensure its destruction. Accordingly, all our magnificent conquests were abandoned except Walcheren, where a garrison was kept until the end of the year, "when the healthy season was commencing." Official returns show that upwards of 14,000 soldiers of our army were sick, and, although not more than one-fourth of this number died, "yet," says the historian whom we have already quoted, "scarcely one who is alive at this day but carries in his frame some unsubdued portion of the disease, some rheumatic affection or periodical ague-fit, forcing upon his recollection the share he had in an expedition which, for the credit of its planners and the honour of their country, it were better could be buried in oblivion." There was of course an inquiry into the causes of this disastrous failure, and Lord Chatham admitted that when he left England he knew nothing about the place he was going to attack. It would be idle, however, to dwell upon his incompetency for high command except to exhibit the folly of those who placed him in it. The conception and execution of this enterprise were equally ridiculous. It has been said that Antwerp might have been taken in three days after the troops reached the Belgian coast; and unless it had been taken soon it was not likely to have been taken at all. The perversity of the British Government in employing Lord Chatham upon this service was the more remarkable because, after Sir John Moore's retreat and death, they still held to the plan of combating the French armies in Spain and Portugal, and they had sent Sir Arthur Wellesley with a small army to Lisbon, whence he advanced to Talavera and fought a battle highly honourable to his troops, although otherwise without result. Even if "the late Lord Chatham," as he was called, had been a man of energy and ability, it would still have been the height of folly to divide the small military power of this country between Belgium and Spain. The original notion of an attack on Antwerp at the end of May might have been a good one if it had been promptly carried out; but when the opportunity of Napoleon's embarrassment on the Danube had passed by, the most ordinary prudence would have dictated the concentration of British effort upon Spain, where something considerable might have been effected. But with the force at his disposal Wellesley, after the failure of Spanish co-operation, could do no more than make good his retreat to Portugal. The incapacity of British military administration down to the end of 1809 was almost equal to that which lately sent a French army to destruction at Sedan.

It was, however, the good fortune of Captain Hope to escape the Walcheren fever, and to return next year to Spain, where British military affairs were henceforth to be efficiently directed. He had already served as aide-de-camp to Sir John Hope, and he now became aide-de-camp successively to Sir Thomas Graham and Marshal Beresford, with one or other of whom he was present at almost every great action of the Spanish war. He must have had good friends and good abilities to obtain these employments, and he must also have had good health and good fortune to retain them through all the hardships and dangers of those campaigns. Many officers of equal or superior intellect wanted the bodily strength to endure the fatigue and vicissitudes of climate which active service in those years involved. The campaign of Sir John Moore in Spain lasted from November to January, and we have all probably read and remembered something of the miseries of his retreat. Then came a voyage in a crowded transport or man-of-war to England, and then preparations for the disastrous expedition to the Scheldt. The winter's cold and summer's heat did their worst upon that army of which this officer was till lately an honoured relic. It was said of another officer, who died a few weeks ago, that he had served with his regiment through the Spanish campaign, and was only absent from duty four days in all that time. Sir James Hope not only served in all these campaigns, but he was present as a Staff officer in almost every battle and siege that occurred in them, so that his experience of war must have been almost unequalled among officers of his standing. He was under thirty years of age when this brilliant career terminated, and, although manifestly capable of great things, he found no further opportunities for distinction. The constitutional strength which carried him through so many hardships was further proved by his surviving until last week, when he who had endured Corunna and Walcheren yielded to old age. It is to be feared that the hardihood which supported such trials is more rare in modern Britain than the incapacity which produced them.

DR. DÖLLINGER'S INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

IT is barely five years since we noticed a remarkable address on the Past and Present of Universities, delivered by Dr. Dollinger as Rector of the University of Munich. He has now been again elected by the almost unanimous suffrage of his colleagues to that honourable post, in a year alike remarkable as the fourth centenary of his alma mater, and from its eventual significance in the history of his country and his Church. He delivered just before Christmas, in presence of a large Academic audience and of many distinguished members of the Bavarian Court and Government, as well as foreign ambassadors, the inaugural lecture of which a pretty full report has now appeared in the German newspapers. The members of the Theological Faculty, who had alone voted against the one man of their body who had the firmness to stand to his convictions, were of course conspicuous by their absence. But for nearly two hours his address was listened to with breathless attention, interrupted by frequent bursts of applause, by the immense majority of the professors and students of the University. His subject, as he himself observed, was on this occasion not so much chosen by himself as prescribed by the momentous events which have recently occurred, viewed in what may be called their academical bearings; and accordingly he announced as the question to be examined, "What significance has our most recent history for the high educational institutions of Germany and the purposes they serve?" Two great events, by no means destitute of moral connexion both in their causes and results, were thus prominently indicated—the Vatican Synod and the Franco-German war. And to a man who is at once an ardent patriot and a devout believer, few subjects could offer deeper or more varied interest. It is not surprising that so great an anxiety should have been manifested to hear what he had to say in the way both of comment on the past and suggestion for the future. Nor can his hearers have been disappointed in the result.

Dr. Dollinger commenced by a graceful tribute to the courage and patriotism of his countrymen in the late war, and expressed the desire which must now be felt for a lasting peace; though, in view of the hatred of Germany which the French threaten to hand down as an heirloom to their children in place of their old detestation of England, it is impossible at present for Germany to disarm. It seems to be a necessity for the French, he sorrowfully observed, to have some nation or other to hate, but "this hatred Germany does not return." All Christian nations are members of one great confederacy, and have need of each other's aid; but most especially is this true now, as it always has been, of France and Germany. Both peoples have a common historical origin in the Carolingian Empire, and are destined to supplement one another. For a long time Germany was the receptive party in this "intellectual marriage." The foundation of the famous University of Paris, about the year 1200, made France the focus of European learning, and for centuries her supremacy was unchallenged. Meanwhile the intellectual intercourse between the two countries continued uninterrupted, and at the Councils of Constance and Basle, in the fifteenth century, the learning of both joined hands on German soil in the persons of the French Gerson and D'Ailly and the German Nicholas Cusa. Since then French influence has been deeply tainted by moral and political corruption; but yet the French nation will long preserve its old reputation, which has been dwelt upon by the English writer Macaulay as the channel through which world-stirring ideas and discoveries are popularized, not always indeed without degenerating into shallowness in the process. And it will be the wisdom of Germany to recognize this fact, and to admit candidly that "Germany and France are nations indispensable to each other." Just now, it is true, though the vital power remains unexhausted, French intellect is passing under an eclipse. Nor is the explanation far to seek. The highest ethical law of science is love of truth, and the priests of true science, though liable to error, will never lie. But the period since 1789 has been not inaptly termed an age of lies, and hence "the noble French nation lies stretched on a bed of severe though not hopeless disease." Her historians have inoculated her with a profound untruthfulness, and in the word "Chauvinisme" the French have invented a name for the monomania under which they labour of considering themselves the first nation in the world. What Lamartine's mendacious History of the Girondins did for the first half of the French Revolution, the historical works of Thiers have done for the second, and the writings of Michelet and Louis Blanc have a similar tendency. Against this systematic falsification of history and of the moral standard, men of the most various parties—like Tocqueville, Provost-Paradol, and Thierry—have vainly protested. France has indeed erected her self-worship into an infallible dogma, comprised in three articles; first, that the French nation is the noblest, and can never err; secondly, that it has an inalienable right to rule over German territory up to the Rhine; thirdly, that the French army can never be beaten. And accordingly, on the 18th of July, 1870, the French declaration of war against Germany "fell like a ripe fruit from this upas-tree."

And it did not come alone. On the same day Rome, "the second metropolis of Latinism," declared war against German science and German intellect. On that day 547 Roman bishops proclaimed the infallibility of the Pope. The lecturer remarks that witnesses of authority have shown this dogma to have been promulgated only to checkmate the Germans, and to serve as an antidote against inconvenient German investigations. He might have added that leading advocates of the dogma have admitted as much. Father Dalgairns, for instance, did but state the same thing in his own way when he said that the Church was compelled to choose between the infallibility of the Pope and the infallibility of the German professors, and therefore chose the former. And the Roman, like the Parisian, declaration of war, was the result of an age of lies. For years past the Roman hierarchy had been sedulously engaged in disseminating throughout colleges and seminaries text-books full of misstatements and falsifications, and thus gaining over the rising generation of clergy to the cause of Papal absolutism. In Germany alone this system was not more than partially successful, and hence the urgent need for putting German science under anathema. The Jesuits had formulated a doctrine of intellectual obedience (sacrificio dell' intelletto), which was first directed against physical science, and resulted in total failure. Now the science of history is attacked, and the inevitable consequence of success would be universal scepticism. But Rome is fully bent on the conflict; at her dictation the German bishops have formally complained to the Emperor of the "inharmious progress" of science in the German Universities, which the Jesuit Civiltà Cattolica had already designated as "oscu, non pur arido, ma fetido, tanto è il puzzo che n' esce di dottrine corrompitrici e pestiferi." But history was never better able than in the present age to meet the attack, for never was there more perfect harmony as to the principles of the science, or more general agreement about the facts. This the lecturer proceeded to illustrate by a striking sketch of the political development of the German nation, which had now reached its legitimate culmination in the establishment of the Empire. But that Empire means a federation, not a tyranny. The Germans are a people of peoples, and their Kaiser is no French or Roman Cæsar, no Slavonic Czar or Byzantine Basileus, but the head of independent Kings and princes. There must be no attempt at centralization—no Paris, where all the vital elements of the nation are concentrated in a single point, and to which the whole country is subjected, while it serves at the same time as a common high school for the refinements of sensuality. It is the duty and interest of the restored Empire to maintain fraternal relations with Austria, and with all the surrounding countries, and if is their interest also.

And here the lecturer came to the question which naturally arose out of the application of the inquiry to University education; "What branches of study have received a new impulse from late events?" After noticing their obvious bearing on history, as also on philosophy, "which occupies among the sciences the same mediating and international position as is held by Germany among the nations of the world," he pointed out that German theology is above all favoured by the new order of things. That is a science which both among Catholics and Protestants has much to learn and much to forget. Since the great division of the sixteenth century its chief task has been polemical; but henceforth it should change a polemic for a peace-making tendency. Patriots, he said, have long lamented her religious disunion as the principal impediment to the unification of Germany, and till that gulf is bridged over the new Empire will remain an unfinished edifice. Not is the question simply a national one. It concerns the Christian as much as the patriot. And throughout Europe there is a growing desire felt for the reunion of the separated Churches. But there is a double reason why the work has a primary claim on German theologians. In most countries of Europe the Reformation either eventually triumphed or was finally suppressed; in Germany the result was a drawn battle, and from that day to this the two confessions have existed side by side on equal terms, but their internal difference has been a bar to national unity. And, moreover, it was there that the division had its source. The country where the quarrel originated should be the first to bring about a reconciliation. And the fearless spirit of honest and patient inquiry which has characterized German science, historical and theological, offers the best pledge for a favourable result. The old maxim, noblesse oblige, applies to nations as well as to individuals. With her growing power the obligations of Germany to mankind are also multiplied. And a further ground for the urgency of this work of religious reconciliation is found in the circumstance of modern navigation having opened up every part of the globe. Above two-thirds of the human race—more than eight hundred millions of human beings—have still to be gained for Christianity and European civilization, and they too ought to profit by the power and prestige of the new German Empire. On the other hand, individuals must not forget the moral duties of ever-increasing importance which await the man of culture, who is bound to labour to the utmost within his own sphere, however limited it may be, to promote the social elevation of the people, while endeavouring to gain and preserve for himself that purity of heart which is the best safeguard against intellectual sloth.

We have only been able to glance at the leading points of an address every word of which, we may be sure, from the known character of the author, was deliberately weighed, and will repay attentive perusal. And it says much, not only for the lofty independence and broad sympathies of the speaker, which could hardly have been doubtful, but for the calm and moderate temper of those whom he addressed, that at a period of great religious and political excitement such words should have been publicly spoken, and received with enthusiastic applause by a highly-cultivated and, we may add, fairly representative audience of German statesmen and scholars. As to the precise apportionment of praise and blame in the origin and events of the late war, there will necessarily be considerable differences of opinion among observers from without, nor will all be agreed as to the nature and prospects of the new Empire. But events, as well during as after the war, have too abundantly justified the lecturer's criticism on the demoralisation of France, and we cannot doubt that he has put his finger on the sore place in exposing that system of false and feeble self-flattery which has done so much to turn a great nation into a vast Mutual Admiration Society, while it finds its ecclesiastical counterpart in the system of pious frauds which culminated in the Vatican decrees, and gained for the Assembly itself the unenviable designation of a Synod of Sycophants. Those who wish well to the future of Germany and of Christianity can hardly form a better aspiration for either than that Dr. Dollinger's spirit and temper may be largely shared by his countrymen.

THE LORD ADVOCATE ON EDUCATION.

IF Scotland met with scanty recognition during the past Session, it has been more than made up to her during the Recess. She has listened to the platform utterances of many of her members who were not so fortunate as to gain a hearing within the walls of the House of Commons. She is at this moment enjoying the excitement of an election contest between two men of the same party, neither of whom is unversed in the strategies of electioneering. And she has been privileged to hear and criticize the speeches of four not unimportant members of the Government—the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary, the Under-Secretary for India, and the Lord Advocate. These four eminent men have each had their say before crowded assemblages of appreciative Scotchmen, and their addresses have, through the newspapers, been freely considered and discussed, not in Scotland only, but throughout the kingdom. A family likeness, as is becoming, pervaded all four, at least in the commencement. They all sang paeans over the labours of the Administration since it came into office, and then delivered their souls upon the work of their departments. Desunt in picem mulier formosa superne. The disestablishment of the Irish Church, the settlement of the Land question, the establishment of English education, the abolition of purchase, the preservation of peaceful relations during the late war, the termination of the Alabama controversy, these were beautiful topics, and full of comfort. But with them the lovely woman fades away, and the scaly continuations take her place. Mr. Gladstone on his Scottish blood, Mr. Bruce on his efforts to propagate a Licensing Bill, Mr. Grant Duff on the "Cobden legacy," and the Lord Advocate on "the religious difficulty in Scotland," excellent as they all are on each topic, are much less easy to understand, and much less interesting to read, than when they are singing Io triumphe in the Elgin Burghs or at Pollockshaws.

Scotch education was the main theme of the Lord Advocate's address. He promised that the long-looked-for Bill would be the second measure of the Session, and that, so far as it lay with the Government, every effort would be made to pass it into law. He indicated that the Bill of next Session would be similar to the one which he introduced last Session; the only difference—by no means immaterial—being that, whereas last year's Bill contained only the permissive-compulsory clauses of the English Act, the new Bill would make compulsion universal and imperative.

On the religious question Scotch public opinion is more completely in solution than it has been since the commencement of the education controversy five-and-twenty years ago. It has become curiously involved with a question of ecclesiastical polity, old enough in the history of the Presbyterian Church, but comparatively new in England—the question, namely, of Church patronage. The Presbyterians in Scotland amount to some eighty-six per cent. of the population. Various schisms, all of which can be traced to this question of patronage, have divided them into three bodies—Established, Free, and United Presbyterian Churches. These three bodies, full of enmity to each other on all other points, are at one on two subjects—their love of the Shorter Catechism, and their hatred of Roman Catholics and Episcopalians. A movement, however, is going on in those bodies towards union, which seems destined to end in more hopeless disunion than exists at present. The question of patronage has again come to the front. A large majority of the Established Church think it expedient for the well-being, and indeed the very existence, of their body as an Establishment, that private and Crown patronage should be abolished; and with them, a pious, if fanatical, detachment of the Free Church, going down from the Pinnacles of poverty upon the promised land rich in the preferments of the Church, incline to throw in their lot; while the wealthier and more sober-minded majority are turning towards the resolute arms of the United Presbyterians. The education question is taken up by the former sections, and is being cunningly used as a machine to weld together the anti-patronage men of the two Churches. A Society calling itself the "Scottish Educational Association" has been formed, and has sent out the more eloquent of its orators to stump the principal towns of Scotland during the recess, and try—but so far vainly—to arouse some patriotic feeling by singing aloud the praises of each other, and of Scotland, and the Shorter Catechism, and the Scottish Thistle, and John Knox, and Sir William Wallace, and denouncing the conduct of the Government towards Scotland (which they say is worse than any Government since the days of Bolingbroke) and the tyranny of England. The nominal objects of the Society are—to secure by Act of Parliament (1) the teaching of religion according to "use and wont"; (2) Scottish management for Scottish schools; (3) the proper training, remuneration, and "status" of the Scottish schoolmaster. The first branch of this programme means, when translated into English, that a statute shall be passed enacting that the Shorter Catechism shall be taught without a conscience clause in all State-aided schools, and that Episcopalian and Roman Catholic schools shall be starved or stamped out of existence. The second means "Home Rule" in matters educational. It includes the absorption of a quarter of a million a year by an irresponsible Scotch Board sitting in Edinburgh, and dispensing public money at its own sweet will—the establishment, in short, in Scotland of the Irish Board system with all the evils and none of the safeguards. The third means an Act of Parliament to give every Scotch schoolmaster a house and a garden, 50*l.* to 100*l.* a year of salary, besides his fees and grant, fixity of tenure in his office, and "status." What "status" means we do not know. Perhaps it is Scotch for social position, and it may, for anything we know to the contrary, include armorial bearings for all the teachers, precedence for their wives, and statutory invitations to dinner with the chief magistrates in the towns, and the "value-rented heritors"—whatever they may be—in the country. It would appear unusual to include such things in an English Act of Parliament, but Scotchmen have always pampered their schoolmasters, and Scotch Acts of Parliament are peculiar.

The programme, however, whether in Scotch or English, is very useful in the welding process. "Use and wont" being directed against Prelates and Papists, draws together all the more fanatical of the Presbyterians. Scottish management captivates the Home Rule patriots who are opposed to English interference in Scotch schools, and all who may hope for place or influence in a Scotch Board. That vague and indefinable "status" is an irresistible bait to the irrepressible teachers of youth. And the hope of defeating any Education Bill introduced by the present Government brings together the residuum of the Conservative party in Scotland who are not already hooked by the anti-patronage programme. The Bill of last Session was not to their liking. The Squires have always looked upon the parish schools as private preserves belonging to their party, and any interference with them as an invasion of the rights of property. These schools are supported by rates levied equally upon landed proprietors and their tenants, but the tenants have no voice in the management. The minister of the parish, who pays no rate, is always the leading, and generally the only active, manager, and the teacher, being appointed by him, is invariably a member of the Established Church. The Bill proposed to break up this monopoly and to open the management to all who pay, and to relieve the parish minister of the burden of managing and appointing, unless he was elected by the ratepayers like any other man. The landed interest object to this proposal, and call it "godless"; but, seeing that opposition on this ground is hopeless, they join the "Educational Association" on the three heads of their programme, and encourage them to put forward the attractive warms (the Catechism, the Scotch Board, and "status") in the window, while they keep the real substantial business (the exclusive management of the parish schools) in the back shop.

The Lord Advocate gathered himself together, and went straight at the programme, taking the parish schools in his stride, and leaving Sir William Wallace and the Scottish Thistle for another occasion. Management and status he cleared without much difficulty, going in and out as if they were a double post and rail. But the religious question was a power, and, wisely or unwisely the result alone will show, he decided to go round by a gap. He regarded it, he said, as a question of the first importance, and that in every view of it—whether religious, educational, or political. The religious matter that he wanted to be taught was sufficiently plain:—

We are all agreed [he said, amid the acclamations of his audience], we are all agreed, I trust and firmly believe, that a child without instruction in religion, without the knowledge that there is a God above him, and around him, closer to him than breathing, nearer than hands and feet, about all his paths, springing out all his ways, knowing all his thoughts long before, and to whom, this life ended, his spirit must return to give account of the deeds done in the body—I say I trust and believe that we are all agreed that, without this knowledge a child is not educated, even elementarily, in such a manner as to fit him for his duties in the world in any station, however humble.

But the difficulty was in the manner of teaching it. Three plans had been proposed—the Denominational, the Presbyterian (or "use and wont"), and the Secular. The Denominational system he rejected because it must be voluntary, and never could be national, and under it there was, and always would be, many schools where none were wanted, and no schools where many were wanted. The Presbyterian plan he rejected because it would be impossible to carry it. Teaching of religion in the public schools has never been proscribed in Scotland by an Act of Parliament, or by any law whatsoever, and the time has gone by when Parliament could be asked to sanction the application of public money for instruction in a particular form of religion, even the Presbyterian, to the exclusion of any other. The secular plan, by which he meant the proposal to "make common cause against that ignorance which is the common enemy, and leave the teaching of religion to the parents, the churches, to pious individuals or associations of pious individuals who may provide it for them," he rejected also. Sympathizing with this plan, like many of his countrymen "I am constrained," he said, "by that deference which is only becoming on my part by what I believe to be the prevailing opinion of the people of Scotland, for whom it is my duty to attempt to legislate effectively on this matter, to decline to attempt to legislate according to these views." All these proposals therefore are rejected. The fence was too stiff all along the field, but he found a gap in the corner. The schools shall be national and in no sense Denominational, and in them instruction in religion shall "neither be proscribed nor proscribed." The School Boards are to regulate the branches of instruction to be taught in the schools under their management, and it will be for them to decide whether any, and if so what, religion shall be taught. The battle of the Denominations will be fought out in every parish and burgh. But it will not rage fiercely. Where 86 per cent. of the whole population are Presbyterian, it is pretty certain that Presbyterianism will have very much its own way. In Ireland 80 per cent. of the population are Roman Catholic, and there Roman Catholicism will have very much its own way when what is law in England and Scotland comes to be law in Ireland. Whether this is for the good of the United Kingdom or not the Government of which Mr. Young is a member will have to judge. It is certainly hard on the minority, whose claims, whatever may be their value, ought not to be appraised by the rough process of counting heads.

THE OLD MASTERS AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

II.

IN a former article we treated of the Italian schools; we now turn to Spanish, German, Flemish, and Dutch pictures. The Spanish school is this year rather weak, notwithstanding some not unimportant works of El Greco, Zurbaran, Murillo, and Velasquez. El Greco's portrait of his daughter (112) is interesting in many ways. The work comes from the collection of Sir William Stirling-Maxwell, author of Annals of the Artists of Spain, and is therefore well accredited. El Greco, architect, sculptor, and painter, a Greek by birth, as his pseudonym implies, has been described as "an artist who alternated between reason and delirium, and displayed his great genius only at lucid intervals." He was best when he condescended to emulate Titian. We have seen eleven of his pictures in the Madrid Gallery, mostly portraits; his style is apt to be wooden and mechanical. The painter has delineated his own fine Hellenic features; the hands and face are expressly of the æsthetic type; evidently the man was designed by nature for noble work. El Greco's beautiful daughter, now before us, appears also in the great altar-piece of Toledo; the portrait justifies the eloquent words of Sir William Stirling-Maxwell in the "Annals":—

She is painted in the prime of life and loveliness; her dark eyes and rich complexion are finely set off by the white-furred mantle drawn over her head; and her countenance, in depicting which her fond father has put forth all his skill, is one of the most beautiful that death ever dimmed, and that the pencil ever rescued from the grave.

Zurbaran, called sometimes the Spanish Caravaggio, was great in monks; he painted a friar with as much gusto as Raffaello a Madonna, Titian a Venetian noble, or Vandyck an English gentleman. But "St. Francis at his Devotions" (93) is unworthy of the master; the head, poor in quality, would probably be seen, on close inspection, to have been repainted; the rough brown robe alone, broad as a sack, and worn into holes, bespeaks the artist's mastery. Passing on to the highest genius in Spanish art, we have once more to complain of the catalogue. Two remarkable examples of Velasquez, lent by Sir Richard Wallace, are thus curtly described:—"A Spanish Infanta" (75), and "Portrait of the Infanta" (142). Both these pictures were in the Manchester Art Treasures; the first (75) is not known as an Infanta at all, "but simply as a Lady with a Fan"; the last (142) is one of the artist's many portraits of the boy Don Carlos, Prince of Asturias, son of Philip IV. This is the little fellow familiar to every one who has the slightest acquaintance with the picture galleries of Europe, often represented full tilt on a pony, sometimes in shooting costume with a dog, or again, as in the portrait before us, with baton and sword, standing, solemn and stiff, after true Spanish fashion. The picture is marked by masterly sketchiness, and we may observe how completely the figure is rounded in relief, without being detached from the background. Reynolds, it will be remembered, objects to portraits wherein the spectator seems to be invited to walk all round the figure; the old masters were too compact in composition to allow of much vacant space for walking or dancing. Next to Velasquez, the great master of Castile, naturally comes Murillo, chief of the school of Andalusia. One picture only of this popular painter needs notice; a fine example of a favourite subject, formerly in the Augustine convent at Seville, "St. Thomas of Villanueva dispensing Alms at the Door of his Cathedral" (98). This important picture, of which there are several replicas with variations, is much darkened and obscured, but it serves as a memorable example of the artist's semi-secular subjects. The contrast between the Saint and the ragged and dirty applicants crowding around for charity is well conceived. The pale and venerable countenance of St. Thomas, it is said, inspired love and confidence, and accorded well with the office of shepherd and bishop of souls. The dirt obtrusively shown on the beggars' feet might with advantage have been left out; a like vulgar naturalism in the famous beggar boys at Dulwich is stigmatized by Mr. Ruskin as "foulness."

The early German and Flemish schools are present in a few small but interesting works by Van der Goes, Van Orley, Mabuse, Van Eyck, Lucas van Leyden, and Quintin Matsys. It is worth while to notice how the four first-named of these painters use Gothic architecture as an encircling accessory to their figure compositions, and how well the pointed arch, the clustered column, the perspective of nave and choir, lend themselves to visions of saints and flights of angels. The architecture introduced into a picture often serves as an index to date, locality, and school. We may add that we generally look with misgiving upon any Renaissance intrusions into pictures which belong to lands north of the Alps. Painters are known to take liberties with architecture, partly because of the temptation to rear, by the easy means of the brush, structures which could not stand elsewhere than on canvas. The architectural backgrounds of Van Eyck, which we recall in Munich and elsewhere, are wrought, however, with exceptional fidelity; indeed, early masters generally, whether Northern or Italian, seldom falsify facts. Early schools for the most part do not seek for a beauty which is incompatible with truth, though imagination and the sense of the supernatural had full sway. In "A Legend of the Madonna" (222), by Van Orley, angels mingle among arches and columns, and minister to the Madonna. And again, in another charming composition, "The Virgin and Child; Angels on either side" (221), by Van der Goes, the winged messengers from the world of spirits are poised, bird-like, mid air, without fear of fall. Artists in the olden time had learnt the secret of being true to the imagination while they contravened the physical laws of nature. In one or two of the compositions before us we see how architectural backgrounds and surroundings give to the enclosed or canopied figure balanced symmetry and statuesque dignity. In that exquisite little gem, highly finished as a miniature, "A Virgin and Child" (234), by Van Eyck, the figures are brought into truest relation with the Gothic adjuncts, so that the composition becomes one and indivisible. Another instance of analogous treatment, "A Virgin and Child under a Canopy" (229), by Mabuse, introduces a later, freer, and less pure style, German Gothic such as we meet with in shrines and canopies of Nuremberg. It might be interesting further to work out the relation subsisting between Gothic architecture and the early pictorial schools of the North; Gothic sculpture would of course come in as a connecting link, and the general argument might receive further elucidation through French, German, and English ivories, wherein Gothic details are plentifully found. The present exhibition naturally affords fuller illustration of the Renaissance side of the question; but the close connexion between architecture, sculpture, and painting under the Italian Renaissance is almost too well known to need elucidation.

A curious but eminently characteristic example of that strange, fantastic man who forsook the blacksmith's anvil for the painter's easel is "The Call of Levi" (239). This is a picture which would have greatly delighted the English pre-Raphaelites in the time of their first love, when they put off beauty for ugliness, the garment of joy for sackcloth, and, turning aside from flesh and blood, clung tenderly to skin and bones. We have sometimes regretted that Quintin Matsys did not remain a blacksmith to the end of his days, yet we cannot but be grateful to the painter who has given us the magnificent "Descent from the Cross," now in the Antwerp Museum. "The Call of Levi" here before us belongs less to the sacred than to the secular division of this painter's art; the low type given to the Christ sinks the work irremediably; the money-changing, customs-taking properties in the shop rank the composition with the famous "Misers." The technical qualities of this curious panel are by no means admirable; it is said that Quintin had a son Jan, who worked out and multiplied the old man's designs. Lucas van Leyden, the contemporary of Matsys, is better known by his numerous engravings than by his somewhat scarce pictures. Well accredited, as coming from the choice collection of Mr. Thomas Baring, is a composition severe in style, serious in purpose, yet abounding in almost decorative detail—the "Legend of St. Giles and the Wounded Hart" (224). St. Giles, St. Hubert, and St. Eustace are in legendary art severally associated with the chase. St. Giles, who alone remains in our Calendar, is the patron of cripples; hence the name "St. Giles, Cripple-gate." The whole legend could not be more compactly or prettily told than in the picture exhibited. The Saint is seated in a rocky country nigh to his hermitage, and at his feet falls the arrow-stricken hind that furnished him with milk. The timid creature seeks shelter from the huntmen, and thus the King of France in his pursuit of the hart discovers the Saint. The theme is handled earnestly and lovingly; flowers tenderly painted in the foreground, as in Italian pictures of the same period, symbolize a life like that of the lilies of the field, without care for the morrow.

Nine pictures by Holbein, some among the finest portraits ever painted, have a right to more space than we can spare. We begin with the mention of one of the artist's general subjects, "Noli me tangere" (225), from Hampton Court, and once, as the number on the panel testifies, in the collection of Charles I. It evidently is an early work, belonging to the period when Holbein was jack of all trades in Basle. In technique the greater part of the picture is simply vile, yet the figure of the Magdalen has grand dramatic movement. Holbein, in common with his contemporaries, was the skilled craftsman ready for any work which good fortune might fling in his way—altar painting, glass designing, portrait painting. That we in England know Holbein, as we do Vandyck, chiefly through portraits, is because the art trade of England has always taken that direction. But we have reason to be proud of our portraits; never was a face more faithfully or unflinchingly painted than that of Lady Butts (94); how shrewd is the eye, how decisive the nostrils, how firm and resolute the mouth! The panel, too, in its outlying surface and inlying tissues, is all but intact; whereas the companion portrait of "Sir William Butts" (96) has suffered grievously from repairs which are as obnoxious as the overcoatings of a plasterer. Mr. Wornum, in his volume on Holbein, throws doubts on the "Portrait of John Reskimer, a Cornish Gentleman" (213), from Hampton Court; also on the "Portrait of Dr. Thomas Linacre, Physician to Henry VII. and Henry VIII." (214). The same conscientious critic discriminates wisely as to the "Portrait of Warham, Archbishop of Cantorbury" (82). The picture appears to us angular and scratchy, dry and colourless; a replica, in some points superior, is in the Louvre. Mr. Wornum mentions the Archbishop's portrait as "one of the first of importance painted in this country, and a remarkable specimen of the painter's powers." Mr. Millais, R.A., contributes "A Portrait" (52), which was well spoken of in the Holbein Exhibition of Dresden. "Sir Henry Guildford" (138), a well-known head from Windsor, is one of the master's most individual and incisive heads. The works we have enumerated once more declare Holbein to be the most literal, whilst the least imaginative, of painters. Accordingly, as historic records, we trust these transcripts as we should trust photographs.

The art of Vandyck, as compared with the art of Holbein, was that of the courtier and sycophant. Bluff King Hal may be taken as the type of the one, while the more elegant figure and æsthetic features of King Charles are indicative of the other. Vandyck made nature bend to his pre-ordained lines of grace. Hogarth's line of beauty, whereof Vandyck might be supposed to have had prevision, is generally to be traced in his compositions; the pose of his elegantly formed hands, drooping as if the sitter's soul were languishing, is often the keynote to the entire portrait. Thirty-two works by this painter afford a pretty full summary of his art; the interesting series of small sketches in monochrome, contributed by the Duke of Buccleuch, show into what monotony the artist's mannerism degenerated, yet they are marked by his usual "delicate precision of drawing, nice discrimination of character, and grace of action." These small heads in brown chiaroscuro, having been put into the hands of the best engravers in the Netherlands, were published with etchings executed by Vandyck himself. From Windsor Castle comes one of the most delicate, silvery, and painstaking of the artist's works, the "Portrait of Henrietta Maria, Queen of Charles I." (99). Observe the light touch of the pencil in the play of the hair, the tenderness of the greys passing with nice distinction from face to neck, from pearls to satin. In the way of full-lengths there are no finer examples than the portraits of M. Philippe le Roy and his wife (128-134), contributed by Sir Richard Wallace. For stately bearing, for style which reconciles artifice with simplicity, these noble figures are without rival. Here we see in the classic column and the ponderous curtain the pomp and circumstance which, as we have shown, the Renaissance brought into the pictorial arts. The lady's dress might be a lesson to Mr. Buckner and other painters of millinery; the true artist knows the point at which to stop short of extravagance. These two magnificent portraits were purchased in 1850 by the late Marquis of Hertford, at the sale of the King of Holland's collection, for the considerable sum of 5,300*l*. That such well-known works should involve a ridiculous blunder in the Catalogue shows that Royal Academicians are not always well-read men, even in their own profession. Some savant of Burlington House, blessed with the knowledge of a little French, read "M. Philippe le Roy" as nothing less than King Philip; accordingly the companion picture is entered in the Catalogue as the "Portrait of the Queen of Philippe le Roi." The compilers of this guide-book might have saved themselves from being laughed at if they had taken the trouble to turn over the pages of Dr. Waagen, or even of some schoolboy's handbook.

The Dutch pictures comprise a dubious "Portrait of Rembrandt's Mother" (68); "A Lady" (148), sumptuous in satin, by Terburg; "La belle Limonadière" (190), another case of shimmering satin by Netscher; "A Cavalier and Female with a Tankard" (194), a panel sharp and sparkling in touch, by Mieris; also "A Young Man Robbed of his Watch," a sly satire on the times, showing a finish and refinement not usual with Steen. Any persons who may have a love for Teniers are kindly furnished with works which will gratify their tastes. A pleasing example of what may be termed the Italianized Dutch style is a "Landscape" by Jan Asselyn. Lovely for light and for liquid water is "The River" (147), a scene which we may be sure warmed the heart of bucolic Cuyp. We must also mention, as very fine in quality, a large tree study (180), by Hobbema; "A Ruined Arch, with Trees" (89), and "A Ruin on a River Bank" (184), both by Ruysdael. But the pride of the collection is the famous "Rainbow Landscape" (125). We might here suppose that Rubens determined to outdo Titian. With impetuous hand indifferent to detail, he sweeps across his vast canvas golden field, and shadowy trees, and blue horizon, spanning and illumining the sky with the bow which brings the composition together. The audacity of genius, or what some might call the triumph of art over nature, was never more conspicuous than in this masterpiece. In a future article we shall speak of the English school.

REVIEWS.

PHILLIPS'S GEOLOGY OF OXFORD.*

IN no department of physics can the scheme of scientific study incorporated of late years with the Oxford course be said to have taken more vigorous root, or to have brought forth fruit of greater promise, than in that of geology. Fortunate, or we should rather say judicious, in the choice of a successor to the chair vacated by Buckland, Oxford has shown herself to possess among her rising minds a fund of sympathy and a growing taste for that branch of study such as to second and give practical effect to the energy and abilities brought by the Professor to his task. Courses of lectures admirable for their clearness and vivacity found a supplement even more stimulating perhaps to the zeal, and leaving a deeper impress on the minds of his class, in the series of excursions planned by Professor Phillips during appropriate periods of the year, bringing the student face to face with nature in her structural aspects, and enabling him to verify and grasp by direct contact with phenomena the generalizations or inferences of the classroom. Hand in hand teacher and pupil have thus sought at the fountain-head of nature herself the secrets of her progressive stages of growth. Excursions of this kind have, we doubt not, though the writer has not expressly said so, contributed in no slight degree to the full and exhaustive accumulation of materials which makes the volume before us as complete a monograph of the physical features of a single district as the literature of scientific exploration has to show.

Nor is the interest attaching to the subject of that merely local character which the title of the work might at first sight suggest. The geology of Oxford and the Thames Valley has, as Professor Phillips begins by explaining, a remarkable bearing upon the widest problems of the science. The history of that part of the earth's surface now occupied by the Valley of the Thames comprises the whole period of geological time, from the oldest rocks of sedimentary formation to the latest pre-historic alluvium. In no district of such moderate extent can so large a series of persistent marine life be placed in such co-ordination with physical conditions of land and sea through so long a range of continuous time. The museums of the University of Oxford, of which Professor Phillips gives a slight preliminary sketch, have lent their valuable aid to the preparation of the present volume, and to the illustration of every branch of the subject. Among these is the oldest collection ever formed in the British Isles for the illustration of natural history, antiquities, and geology. Though popularly known by the name of Ashmole, its donor and second founder, the nucleus of this museum was formed by the Tradescants, father and son. In later years the labours of Buckland, Strickland, Acland, and Rolleston have had for their result an almost unrivalled wealth of organic remains as well in the department of comparative anatomy as in that of fossil geology. Foremost among the treasures of Oxford is the great series of reptilian bones from the oolites. It is by the high and almost continuous oolite range of the Cotswolds that what may be called in a limited sense the natural district round Oxford, including the branches of the upper Thames, is bounded to the west and north, as well as by the almost equally lofty cretaceous strata to the south and south-west. Oxford, though not quite, geographically speaking, in the centre of this district, is strictly so in relation to its geological distribution and structure. In a larger sense the district which is open to the Oxford student is extended by Professor Phillips to the whole range of the chalk from Wiltshire to Bedfordshire, with the river Kennet; and the vale of the Severn, with the picturesque chain of Malvern. His coloured geological map, supplemented by a series of vertical sections, gives a clear idea of the striking arrangement which affords in the Malvern ridge a key to the whole mystery of palæozoic life. Oldest amongst all the rocks of Great Britain, having probably contemporaneous groups in the gneissic hills of the north-western Highlands of Scotland and the Hebrides, the gneissic ridges of the Malvern Beacon, at once crystallized and laminated, uprear themselves amidst and through the surrounding strata. Of igneous origin and metamorphic in condition, these monuments of a primary age, separated by a line of fault on either side, have on their western face felspathic and hornblende rocks of considerable variety, which by many persons, including Professor Phillips himself, were once thought to have been erupted after the stratified Silurian beds were formed which now cover them in part. A longer examination has made this opinion no longer tenable. It may be considered certain that the main portion of the lowest rocks in all the hills of the Malvern range is of older date than any of the strata which rest unconformably upon them. The theory which has assigned the earliest of these stratified deposits to the Laurentian series of Canada is not indeed borne out by sufficient evidence, but there can be no hesitation in identifying them with the Cambrian strata of the next palæozoic age, followed as they are by the lower and upper Silurian, the old red sandstone, the marls and conglomerates which precede the coal measures and Permian conglomerates. The middle space of the Oxford district is filled for the most part with mesozoic strata of great interest and variety, while tertiary deposits appear towards the southern border. The student has thus presented to him, within an area well nigh to be scanned from the watch-tower of the Worcester Beacon, an epitome of the whole series of changes which the surface of the earth has undergone from the dawn of geological time.

The vale of Severn is shown by the accumulations of drift in its various hollows to have had its present general aspect in periods as far remote as when the mastodon, rhinoceros, and hippopotamus roamed over the surface of Britain. Yet there is reason, Professor Phillips shows, to regard it as having been formed, in great part at least, by excavation of the once more widely extended strata; the hills of Brecon and Dumbleton having been separated from the Cotswolds, and the line stripped from the red marls which it once covered probably to the foot of the Malverns. He pictures to us the steep western escarpment of the breezy colt chain, beaten by the rough Severn sea, before the elevation which raised the vale of Severn and Avon from 50 to 300 or 400 feet. To the east and south of the Cotswolds another area of elevation and depression is seen in the great system of Thames drainage. A special chapter is given by our author to the first of British rivers and its tributaries. Never has Tamesis or less been so minutely or exhaustively traced through its etymological or geographical windings to its "very head," its affluents verified and measured, the strata which determine its course and qualify its waters mapped and analysed, and its history drawn out from the days of the Cæsars, through prehistoric, to British, classic, and modern times. On a general view of the country drained by the Thames, there appear three distinct ridges, alternating with hollows parallel to the ranges of out-cropping strata. First is the vale of Thames and Ray between the line of the Cotswolds to Edgehill, and that from Faringdon across Shotover to Brill; secondly, the vale of Ock and Thame, to the south of the latter range, and north of the line of Downs of Wilts, Berks, Oxon, and Herts; beyond which the vale of Kennet and Thames forms the third and principal hollow, prolonged into the great estuarine plain which reaches to the German Ocean. Though least conspicuous by its height, Shotover ridge presents a succession of insulated summits which have escaped the denuding influence of watery action everywhere else traceable over this region, still retaining its cap of iron sand and ochre above the Purbeck beds and Kimmeridge clay. To account for the peculiar configuration of land and water space, we have to fall back upon the condition of things which gave rise to the existing "summits of drainage," as Professor Phillips well designates the lines of high level or summit ridge from which rain falling vertically runs down to a valley on either side, in preference to such terms as either "watershed" or "water parting." Those lines were materially determined by the irregularities of the sea bed, as the land which ultimately formed the British island group rose by gradual elevations. A series of maps is made to exhibit clearly the aspect of the country at successive periods, as affected by elevations from 1,000 to 500 and 250 feet above the sea. At the earliest of these periods nothing but the higher peaks of the Malvern Hills, Cleve, near Cheltenham, and Broadway, near Evesham, can have appeared above the waste of waters. At 500 feet we have the aspect of things represented in our author's intermediate diagram—the Cotswolds as a broken series of digitated masses, the Thames basin confluent with the Avon of Wilts and the Avon of Warwick; a series of islands branching out in a wide expanse of ocean, and more than half the area of the Oxford district still submerged: no limit to the sea on the eastward; islets of oolite near Oxford, straits of chalk near Pangbourne, with other straits, especially on the Evenlode and the Cherwell, through which a communication is open to the great midland sea which reaches to the hills of Lincolnshire, Derbyshire, and Shropshire. At intervals, in the process of elevation, ice rafts in abundance may be conceived drifting southward by the straits of Evenlode and Cherwell, transplanting the red pebbles of Warwickshire to the vale of the Thames. When within 250 feet of its present level, the valleys of the Severn and Thames are distinctly demarked, that of the Thames a vast estuary with a sea loch up the Kennet vale. Lochs extend right and left up the Thame and the Ock. Straits are seen between the chalk hills of Chiltern and Lambourn, straits near Abingdon, and lochs again right and left up the Ray and the Thames. Under these conditions the Cotswold rivers may be conceived delivering abundant detritus, and forming gravel and sand beds of great extent on the sides of the long loch of the upper Thames, while from the chalk hills considerable quantities of flints would be collected on other parts of the shores. Following the retiring sea, rivers hollowed out their beds to their present configuration, sweeping away the deposits of an earlier age, or covering them with a fresh accumulation of matter. The various sub-aerial vicissitudes, gradually rather than by any cataclysmal violence, modified the features of the land, and left their memorials in the rich profusion which the hand of science is now outstretched to grasp.

In a series of special chapters Professor Phillips draws out in detail the several links of the chain of proof which he has indicated in general terms at the outset of his argument. From the oldest azoic or gneissic rocks, with their crystallized masses of quartzo-felspathic granite, hornblende or felspar, through the second or Cambrian age, with its first faint traces of life in a fossil fauna, possibly fucoïd, followed by richer deposits in the black shale of unmistakable relationship with the Tremadoc or Upper Lingula flags, together with the earliest form of trilobite, the Malvern rocks are shown to teach the simplest lessons in comparative geology. A gap occurs in the next stage, owing to the absence of the rich fossiliferous strata classified as the Bala rocks in North Wales, and as the Llandeilo and Caradoc beds in South Wales and Shropshire. In the later Silurian deposits closer analogies are to be traced. For the compound series following the old red sandstone and carboniferous strata, introducing totally new conditions, the term "poikilitic" has for thirty years been applied by Professor Phillips; and to it he with reason adheres, as expressive of its multifarious analogies or affinities; although the later section has been separated by Sir R. Murchison under the category of Permian, and the magnesian limestone of the series has, on the ground of its fossil contents, been assigned by our Professor himself to the carboniferous group. Between the coal and the Rhaetic base of the lias the whole series of Permian, triassic, and Rhaetic deposits may be treated as one great poikilitic series. The total thickness of these strata on the east of the Malvern ridge is estimated at 1,370 feet; the deposition of a sea which washed the face of these cliffs, working up and laying a new bed of sandstones, marls, and conglomerates, the debris of the palæozoic rocks. The earliest member of this series has since the time of Murchison's great exploration taken its name from the district which forms its most generic type, the ancient kingdom of Perm, in Russia. The necessity for the introduction of a term for the newly-discovered group between the new red and the lias, resting for its principal type upon the succession of fossil fauna in the series of the Rhaetic Alps, led to the name of Rhaetic being adopted for the shales, limestones, and clays below the lias and oolites. The Rhaetic beds have in this country nothing like the richness in respect to forms of life which belongs to the grand series of oolite deposits. That which is the most original and instructive portion of Professor Phillips's work is his description of the mighty forms which head this magnificent series—the Megalosaurus and Cetosaurus. Owen had thirty years ago drawn attention to the analogy of the first of these vast reptilians to birds of the type of the ostrich. The ileum of Megalosaurus in the Oxford Museum suggested by its shape to Professor Huxley a strong affinity with the pubis and ischium of the struthionide. Further avian points of structure have been demonstrated in the head, the vertical column, ribs, and limbs of Megalosaurus, of which excellent diagrams and measurements are given in the volume before us. We may picture to ourselves from Professor Phillips's pages the general aspect of this great carnivorous lizard some thirty feet in length, amphibious in habits, and capable of uprearing itself upon land, upon his strong yet not clumsy hind legs, wading in the shallows or swimming by help of the tail.

Of still more imposing dimensions was the giant Cetosaurus, of whose remains the earliest specimens were found in the oolite of Chapelhouse, near Chipping-Norton, in 1825, and were at once assigned by Dr. Buckland to some yet undescribed reptile, larger than the iguanodon. Later discoveries of fragments were crowned in the year 1870 by the disinterment at Euslow Bridge of a mass of bones which have enabled nearly the whole skeleton of the Cetosaurus to be constructed with the exception of the head. Professor Phillips's chapter upon the subject, with its accompanying illustrations, forms the fullest account which has yet appeared of this mightiest representative of the group of Deinosauria or Ornithoskelida. In the absence of the head it must remain uncertain in what specific member of the group we are to recognize its nearest congener, and from thence deduce its missing elements of size or structure. Estimated by analogy with the existing crocodile, and with the scapula for a standard, the length of the Cetosaurus would appear to be no less than 100 feet, though, judged by that of the vertebral column, it would be no more than 42 feet. If the monitor or iguana be taken as a standard, we may assign 60 or 70 feet as the length. Combining the two results, we may allow for a full-sized animal the length of 50 feet, justifying its name as the "whale-lizard." Standing probably 10 feet at its full height, and of a bulk in proportion, this creature was doubtless unmatched in magnitude and physical strength by any of the largest denizens of the mesozoic land or sea. Did it live in the sea, in fresh waters, or on land? and what was its diet? That it was fitted to live exclusively in water was at one time inferred from the biconcave character of the caudal vertebrae, as well as from the sheer magnitude of the animal, which would allow it an easier life while aloft than when moving with slow and painful steps along the ground. On the other hand, the articulation of the ends of the leg bones shows an adaptation to movement in definite directions, and in consequence to terrestrial walking, with which agrees the possession of large claws, and the hollowness of the long bones. On the whole, however, as Professor Phillips suggests, it was most probably of an amphibious habit, a marsh-loving or river-side animal, dwelling amid alga, cydæceans, and conferrous shrubs and trees, full of insects and small mammalia. Its diet, as inferred from the mutilated fragment of a tooth in the Oxford Museum, resembling in general that of the iguanodon, appears to have been of a vegetable chasector. The edge of this tooth is not serrated, but the striæ of serration are so arranged as to suggest that it may have been. The diagram (the size of nature) shows a sweep of the concave surface, similar to that of the iguanodon, and a corresponding attenuation towards the edge. The truth of this conclusion has since been borne out, we learn from Nature, by the discovery in the Emslow Quarry of a tooth apparently young, nearly perfect in the crown, the serrations of which have been similarly worn away. In this interesting chapter, as throughout his book, Professor Phillips shows a grasp of facts and a mastery of the method of inductive reasoning which must make the work a valuable model for the geological student to follow.

FREEMAN'S HISTORICAL ESSAYS.*

THE immense increase in the quantity of historical literature produced in our days has been so unfavourable to its quality that it is with no common surprise and pleasure that one finds a volume of collected articles whose intrinsic and permanent merits make them thoroughly worth reprinting. Those who write in periodicals, even when they happen to be men of real literary capacity, are too apt to write in the consciousness that their work will be hastily read and soon forgotten, and the impression they make on the reader is that they do not care to put forth such powers of thought or of research as they may possess, but seek to please by a display of the superficial arts of style. It is far otherwise in the case of these Essays. Mr. Freeman strikes us as a man who cares so much for his subject and the enforcement of just views regarding it, that he addresses himself to the composition of an article for a monthly or quarterly with as much zeal and spirit as if it were a chapter of a regular history intended to take its place in libraries. He feels a more lively interest in the politics of the eleventh century than most of us do in the politics of the nineteenth, and is as anxious to set people right about Waltheof, or Earl Simon, or the claims of Edward I. on Scotland, as Mr. Gladstone is about his Irish policy, or our friends in the Spectator about their favourite Gambetta. With this intense desire to correct popular errors and prejudices on historical questions, he has perceived that there is a great public which cannot be reached through regular histories, but which may be reached, and have its errors and prejudices set right, by a succession of articles in reviews and magazines. To this work Mr. Freeman has set himself, and the perseverance with which he has reiterated his views time after time, in article after article, is not more admirable than the vigour and seriousness with which every article is marked. He puts as much force into his statement of a case, is as anxious to be accurate in his facts and sound in his judgments, to add something substantial to the knowledge of his readers, as if he had not written in the knowledge that the lapse of a month or two would consign his article to the upper shelves. In some respects, indeed, he seems to us, like Macaulay, to show to more advantage in detached articles than in a long continuous history. Macaulay in his History of England, and Mr. Freeman in his History of the Norman Conquest, have often the air of being oppressed by the mass of their materials, and by the high standard of historical composition which they have set up for themselves. Both are apt to linger too long over comparatively unimportant details, to comment too fully on the aspects of a situation, to exert their powers of description in a way which leaves too little to the reader's imagination and makes too frequent a demand on his feelings. In their occasional pieces they work with a freer and bolder hand. They tell us not everything, but only what is striking and easily remembered; their style has a quicker and more varied movement. And both alike improve us the more by this, that a collection of articles gives a far stronger impression of the range and profundity of their knowledge than a long treatise upon the same subject can do. Mr. Freeman's Essays do not, indeed, like Macaulay's, cover a wide field of literature and politics as well as of history, but in the domain of history proper they display not only a singularly full and accurate mastery of things ancient and modern as well as mediæval, of things Continental as well as English, but a comprehensiveness of view, a power of interpreting each part by the light of all the rest, which is one of the rarest and highest of an historian's gifts.

The Essays included in this volume fall into three groups—those bearing on English history, those bearing on foreign European history, and two (the first and the last) of a more general kind. Although considerably different in merit and interest, all of them are well worth reading, and very agreeable to read, full of sound thinking, and evidently based on a careful investigation of facts. They are also excellent examples of true historical method—of the way to gather facts, sift them, interpret them, generalize from them. And no clearer conception can be gained of what it is that constitutes a right and what a wrong method in historical inquiry than by comparing these Essays with the work, we will not say of such writers as Mr. Hapworth Dixon, but even of men of some real literary skill, like Mr. Buckle, Mr. Lecky, or Mr. Kingsley. Being mostly criticisms of books, and rather comments on history than narratives, they presuppose some little knowledge of the events and characters they deal with; but as Mr. Freeman's manner is rather direct than allusive, they are most of them quite intelligible to an ordinarily well-read man, and often put an historical situation in a clearer light than one can find in any of the standard histories. We could have wished, however, that, as they were not printed precisely as they first appeared, Mr. Freeman had omitted some of his milder criticisms upon the books which occasioned the articles, just as these criticisms usually are. The article on St. Thomas of Canterbury, for instance, would be more enjoyable if one were not drawn aside from its main scope to mark Mr. Robertson's faults; and the admirable estimate of Charles the Bold's character and position would lose nothing by cutting out of it the censures on Mr. Kirk's extravagances of style. When the object of an article is to demolish a bad book, as was the case with Macaulay's review of Croker's Beowulf and Robert Montgomery's poems, it is another affair; but here Mr. Robertson and Mr. Kirk are of secondary importance, and take up time and space which were better spent on the subject itself.

The most valuable, and we think also the most interesting, of the Essays are the six which deal with foreign mediæval history—"The Holy Roman Empire," "The Franks and the Gauls," "The Early Sieges of Paris," "Frederick the First King of Italy," "The Emperor Frederick the Second," and "Charles the Bold." There is a natural connexion between all these (a connexion which would have been still more perfect if the author's well-known article on Ancient Greece and Mediæval Italy, in Oxford Essays for 1857, had also been inserted), and, taken together, they will do more to remove current misconceptions of mediæval history than any other book in the English language. They ought in particular to be prescribed to those unhappy people for whom especially (though not always in charity) Mr. Freeman seems to write—people who have drawn their notions from French books, and from those English followers of Auguste Comte who seem more hopelessly belated than the French themselves. The central idea and purpose of these six Essays is to make clear the relations to one another of the three great Continental races of the earlier middle ages—Italians, Germans, and French—and in particular to show what was the attitude of the Germanic Emperor to the King of France and the various Powers of Italy. The first of these purposes is carried out with excellent clearness and precision in the article entitled "The Franks and the Gauls." Mr. Freeman remarks very truly that the chief source of error is the amazing ignorance of historical geography which comes from our want or neglect of proper maps:—

There is perhaps nothing which people in general find harder to master than the science of historical geography. Few men indeed there are who fully realize the way in which nations have changed their places and countries have changed their boundaries. We say "fully realize," because the facts are continually known in a kind of way when there is no sort of living realization of them. Almost everybody has heard, for instance, of the succession of "the Britons" and "the Saxons" in this island. A man knows in a kind of way that "the Saxons" are his own forefathers, and that they drove "the Britons" into a corner, but he does not fully take in the fact that these "Britons" and "Saxons" are simply Welshmen and Englishmen. . . . One cause of the evil is doubtless the want of proper historical maps. Every household does not boast a copy of Spruner's Hand Atlas. People are set to read the history of the world with two sets of maps. One is to serve from Adam to Theodoric, or to Charles the Fifth—we are not quite sure which—the other, from Theodoric or Charles the Fifth to the year 1860. They sit down to read about John and Philip Augustus either with a map of Roman Gaul, or with a map of Napoleonic France. Now if you want to find the homes of the Twelve Peers of France, it is no light matter to do so when you have to choose between a map showing you only Gallia Lugdunensis and Germania Prima, and a map showing you only the departments of Gironde and of Ile and Vienne. People read of the return of Richard Cœur de Lion from the East, and how he falls into the hands of the Duke of Austria, and is presently passed over into those of the "Emperor of Germany." This Duke and this Emperor are persons not a little mysterious to those whose only idea of "Austria" is something which takes in Venetia at the one end and Transylvania at the other.

He is therefore very exact in following down from century to century the changes in the names of the various Frankish kingdoms, and in the relations of the races which were comprised in them, showing how the boundaries of these kingdoms varied; how by degrees a French, that is a Gallo-Roman, nationality formed itself under the leadership of the Counts of Paris and their successors the Kings of Francia Occidentalis; how these kings extended their power by annexing one after another the great fiefs which had owned a merely nominal subjection to the Parisian Crown; and how the modern kingdom of France was at last built up by the seizure of other territories, belonging some of them to the Germanic, others to the Burgundian kingdom. The details of this sketch are further worked out and illustrated in an article on the early sieges of Paris, and in a review of Mr. Kirk's Charles the Bold, specially valuable for the clearness with which it sets forth the attitude of nascent Switzerland to the States upon its borders. To the other main object of these Essays, the explanation of the European position of the Germanic Emperors, three Essays are devoted—one in which the general character of the Empire is described; another containing an account of the life and reign of Frederick Barbarossa; and a third reviewing Mr. Kingdon's History of the Emperor Frederick the Second, in which is given a very able and interesting, though slightly exaggerated, estimate of that extraordinary man. These three articles, like the three before mentioned, should be read together, and it is rather surprising that they are not so arranged in the book.

Of the English articles the best, to our thinking, are those on the continuity of English history and on St. Thomas of Canterbury and his biographers. In the former of these our author, who usually delights more in details than in generalities, draws in outline, but with a free and masterly pencil, a picture of those essential features of the English Constitution and English political character which have remained substantially the same since the formation of the nation itself:—

This continuity of English history from the very beginning is a point which cannot be too strongly insisted upon, but it is its special continuity from the thirteenth century onwards which forms the most instructive part of the comparison between English history and the history of Germany and France. At the time of the Norman Conquest, the many small Teutonic kingdoms in Britain had grown into the one Teutonic kingdom of England, rich in her barbaric greatness and barbaric freedom, with the germs, but as yet only the germs, of every institution which we most dearly prize. At the close of the thirteenth century we see the England with which we are still familiar, young indeed and tender, but still possessing more than the germs, the very things themselves. She has already King, Lords, and Commons. She has a King, mighty indeed and honoured, but who may neither ordain laws nor impose taxes against the will of his people. She has Lords with high hereditary powers, but Lords who are still only the foremost rank of the people, whose children sink into the common mass of Englishmen, and into whose order any Englishman may be raised. She has a Commons still diffident in the exercise of new-born rights; but a Commons whose constitution and whose powers we have altered only by gradual changes of detail; a Commons which, if it sometimes shrink from hard questions of State, was at least resolved that no man should take their money without their leave. The Courts of Justice, the great offices of State, the chief features of local administration, have assumed or are rapidly assuming the form whose essential character they still retain. The struggle with Papal Rome has already begun; doctrines and ceremonies indeed remain as yet unchallenged, but statute after statute is passed to restrain the abuses of and exactions of the ever hateful Roman Court. The great middle class of England is rapidly forming a middle class not, as elsewhere, confined to a few great cities, but spread, in the form of a minor gentry and a wealthy yeomanry, over the whole face of the land. Villainage still exists, but both law and custom are paving the way for that gradual and silent extinction of it which, without any formal abolition of the legal status, left, three centuries later, not a legal villain among us. With this exception, there was in theory equal law for all classes, and imperfectly as the theory may have been carried out, it was at least far less imperfectly so than in any other kingdom.

The article on St. Thomas is an excellent illustration of the way in which history has gained by what one may call the sympathetic method. No man desired more earnestly to be fair and candid than did Hallam, but there was an innate repugnance in him and all his friends to ecclesiasticism, a repugnance laudable in many ways, but which made it impossible for him to master and appreciate one whole side of mediæval history. Mr. Freeman's estimate of the famous Archbishop (an extremely subtle and ingenious piece of work) is not only fairer, but incomparably more instructive, than what one could have had from a Whig of the good old type—fairer even, we venture to think, than the powerful narrative of Dean Milman, and in the main coincident with that of Dean Stanley, a writer to whose best qualities Mr. Freeman pays proper tribute, and who represents in a striking manner one form or line of the modern sympathetic school. Historians of this school are exposed to two dangers. One is a tendency to forget or ignore permanent moral distinctions, to lose sight of the rightfulness or wrongfulness of acts in the attempt to enter into and make the best of the feelings of the actors—a tendency of which we have so many examples among living writers that none need be specially named. Mr. Freeman is quite free from this, but not equally free from the other danger, that of partisanship, especially where his feelings of English patriotism are at all stirred. In dealing with Godwin and Harold he is much more the advocate than the judge, and in the essay which deals with the Historical Relations of the Crowns of England and Scotland he is manifestly biased by his enthusiasm for Edward I., and for his own theory—a theory pushed much further than we think the authorities warrant—of what he calls the English Empire. It deserves, however, to be noticed that with Mr. Freeman partisanship never takes the form, its worst and commonest form, of appeals to the passions of the reader. This essay contains none of those suggestions of national prejudice which have been so often used to darken the question; it is a string of arguments always clear and usually cogent; arguments whose weight is in some cases over-estimated, but every one of which deserves consideration, and might properly be brought forward in a court of law.

Were we not at the end of our space, we should be disposed to urge upon Mr. Freeman and other writers of the exact school that they weaken the effect of their corrections of great historical blunders by being nearly as vehement in the correction of small ones. People who are exhorted with equal earnestness not to call Colonia Cologne, and to remember that it is and always was a German town, may be apt to think that the former fault is as grave in their preacher's eyes as the latter. There is an occasional want of proportion in Mr. Freeman's dealings with these matters; nor can we help regretting that he should so frequently intersperse his discussions of the early relations of France and Germany with hits at Louis Napoleon; they produce a disagreeable sense of incongruity. However, there is something characteristic even in this; there is a force and flavour which one would not willingly lose, and blemishes far more serious might be pardoned for the sake of the vigorous individuality which stands out in every page of these Essays. Few men have done so much as Mr. Freeman, and none have done more, to raise the character of English historical learning, and to show that painstaking accuracy in details is not incompatible with, is indeed the natural preparation for, a comprehensive grasp of general principles. Addressing a comparatively limited public, and never accommodating himself to its tastes or prejudices, he has nevertheless produced a marked and definite effect upon English opinion, and all the more for the direct, common sense, English character of his own mind. He is perhaps rather too fond of a fight, too impatient of ignorance, too harsh in his judgments of adversaries whose position he has not entered into. But it is always for what he regards as truth and justice that he fights; and he never touches a question without adding to our comprehension of it, without leaving the impression of an ample knowledge, a righteous purpose, a clear and powerful understanding.

CHAPTERS OF ERIE.

THE assassination of the notorious James Fisk lends a special interest at this moment to the principal subject treated in the volume before us; but the book has quite sufficient intrinsic value to deserve and repay attention. The essays of which it is composed originally appeared, with one exception, in the North American Review, and are the work of Mr. Charles Francis Adams and Mr. Henry Adams, two sons of the late American Minister in this country. They are for the most part directed against the Erie and the Tammany Hall Rings, and present no pleasing picture of American life; but for that very reason the public owes its best thanks to the authors, who have been among the foremost in denouncing the venality evinced by the Bench, the utter disregard of honesty, and the complete unscrupulousness which have characterized the prominent actors in these financial combinations, and disgraced the Legislature and society of America for years past. Now that the Erie Ring is in a state of collapse, it is difficult to conceive of its former position, or to understand how it was enabled to wield such uncontrolled power, to extend its authority over everything that came near it, and to present a spectacle sufficient to make educated men despair of their country.

The first essay in this volume is entitled a Chapter of Erie, and represents the contest between Vanderbilt and Drew in 1867 for the possession of the Erie Railway, and the tactics employed by them in their struggles. The Erie road was no ordinary prize; its receipts in 1865 exceeded three millions sterling a year, while its operations were conducted over 773 miles of track. It was in the hands of Mr. Drew, a gentleman of whom it is stated "that he ever regarded his fiduciary position of a director in a railroad as a means of manipulating its stock for his own advantage." On the other hand, Mr. Vanderbilt had in 1866 gained possession of the New York Central Railway; it only remained for him to make himself master of the Erie, and thus control the two great lines of railway which traverse the State of New York and connect it with the West. In order to effect this, Vanderbilt had two things to do—in the first place, to buy up the Erie stock; in the second, to prevent the issue of a further supply, which Mr. Drew might be confidently expected to have recourse to should circumstances render such a proceeding desirable. Judge Barnard accordingly enters upon the scene, and issues an injunction restraining the Erie Board from any new issue of capital stock by conversion of bonds or otherwise. Drew, however, has also his own Judge, who grants another injunction staying all proceedings commenced in the suit before Judge Barnard. It may be safely asserted that orders, writs, and injunctions are always to be obtained whenever they are wanted to fulfil any conceivable purpose, and the judicial pawns are played one against the other with little intermission. In spite of Judge Barnard, fifty thousand shares of new Erie stock were flung upon the market and absorbed by Vanderbilt before its origin was suspected, while Drew and his colleagues, with seven millions of their opponents' money, were obliged to seek their safety in flight, and avoid, by retiring to Jersey City, the consequences of having openly set at defiance the authority of the legal tribunals. The further proceedings before Judge Barnard are thus characterized:—

It is unnecessary to go into the details of the strange and revolting scenes which the next few months witnessed in the rooms of the Supreme Court. They read like some monstrous parody of the forms of law; some Saturnalia of Bench and Bar. The magistrate became more partisan than were the paid advocates before him, and all seemed to vie one with another in their efforts to bring their common profession into public contempt. Day and night detectives in the pay of suitors dogged the steps of the magistrate; and their sworn affidavits, filed in his own Court, sought to implicate him in an attempt to kidnap Drew by means of armed ruffians, and to bring the fugitive by violence within reach of his process.

The scene now shifts to Albany, where a Bill was introduced into the Assembly legalizing the recent issue of new stock, and forbidding the consolidation of the two great railroads in the hands of Vanderbilt. This move of the Erie party failed, as the Bill was adversely reported on, and the Report was adopted by a vote of eighty-three to thirty-two. At this point Mr. Gould comes into prominence, and goes to Albany as the Erie emissary, with the view of obtaining the legalization of the recent issue of stock. Mr. Gould is arrested, bailed, again arrested, escapes, and returns to Albany, where his fertile expedients and an unlimited command of money aid in restoring public sympathy with the Erie party:—

He gave to one man in whom he said "he did not take much stock" the sum of 5,000 dollars "just to smooth him over." This man had just received 5,000 dollars of Erie money from another agent of the Company. Another individual is reported to have received 100,000 dollars from one side to influence legislation, and to have subsequently received 70,000 dollars from the other side to disappear with the money; which he accordingly did, and thereafter became a gentleman of elegant leisure.

The result of these negotiations was that a fresh Bill was introduced, and though but a few days before it had been thrown out by a vote of eighty-three to thirty-two, it now passed the Assembly by a vote of one hundred and one to six. A compromise was now entered into between the two contending parties—a compromise which drew nine millions from the Erie treasury, and left the management of the road in the hands of Gould and Fisk. Their directorship involved the continuance of the same practices. Between the 1st of July, 1868, and the 24th of October, 135,000 shares had been issued, and the stock of the Company increased 138 per cent. in eight months. Allied to the Tammany Hall, in the persons of Tweed and Sweeny, after a series of disreputable transactions and shameless intrigues, they made themselves the complete masters of the Erie road.

Among these histories of scandals perhaps the most graphically descriptive is that contained in the article reprinted from the Westminster Review, entitled the "New York Gold Conspiracy," in which Gould and Fisk again appear on the scene in an endeavour to raise the premium upon gold from thirty to forty cents at harvest-time, and, as a consequence, oblige the farmer to "send all his crop to New York for export over the Erie Railway, which was sorely in need of freights." It was owing to no want of energy on the part of the promoters that this scheme failed, but simply from the interference of the Executive. An "Erie Raid" gives an account of the fight for the management of the Albany and Susquehanna Railroad between Mr. Ramsey, the original projector of the line, and the Erie Directors, to whom it had become a desirable acquisition, owing to its proximity to and connexion with their own railways. The history of one of these attempts is the history of all, and we do not care to go through the successive steps in chicanery and corruption which characterize the proceedings. One Judge sets aside the decrees of another; one orders the arrest, another the discharge, of the prisoners; rival receivers are appointed, which results in a contest between the two locomotives, the collision of the engines, and a hand-to-hand fight between Mr. Ramsey's party and that of the Erie Directors. This state of things was, however, even beyond what the State of New York could tolerate, and as the Courts were unable to enforce their jurisdiction, the Executive, in the person of the Governor, stepped in and placed the road in the hands of a State Receiver. Ultimately the Attorney-General began a new suit, in which all parties were included, with the view of solving the difficulty:—

Twenty-two suits had been begun, a score of injunctions had been issued, numberless orders had been made, and both parties now stood ready to continue the same style of warfare, just as long as any Judge could be found who disregarded the duties of his position on the one side or who did not lack nerve on the other.

The case came before Justice Smith, who sustained the Ramsey Board in almost every particular, decreed costs to them, and animadverted upon the conduct of the Erie Ring in the terms which they deserved. Fortunately for Mr. Ramsey, the property in question was leased in 1870 to the Hudson and Delaware Canal Company, with whom the Erie Directors could not afford to quarrel.

Though it is this succinct series of exposures which gives its chief value to the volume before us, it is pleasant to leave the atmosphere of the Erie Ring and turn to an article on Captain John Smith by Mr. Henry Adams, which constitutes the modicum of sack allowed during the consumption of this financial bread. Captain Smith was a member of the council of the Virginian Company, upon whom James I. conferred a charter in the year 1606, and the difficulties attendant upon the settlement of the new colony in the following year led to the episode in connexion with which Smith is best known—namely, Pocahontas's intervention in his behalf. According to the received version of the story, Smith was taken prisoner by the Indians during his exploration of the Chickahominy, and led up the country to the residence of Powhatan, their Emperor. Here he was dragged up to two great stones, his head laid upon them, and himself on the point of being killed, when Pocahontas, the king's daughter, appeared upon the scene, and "when no entreaty could prevail, got his head in her arms, and laid her own upon his to save him from death." Her intercession was successful, and Smith was re-conducted in safety to the fort. It is sad to think that this is another story which must be added to the legion of more ancient and exploded myths, but the arguments furnished by Mr. Henry Adams leave little room for doubt. Smith published several accounts of his adventures among the Indians, the first of which was printed in 1608, and entitled A True Relation of Virginia, in which the story of his capture is told without assigning any share to Pocahontas in his rescue. After a variety of other publications, the first allusion to it appeared in a second edition of a pamphlet called New England's Trials, printed in 1622. Once started, the story received due elaboration, grew in importance, and attained its fullest dimensions in the General History published by Smith in 1624, from which time it has been embodied in all accounts of the colony, and received unquestioned credence until within the last few years. It seems only too probable that the notoriety which Pocahontas attained by her marriage to John Rolfe in 1613, her conversion to Christianity, her visit to England in 1616, her reception at Court, and residence in London, stimulated the recollections of Smith to a very considerable extent, and suggested the introduction of a story which he thought would add to his own fame as well as to her credit. The fact that none of the contemporaneous accounts mention the circumstance lends additional probability to the correctness of this view.

The three following essays are devoted to the consideration of the Bank of England Restriction, British Finance in 1816, and the Legal Tender Act, while the last hundred pages contain an elaborate review of the Railroad System in America, the frauds incident to its working, and the prospect of its reform. The creation and rise of a wholly new power in the course of a few decades has brought about complications which the Executive alone, if indeed the Executive, can unravel. The interests of the public are lost sight of, while the corporations, exceeding all legitimate bounds, exercise an uncontrollable authority. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company now commands more than 3,000 miles of track—a despotism within a Republic. One episode in its career deserves to be mentioned. In 1870, after a combination with the coal companies, they endeavoured to starve out the miners who had struck:—

They not only ceased to produce from their own mines, but they trebled their freights, and thus put a stop to production by all others. The result was not only great inconvenience and suffering throughout the country, but a violent disturbance of industry, and in Pennsylvania there resulted almost a condition of civil war.

To prevent abuses such as these, to check the secret issues of stock, and give the public a greater security for the efficient management of the roads, Mr. Charles Francis Adams advocates the delegation of a discretion in details and administration to a permanent and competent tribunal. This book is, in fact, one continued protest against the corruption and dishonesty which have been the marked features of American politics for years past, and its appreciation will afford some hope that the reform which has begun may be continued, and that the malpractices of such men as Tweed and Conolly may be as distasteful to Americans as to the rest of the world. We can only trust that the reaction in the public conscience which has set in will not expend its strength too soon—a reaction in which the authors of these essays may claim for themselves no inconsiderable share.

IRISH CHIEFTAINS AND ANGLO-NORMAN KNIGHTS.*

WE will make a clean breast of it at starting, and say that we have not read the whole of this book. There are cases in which a brick is a fair sample of the house. But we have not judged Mr. Gibson's house by a single brick. On the principle of taking care of the ends and letting the middle take care of itself, we have read two chapters at one end of the book and one chapter at the other end, besides here and there drawing a bow at a venture, or making sortes Gibsonianæ to see what we might find on any two pages taken at random. The results of this last kind of chance-medley were cheering. Whatever is worth doing is worth doing well, and Mr. Gibson acts manfully according to the precept Pecca fortiter. Here is something to come upon by mere chance:—

I am indebted to the kindness and politeness of the Rev. Mr. Drew, Rector of Youghal (from whom I have received many a valuable hint), for the opportunity of inspecting an interesting pedigree of the Grace Family, printed on vellum, now in the possession of Captain Sheffield Grace, of the 68th Regiment. From this we learn that the great ancestor of our "Fat Friend," or favourite Norman knight, Raymond, was Otho or Other, an Italian baron, who was descended from the Lords of Tuscany. He passed from Florence into Normandy, and thence into England, about the time of King Canute's marriage with Emma, daughter of Richard Second Duke of Normandy, and widow of King Ethelred, who died 1016. Other Fitz-Other, the son of Other, appears by Domesday Book to have been a baron of England in 1058, in 16th of Edward the Confessor. His son, Walter, was the Governor of Windsor, during the reign of William the Conqueror, and was therefore called Walter de Windsor.

So much for the ancestors on the father's and mother's side of Raymond le Gros. His descendants, judging from the vellum pedigree, are innumerable. I may here mention that the Rev. Mr. Drew, who forwarded the document for my inspection, is descended from some of the most distinguished of our Norman knights and Irish chieftains—from Strongbow, De Lacy, De La Poer, Earl Marshal, Diarmuid, King of Leinster, O'Brien, Prince of Thomond, and Mac Carthy, King of Cork.

O sancta simplicitas! we may say of the man who judges from a vellum pedigree. We will not stop to ask about the "Lords of Tuscany," whether we are to understand by the name Lars Porsena or the Marquess Boniface. But we should really like to know about this Other who seems to have come in the train of the Old Lady Emma. He may be recorded in a vellum pedigree, but vellum pedigrees are not for ordinary mortals, and we poor diggers and delvers in charters and chronicles have not had the good luck to meet him anywhere in our humbler haunts. Fearful of losing any glimmering of light, we took down Domesday to seek for the man so circumstantially described as "a baron of England in 1058, in 16th of Edward the Confessor." We did not remember many cases of such minute chronology in the Survey, but there are one or two, and we thought the fault might be ours. But, alas! the nearest approach that we can find to Other Fitz-Other, the son of Other and Baron of England, is a certain Otre, of whom all that is recorded is that he—or one or more persons of the same name—held lands T. R. E. both in Yorkshire and Devonshire. "Walterius filius Otheri" is a real man in Domesday T. R. W., but there is as little about his father being a Baron of England as there is about his being an Etruscan Lucumo. Whence all this comes we know not; most likely from the same mint as the kindred rubbish about Brucos, Comyns, and Grosvenors. One thing we do know, that, as it does not come from Domesday, so neither does it come from Dugdale's Baronage.

* Historical Portraits of Irish Chieftains and Anglo-Norman Knights. By the Rev. Charles B. Gibson, M.A. London: Longmans & Co. 1871.

Another dive, and at p. 394 we light on a young Earl who was suddenly enamoured of a humble maiden, and whose marriage with her excited the brutal pride of his followers:—

He, with a broken heart, fled, with his beautiful bride, to Rouen, in France, where he died. It is to the honour of the heroic and chivalrous Henry V. of England, who was then in France, that he expressed his admiration of the young Earl's character, conduct, and choice, by attending, as chief mourner, at his grave.

There is something charming in the casual mention of Henry the Fifth as being "then in France." Henry's presence in that part of the world is seemingly, in Mr. Gibson's eyes, a sort of everyday accident, something as much in the ordinary course of things as the presence of Henry the Second might have been. And, though it is but a small evil, yet, as Mr. Gibson thinks it needful for his readers to mark out the position of Rouen with special precision, we cannot help asking whether the heroic and chivalrous Henry the Fifth of England would have acknowledged the description of "Rouen in France" as a piece of correct geography.

Such are the treasures on which we lighted during our somewhat irregular raid into the inner parts of Mr. Gibson's book. We will now put on record something of what we have seen in our more orderly examination of his earliest and latest chapters. Mr. Gibson begins his prologue with a somewhat needless challenge of our dear old friend Dr. Dryasdust, whom, perhaps that the general reader may the better take in the etymology of his name, he kindly divides by hyphens and capitals into "Dry-as-Dust":—

An attempt to write History in the attractive form of Historical Portraits, will, of course, be discontinued by the "Dry-as-Dust" School; but we know of no other mode of dealing with periods of Ancient History, intended for the public, and not for the learned, exclusively. This is true of early Grecian and Roman History, in the production of which the imagination has had some share.

No man, without some kind of imagination, should attempt to write ancient history, for its materials present a dark chaos, from which such a mind alone can produce light and order. There are periods of history which can be read by the light or illumination of romance, only.

The distinction between "light and illumination" is perhaps due to the same pious care which led the author of "Dearly Beloved" to put forth every clause "tam Latine quam Teutonice, ut omnes intelligent." But it is perfectly true that no man should try to write ancient history, or any history, without some kind of imagination. The question is whether it will do to trust to the imagination only for the writing of history. Without imagination it is quite impossible to understand, much less to reproduce, the recorded facts. But it does seem a little hazardous to trust to the imagination to supply us with the facts. Let us look to Mr. Gibson's own practice. He gives us about three pages of sensational talk between Dervorgilla—we do not mean the pious foundress of Balliol College, but the naughty Queen Dervorgilla, who ran away with King Dermot—and her waiting-maid Nedha. We confess that we are wholly in the dark about the existence or non-existence of Nedha, but certainly, if there ever was such a person, she must have been a very dangerous companion for so flighty a lady. However, here we have the picture:—

Dearforgil, the Princess of Brefney, the daughter and sister of a king (of the royal house of O'Melaghlin), sat in a deep embrasure of a window, in a small square apartment, of the Caislean na Nua, on the islet of Lough Ree. The evening sun was shining on her golden hair. She raised her dark eyes from her tapestry frame, looked beyond the waters of the lake, which surrounded her dwelling like a silver zone, and said, "Nedha, come hither."

After all it is a little hard that we do not even know whether this touching description is due to Mr. Gibson or to somebody else. "A writer of Irish romance," he tells us, "has given the following account of the abduction, and as there is nothing improbable about it, we offer it to the reader for what it is worth." He then goes on to say that he "concludes that the romance is just about as probable as the 'Song of O'Rourke' by the poet Thomas Moore." As Mr. Gibson tells us in his title-page that he is the author, not only of Life among Convicts and the History of the County and City of Cork, but also of the Princess of Brefney—no bad companion-piece, one would think, for Life among Convicts—we cannot help fancying that Mr. Gibson is himself the writer of Irish romance whose account is just about as probable as the poet Thomas Moore's song, and that he has thrust two or three pages of his own novel, by way of padding, into the middle of his Historical Portraits. Nay, our reading in this way is so very small that we do not know whether Mr. Gibson may not himself be the Irish poet who "gives us a glowing description of the condition of Ireland during the reign of the monarch Cathair Mor of the Wine-red Hand," and by whom, in the latter part of the poem, "the effect of Cathair Mor's death on the state of Ireland is eloquently expressed." It is certain that Mr. Gibson sometimes makes verses, for he tells us that "Brian Boru is said to have given expression to his sorrowful revenge for his brother's death in an elegy." This elegy Mr. Gibson has "taken the liberty of paraphrasing," and we are glad, for Brian Boru's sake, to hear that it is paraphrased "with something more than a poet's license."

But Mr. Gibson does not wholly confine himself to romance and poetry. What a picture of learned energy does he set before us when he tells us, "I have pored over Irish Annals for years to discover when and why it was that Ireland attained the high appellation of 'the Island of Saints'." But what follows is a little puzzling:—

Had there been real saints in the land before the introduction of Christianity, we should say it gained the high appellation during the reign of Galla Olghobhach, in Anno Mundi 3960, "for observers of antiquity affirm of him that the conversion of his subjects in general, in his time, was as sweet a harmony to one another as any music, because they lived together in such concord, amity, and atonement among themselves, that there was no discord or strife heard to grow between them, for any cause whatsoever."

Is this orthodox? Mr. Gibson at least suggests the possibility of "real saints" before the introduction of Christianity. We had always fancied that the proper dogmatic teaching was that all the best doings of heathen men were nothing but splendida peccata. Or are we to see in Mr. Gibson's suggestion a dim shadow of the possibility that Ireland may, before the introduction of Christianity, have been made illustrious by the virtues of saints of the Old Law? May not the Hebrews of Cornwall somehow have spread themselves into the sister island? Then again, we know that "the Chronicles of Eri" were written either in the Phœnician dialect of the Scythian language or in the Scythian dialect of the Phœnician language—we at this moment forget which. The Carthaginian talk in Plautus again has been read as good Irish. Putting all these things together, why may we not think that likeness of speech has led to some confusion, and that orthodox Israelites, possible saints, may, purely on the strength of their Semitic talk, have been mistaken for wicked worshippers of Baal? But we will leave speculations which are too deep for us, and on which we touch only with fear and trembling. We stand on firmer ground when we get to St. David's Head in the eleventh century. Here we will again quote Mr. Gibson:—

Camden, in his Itinerary, describes the English Conqueror William I. as standing on the high cliffs of Wales, which command the Wicklow mountains, in Ireland, and saying, with something of the profane boasting of Artaxerxes, "I will have the ships of my kingdom brought hither, wherewith I will make a bridge to invade this land." When Murchard, king of Leinster, heard this boast, he asked, "Hath the king, in his great threatening, inserted the words, If it please God?" "No," was the reply. "Then," said Murchard, seeing this king putteth his trust only in man, and not in God, I fear not his coming." When this was told to William, he frowned, and bit his thumb.

Let us explain that, after some pondering, we lighted on the happy thought that by "Camden's Itinerary" might be meant the Itinerary of Giraldus. And so it turned out. Did Mr. Gibson stoop to make use of modern editions, we should most likely have heard of "Dimock's Itinerary." But "the English Conqueror, William I." is a very odd description of anybody, even if we take it of the person better known as William the Third, but who certainly was William the First of Ireland. But it is stranger than all when we turn to the Latin text, and there find that the King spoken of is carefully described as "Guillelmus, Guillelmi Regis Bastardi filius, et Normannorum in Angliâ Rex secundus, qui et Rex Rufus est agnominatus." Now both the first and the third William were devout men after their several fashions, while the "profane boasting" is quite in character with the second. But we are somewhat in the dark as to "the profane boasting of Artaxerxes." Why Artaxerxes? Perhaps Professor Rawlinson may know all about it; we for our own part should have suggested Xerxes. Lastly, neither Camden nor Dimock helps us to the picturesque incident of the English King biting his thumb. But perhaps the period of "the English Conqueror William I." is one of those "periods of history which can be read by the light or illumination of romance only." And no doubt the biting of William's thumb is "just about as probable as the song of O'Rourke" or the conversations of Dervorgilla of Brefney.

There are some other funny things about "Chro. Saxon." and "Doomsday Book," and there is the sentiment that "the unsettled state of England in 1064 demanded the strong and stern rule of a conqueror like William of Normandy." Now mark the minute accuracy of Mr. Gibson. It is not every one who would have pitched upon a year which, on a superficial reading of the Chronicles, seems so bare of events as the year 1064. But Mr. Gibson goes below the surface; he reckons backward in his Florence—he perhaps calls it his Thorpe or his Petrie—and finds that 1064 must have been the year of the bloody doings of Tostig and Eadgyth. But we must hurry from the eleventh century and from the first chapter of Mr. Gibson's book to the last years of the fifteenth as set forth in his last chapter. Ireland, as every one knows, was the scene of the first appearances of the two pretenders who disturbed the reign of Henry the Seventh. One might have thought that any one could have distinguished the two, and would not have confounded Edward, Earl of Warwick, and Richard, Duke of York. Yet Mr. Gibson speaks throughout of the Earl of Warwick as Richard, and makes Lambert Simnel be crowned at Christ Church as Richard the Fourth instead of Edward the Sixth. Lord Lovell too appears with the odd description, first of "Baron Lovell, of Northamptonshire," and "Francis Lovell, Baron of Northamptonshire." He adds the "reliable statement," that Lord Lovell "secreted himself in a vault at Minster Lovell." Then follows the well-known story of the finding of the skeleton, which we know no reason to doubt. But Mr. Gibson's notions of Minster Lovell are a little vague. He tells us that "the skeleton of a man, seated at a table, with book, paper, and pens before him, was discovered about two hundred years ago, in the vaults of that old Minster." Minster Lovell church, as far as we remember, has no vaults, at least not in Mr. Ayrton's sense, and it most certainly was not old in the time of Henry the Seventh. Mr. Gibson clearly pictures to himself Minster Lovell as something like St. Albans, but unluckily it was not in the church but in the ruins of the manor house that Lord Lovell's skeleton was found.

This, we think, is enough. By going straight through the book we might doubtless have culled some more flowers of the same kind, but we think we have found enough to show that the power of imagination, on which Mr. Gibson dwells with such delight, was not wronged by Bishop Butler when he spoke of it as that "forward delusive faculty."

CECIL'S TRYST.*

THERE are various ways of reading a novel. The true orthodox method is of course to sit down in a comfortable elbow-chair, armed with an efficient paper-cutter, and to work steadily through from the first page of Vol. I. to Vol. III. A hastier method, which we fear is occasionally adopted, is to take up a volume at random, and, opening it as chance may direct, to pitch upon any scene that strikes your fancy, and, if necessary, use your fingers instead of a knife to clear a way as far as may be desirable. The true lover of literature is apt to regard such a proceeding as indicating a want of that respect which should be paid to anything in the shape of a book. There is a certain regard due to the mere external form common to the trashiest novel and to the plays of Shakespeare. As a truly humane man would not be uncourteous even to the vilest of his species, the genuine student will admit the force of the plea founded on the bare fact of bookhood—if such a word may be coined for the occasion. In deference to such principles, we beg leave to state distinctly that we have perused with due attention every word of Cecil's Tryst, the last performance of the author of Lost Sir Masingberd. It is the more necessary to make this statement explicitly, because we propose to criticize it from the point of view of the careless reader. We will imagine that such a person has accidentally taken up the third volume, and has pitched upon a thrilling narrative contained in a letter, signed Cecil Wray, and dated Eggischhorn Hotel. The name will have recalled many pleasant associations, if the reader happens to be an Alpine traveller, and he will be anxious to see how one of the most delightful centres of Swiss scenery figures in a novel. The narratives of the Alpine Club are generally supposed to bear more or less relation to fact, allowing, of course, for a pardonable indulgence in exaggeration; but they give opportunities for avowed fiction of which our English novelists have as yet scarcely availed themselves. There is room for innumerable villains in the crevasses of Swiss glaciers, and heroes tired of the conventional performances of saving the object of their affections from the commoner forms of death might find ample opportunities for distinction amidst snow-slopes, and avalanches, and mountain torrents. We are of opinion, however, that some local knowledge is desirable before indulging in such performances. The narrative of which we are speaking will, we fear, shock the purist in Alpine literature. Mr. Cecil Wray, it seems, with his "dearest Jane"—who, to prevent mistakes, appears to be his sister—has been taking a walk on the Aletsch Glacier. We shudder as we add that the author systematically spells that name "Alitech"—a crime which in our eyes (we speak for the moment in the character of an Alpine enthusiast) is as great as it would be to describe this metropolis as "Landon." It occurs to the couple to climb a high mountain, with a "wedge-like summit," which we have entirely failed to identify, but which is supposed to look down upon the glacier. Cecil, looking round for a moment, hears a shriek, and turning back discovers that his sister has slipped from his side, and is falling down the precipice with her hands stretched out in vain to save herself. We know too well what would really happen in any such case. The poor young lady would be crushed to pieces, and her mangled remains would lie at the foot of the cliff. But, owing to some singular conformation of the mountains in those parts, or to the fact that the lady has managed to spring about half a mile in a horizontal direction, she descends into a crevasse at the end of her fall. The despairing brother descends to the ice, and lingers long about the fatal spot. Ultimately he returns to the inn by moonlight, goes straight to his sister's room, as though to assure himself that he had not been suffering from a nightmare, and then rouses the house. The body cannot be found, though the young man is carried on the shoulders of the guides to point out the place where it is engulfed.

Here, it must be admitted, is a sufficiently striking incident; and all the more striking because it occurs at the beginning of the third volume. To the experienced novel-reader it is plain that a catastrophe occurring in such a place is specially significant, for it can neither be the final wind-up nor can it be the commencement of the mystery. At worst it may be the culminating point of a series of (as we hope) almost equally thrilling adventures. Moreover, a good observer will instantly, if we may use a vulgar expression, "smell a rat." We need hardly point out that there is something very significant about the conduct of the hero of the performance. The care which he takes to come home by moonlight, and the singular notion of going first to his sister's room, is strongly suggestive of some deeply laid plot. Our cursory reader will have to choose between going forwards and discovering the consequences of the catastrophe, or turning backwards to trace out the series of events which have led up to it. In the former case he will find that Mr. Cecil Wray's conduct becomes strangely mysterious on returning to his affectionate friends. He surprises them all by the extraordinary change in his character; his memory has been so singularly affected that he can, as a rule, recall only those events in which his sister had taken part; he is invited to meet a beautiful actress with whom he had been deeply in love before she went upon the stage, and does not recognize her when he sees her; and he attempts in a strange fit of moodiness to commit suicide for no very particular reason. Part of this eccentric behaviour might be accounted for on the hypothesis that he had been the murderer of his sister instead of the innocent spectator of her death; but this would have no bearing on his singular defects of memory, to which special prominence is given with evident design. If, on the other hand, the reader makes a cast backwards, he may have the good luck to open on another scene at the close of the first volume, almost equally startling in its nature, though the surrounding circumstances are rather more conventional. He will find himself in the good old court of justice where a bunch of county magistrates are investigating the death of a young man. The person under examination is an idiot called Batty. Mr. Batty has declared that he is himself the criminal. The victim, one Richard Waller, was working in a certain mine, of a kind peculiar to the district. The earth in the pit had to be supported by timber props; and on the morning of the occurrence the props had been removed by some person or persons unknown. Mr. Waller, in company with his sister Ruth, insisted upon entering the pit in spite of the absence of this necessary safeguard, and after a few strokes of the axe the earth fell in, suffocated him, and all but suffocated his sister. The idiot Batty declares that he had himself removed the props, and further declares that he was incited to his diabolical act by a present of five pounds. And who gave you the money? he is asked. The reply, which causes unbounded astonishment, is that the donor was Mr. Cecil Wray. Mr. Wray succeeds in establishing a most conclusive alibi; and yet the intelligent people of the story are all fully convinced that the idiot was saying what he believed to be true. As he speedily hangs himself in gaol, he is incapable of giving any further information on the subject. And thus a very pretty mystery is created which is somehow bound up with the other mystery on the Eggischhorn. We set the problem before our readers as we might do at a competitive examination. Given the circumstances above related, it is required to invent a coherent story which shall explain them all, and to the development of which they shall be essential. By way of additional assistance, we will mention the fact that Ruth Waller, the young woman who just escapes being crushed in the mine, is no other than the popular actress with whom Mr. Cecil Wray falls in love.

Having stated our puzzle, we should perhaps leave the solution to the ingenuity of our readers. We know, however, that everybody likes to have the answer to a conundrum; and we fear that the interest we may have excited will be scarcely sufficient to justify us, after the precedent of some of our contemporaries, in postponing the answer to our next number. We will therefore simply request all whom it may concern to give the matter such attention as they may think it deserves, and, having fully appreciated the various conditions to be fulfilled, to pursue what follows; as Cuvier or Owen constructed some extinct monster from a fossil bone, so we may put together the story of Cecil's Tryst from the trifling indications already given. In the first place, we may remark upon the curious mystery which surrounds Mr. Cecil Wray. Obviously we are there at the heart of the problem. After the accident to his sister, he undergoes a complete transformation. Is it possible that there should be some delusion about the accident, from which all witnesses, except the survivor, have been carefully banished? Then we remark that there is a similar mystery about the murder. If the idiot speaks truly in saying that he was bribed to its commission, and if he sincerely believes that the briber was Mr. Cecil Wray, whilst it is equally plain that Mr. Wray was somewhere else, the only conclusion would seem to be that some person with an interest in the death of Richard or Ruth Waller has been personating Mr. Wray. Now, if we suppose that the personator on this occasion also personated Mr. Wray after the Alpine accident, we shall have a coherent explanation. In this last case, however, it is clear that the only possible personator was his sister. If he was the real sufferer, and his sister the survivor, the queer lapses of memory above noticed would be explained. The chief apparent difficulty disappears when we find from another dip into the book that the brother and sister are twins with an extraordinary resemblance; and there is no difficulty in imagining reasons why a young lady might be anxious to get rid of a pretty girl of low birth with whom her brother was desperately in love. We will in fact, without keeping our readers longer in suspense, admit that this is the true answer to the problem, and that Miss Wray first dressed in her brother's clothes to bribe the idiot to commit the murder, and afterwards, on her brother's death, succeeded for a certain time in assuming his character and acquiring his fortune. We might take credit for the extraordinary sagacity displayed in this ingenious mode of unravelling the difficulty, were it not that we, like Edgar Poe, have had good means of knowing the answer before we stated the difficulty.

From this statement our readers will be able to decide for themselves whether they are likely to enjoy reading Cecil's Tryst, so far at least as the plot is concerned. Though we have not touched upon a variety of subsidiary events which go to complicate the thread of the narrative, it will be evident that there is plenty of exciting incident for those at least who are not repelled by a very large allowance of improbability. For ourselves, we will frankly confess that stories of this kind are not very much to our taste, and do not appear to us to belong to a very high order of art. We will however add, in justice to the author, that, though he has not scrupled at indulging in very extravagant combinations, many of the minor characters and events are sketched with much vivacity and considerably greater resemblance to the ordinary course of affairs in this world. The adventures of the hero in his dealings with the managers of certain theatres are set forth with a graphic humour which suggests that they are founded on personal experience; and there is a benevolent father, given to quoting Elizabethan dramatists, and an old-fashioned aunt, who are very good portraits in their way. We should like them all the better if they were not mixed up with murders and accidents and personations of a slightly incredible kind; but that is a matter of taste, and we have no doubt that there is a large audience who would rather read of a sister passing herself off for a brother than study the most delicate descriptions of character and manners. It is lucky that there are such people, or what would become of the novelists?

M. RENAN'S POLITICAL IDEAL.*

THE reader who knows M. Renan mainly by his Life of Jesus, or by the commotion which that book created, would scarcely, without further insight into M. Renan's mental constitution, divine his political ideal. One would be more likely to guess it from his photograph than either from his critical writings or from the kind of position he occupies relatively to the Church. Louis Veuillot hit the mark in his own unkind way in two out of three epithets—

Si doux, si gras, si laid de mine.

The last is rather too bad. M. Renan may not be an Apollo, but it is hardly right to call him ugly. An intelligent and resolute face is all that is to be expected from one of our sex, which has no pretension to be charming. But the other two epithets, "doux" and "gras," are as happy as ill-natured epithets possibly can be. What gives them their peculiar felicity is that they apply as much to M. Renan's manner of writing as to his person. He is softly and unctuously persuasive, and hard usage seems to have no more effect upon him than the sea's hard usage has upon a jelly-fish. As Byron said "that he loved wisdom more than she loved him," so M. Renan has an ill-requited affection for Catholicism. The reader who is not particularly familiar with the turns of M. Renan's mind may be somewhat surprised to learn that his ideal France is based upon a noble and a priest in every village, and that whenever he becomes enthusiastic it is always about something as remote as possible from the modern spirit. What enchants him most of all is the ceremony of coronation at Rheims, because in that ceremony the essences of Royalty and Catholicism were so intimately blended. His references to it are quite fervid and glowing, whereas he never speaks of anything purely modern, such as the industrial spirit, without coldness or disdain. All this is highly curious, and M. Renan's mind, to a student of human nature, is as interesting as any highly cultivated intellect we know. We have no desire to imply what very opposite parties are saying of M. Renan just now in France—that he has written dishonestly with a view to prepare for himself an agreeable position under a coming monarchy; and as for inducing the clergy to forgive the past, M. Renan must be well aware that nothing short of an unconditional submission like that just tendered by Father Grady could ever reconcile him with the Papacy. M. Renan is probably quite as honest as is compatible with the craft of a very clever literary artist. We do not suspect him of uttering sentiments which he does not feel at the time that he is writing, but his disposition to write from sentiment at one time and from reason at another, and the very opposite directions into which these two forces are continually leading him, produce an appearance of hypocrisy. Besides, ordinary human nature cannot understand how a man whom the priests have been calling a toad and a viper, and everything that is abominable, for several years past, can really in his own breast feel those reverential sentiments towards them which he professes, and there seems to be a want of spirit and a want of dignity in this total absence of resentment. The behaviour of Garibaldi seems to all simple natures to be more after their own fashion, as indeed it is. The priests call Garibaldi a brigand and a swindler, and Garibaldi, affecting no concealment of his sentiments, and speaking no language that can possibly be suspected of insincerity, says that the priests are a pack of lying chaulatans. Now, although we may not exactly agree with Garibaldi, we all feel that his utterances are not the utterances of a sneak. He has been pelted with ecclesiastical brickbats, and he returns the compliment in kind, like a plucky boy in a playground. But M. Renan always speaks so smoothly and civilly of the clergy that some people suspect him of endeavouring to turn away their wrath by soft answers.

M. Renan's ideal for France is strongly opposed to the industrial spirit, which he believes (and with reason) to be a cause of military decline, and the origin of a growing indisposition to incur the dangers and inconveniences of warfare. The objects of a trading community are first to make money to buy certain comforts and pleasures, and then to have peace to enjoy those comforts and pleasures without interruption. M. Renan, who has a dislike to Philistinism quite as strong as that professed by Mr. Matthew Arnold, though he does not call it by the same name, believes that the Philistine spirit has been immensely fostered by the remarkable commercial prosperity which developed itself under the Empire. It is perfectly true that the love of fighting has declined in France; every observant foreigner who has lived in the country during the last ten years must have perceived it; but the Government of Louis Napoleon, instead of fostering the pacific tendencies which, though unavowed, were silently taking root amongst the shopkeepers and farmers, thought military glory a necessity of its existence, and undertook four of the very costliest wars in which French armies were ever engaged. M. Renan says that the nation did not desire the war of 1870, that it had already become too bourgeois to be capable of military ardour. The truth is, that the French are and have been for some years in quite a peculiar state as to military feeling. Two assertions may be made which are in appearance directly contradictory, and yet both are strictly accurate. The French are extremely pacific, as pacific probably as even we English ourselves should be if we had not the salt water between us and the great military States of the Continent; and yet it is true that the French entered upon the war with Prussia in a condition of the most intense military excitement. The explanation of this is that the industrial and pacific temper was too recent to have entirely got the better of old habits of thought and action. Had the old sentiments been left to themselves, they would not have kindled into a flame, and the war would not have taken place; but to say that the French did not desire the war when it actually broke out is to say that which every impartial person who lived in France during the summer of 1870 knows to be perfectly untrue. On the other hand, Louis Napoleon is equally wrong in affirming that the French people forced him into the war. It would have been as easy for him to prevent the nation from going into that conflict as it is for the driver of a quiet horse to hinder him from leaping over the parapet of a bridge. What drove the country mad at last was an absurd story to the effect that the King of Prussia had kicked the French ambassador. Even at that late hour, if the Government of Napoleon had not decided upon fighting, it might have satisfied the country that there had been no insult. Instead of doing that, it purposely allowed the press to flood the country with the most preposterous patriotic nonsense, and a war-fever was created of such intensity that it caught even the cultivated classes too, and it became unsafe to utter a word of reason, even amongst educated men. M. Renan says that France is pacific to a fault, but that Louis Napoleon dragged her into wars for his own purposes; and Louis Napoleon affirms that he was carried away by the warlike spirit of the nation. The exact truth is that the nation was pacific enough until it was excited, that Louis Napoleon excited it or permitted it to be excited when a word from him would have calmed every one; and also that when once the fever was at its height, nothing but bloodshed could effect a cure. What M. Renan desires is a permanent military spirit in the country; what he most dislikes is the pacific bourgeois spirit, which is leading the French nation to that aversion from warfare, that strong preference of business and domestic tranquillity to military adventure, which already characterizes the English.

This, we conceive, is the main reason why M. Renan so earnestly desires a strong monarchy, and nobility, and priesthood. He sees that a nobility dreads the sacrifices of war less than a nation of tradesmen, and just as our Cobdens and Brights praise commerce because it conduces to the pacific arrangement of international disputes, so M. Renan likes a high-spirited nobility because it so readily grasps the sword. And as the French noblesse has always been in close alliance with the priesthood, M. Renan is willing that there should be a powerful priesthood also, and would gladly abandon the minds of the common people to its direction if only the State would leave the sceptical lay professors a fair field in the University. A conception of this kind, which would hardly ever occur to an Englishman or an American, does not so much surprise us in a Frenchman, and arises, we believe, much more from a clear perception of the different needs of Frenchmen than from any indifference to truth. The English feeling on the subject might be expressed in this way:—"If M. Renan does not believe Romanism to be true, it is wrong in him to encourage the preaching of it to the people." This is naturally the feeling of a Protestant country, but there are thousands of men in France who believe that Catholicism is excellent for peasants and for women and children, but impossible for men of culture; so they desire to see Catholicism duly administered to those for whom it is suitable, just as a man likes his horses to have plenty of hay, though he does not eat hay himself. Every one who has lived on terms of intimacy with highly cultivated Frenchmen must be familiar with this feeling, and it has been sufficiently expressed in one of M. Renan's previous works to shield him from any suspicion of affecting it now for temporary purposes. The mainspring of M. Renan's desires is for the present not religious, but military. He longs, as a Frenchman, to see his country take her old place as the first military Power; he does not believe that she will ever be able to do this so long as she is given up to industrial ideas; and so, to get rid of industrial ideas, he is willing to establish a strong social hierarchy of king, and noble, and priest. M. Renan's sympathies are with the organization of the middle ages, and he wishes to build up something like it in the France of to-day or to-morrow. We can understand these desires, and Englishmen, who have preserved much of what was good in the middle ages, are even likely to share them. Yet M. Renan must know that they are mere dreams. France is becoming every year more and more of an industrial democracy, and less and less inclined (in her ordinary temper) to unprofitable military adventure. The difficulty in the way of establishing a strong monarchy and nobility is that the sentiment upon which they are founded has lost its force even in the country, and in cities no longer exists. The best future which the state of the French mind seems to promise to the country is that of a hard-working and careful community, enjoying the fruits of its labours, and strong enough, with the help of some prudent alliance, to defend them against aggression. We hazard no prediction as to the internal political organization which will prevail ultimately in France if ever the country becomes settled and unanimous; but the probability is that the chief of the State, whether President, Emperor, or King, will never really have that external character which M. Renan desires for him, never be outside of the State and independent of it, but only representative, as in one sense or other the later chiefs of the State (Louis Philippe, Napoleon, Thiers) have been. The habit of modern Frenchmen always to consider the chief of the State as a functionary liable to lose his situation is of itself quite enough to prevent the substantial organization which M. Renan desires. A French Government must always henceforth be in one way or other elective, and M. Renan greatly prefers the hereditary principle, as offering fewer risks. Our House of Lords is, on the whole, a very favourable example of what M. Renan likes, but, notwithstanding the greater risks of election, the Commons are more active and lively, whilst with few exceptions they are equally respectable. On this, as on other points, M. Renan writes, like a true Frenchman, with remarkably little reference to facts. Even the present French Assembly and the present French Cabinet are enough to prove that M. Renan's picture of the results of election is untrue. Considering that France is not a well-educated country, it is really remarkable how many men of high culture there are in the Assembly and, proportionally, in the Cabinet.

MISS EDEN'S LETTERS FROM INDIA.*

UP the Country contained the letters in which the Hon. Emily Eden described the doings of herself and her sister Frances, and her brother the Governor-General, and the whole tribe of aides-de-camp and secretaries, from the day on which they set out on their Vice-regal tour to the North-West provinces till their final return to Calcutta, after some two years of absence; and Letters from India record the occurrences which took place on the voyage from England and during their actual residence in the City of Palaces.

Some eighty or ninety years ago William Eden, the father and founder of this family, was perhaps the best-abused man in all England. When he "ratted" from Fox and his friends, and carried his excellent business abilities and popular manners to the side of William Pitt, a sensation was caused which seems altogether surprising in this age of comparatively cautious principles. It so happened also that the party from which he deserted had recently provided in the pages of the Rolliad a convenient vent for the satirical talent of their aspiring partisans, and "Billy Eden, the renegade scout," was immediately installed as one of the principal subjects for scourging and ridicule. His first office being the conclusion of the famous commercial treaty with France, the changes are rung again and again upon this "second loss of Eden" being a "more affair of trade"; and a lively ballad to the tune of "Ally Croker" tells us how:—

There lived a man at Beck'nham in Kent, Sir,
Who wanted a place to make him content, Sir;
Long had he sighed for Billy Pitt's protection,
While thus he gently courted his affection:
Will you give a place, my dearest Billy Pitt, O!
If I can't have a whole one, oh! give a little bit, O!

But the able and versatile William Eden flourished in spite of everything, and during the remainder of the century did yeoman's service to his country. He married a daughter of the then rising house of the Elliots of Minto, and so various and divergent were his diplomatic employments that each of his four or five children was born in a different Continental capital. The letters of his numerous correspondents are filled with constant allusions to this circumstance, and Gibbon, in one of his artificial, but not ungraceful, complimentary notes, referring also to the family name, desires his "compliments to Lady Auckland, whom I revere as a second Eve—the mother of nations—though I am persuaded that she would not, like Eve, have eaten the apple." As the family began to grow up, the house "at Beck'nham in Kent, Sir," became a favourite resort of some of the most eminent men in England; and among others who yielded to its fascinations was the "Immaculate Boy" of the Rolliad, William Pitt, who became something very like engaged to one of the young ladies, and it was only, as he informed the father, a consideration of his involved circumstances which induced him to forego the idea of matrimony, and "sacrifice his best hopes and dearest wishes to his conviction and judgment." The lady thus singularly distinguished became afterwards the wife of Robert, fourth Earl of Buckinghamshire, and it is to her that all the letters of the former collection and the best of the present are addressed. Perages of late years have become diplomatically silent as to the dates of ladies' births, but the Eleanor Eden who gained whatever amount of affection

William Pitt had leisure to bestow must have been old enough to have been the mother of the Emily Eden to whom we are indebted for these charming letters, and who, by a strange coincidence, might, if we are not misinformed, have herself become the wife of another Prime Minister of no mean fame. This long-credited rumour derives a certain amount of confirmation from the fact that, when she was about to embark for India, Lord Melbourne sent her a copy of Milton, in which he said he had marked his favourite passages, and added:—

My mother always told me that I was very selfish, man and boy, and I believe she was right. I always find some excuse for not doing what I am anxious to avoid. I cannot bear to come and bid you good-bye, for few events of my life have been so painful to me as your going. May God bless and keep you!

At the same time she received another farewell letter from a still more exalted personage:—

I have had a beautiful letter from our King, which I would send you, only there is no time to get it back again, and it must serve as a character to our next place. He sent me a very long message by George, who told me to write my thanks, which I did in the most abject and affectionate style; and then, on Saturday, there came this farewell—really a beautifully written letter—saying, that amongst his many other amiable qualities, he had always given George credit for his exemplary attachment to his sisters, &c. Then there is another whole page of approval of our not consenting to be separated from him by fear of the climate or remoteness of destination as "so affectionate a brother deserves the devotion he meets with," and then he desires us all to be good and happy, and so on, and assures us his best wishes will follow us there. I hope for their sakes, poor things, they will go overland.

It was a little ungracious, if not ungrateful, to turn such really kind words into ridicule, but Miss Eden was a keen politician, far keener than her brother the Governor-General, and in October 1835 she had not forgotten King William's summary dismissal of the Whigs not a twelvemonth before. We cannot help wishing that the ipissima verba of this letter had been given, for William IV., in spite of his narrow forehead, his facial angle, and rather limited education, could occasionally write a great deal better than the general run of monarchs, constitutional or other. His description of his first introduction to Nelson, for instance, is graphic in the extreme, and, in the rapidly growing critical slang of the present day, would be said not only to "possess the true ring," but to be "crisp" and "full of colour" besides. Our object, however, in thus dwelling upon the antecedents and surroundings of the Eden family is to show the peculiar attractions of the circle in which they had moved from their earliest childhood, and thus to justify in some degree the half despair with which they write of an aboard-ship life, and the whole despair with which they at first regarded the society of Calcutta. In the former situation, according to Macaulay, most people find some relief in eating twice as many meals as on land, and, we may add, by indulging in stertorous and unrefreshing slumbers in the intervals. But from the tedium of tropical female society as seen from the "Eden Lodge" and "Beck'nham in Kent" point of view, there is not even this mode of escape. To the brother, immersed in public business, all new and much of it interesting, and surrounded by colleagues and secretaries his equals or superiors in ability, there was no such drawback to enjoyment; and we find accordingly that the sisters confess again and again, with ever-renewed astonishment, that "George was never so well in his life before," while they themselves find nothing to write about save repinings at their banishment, and the doings of the Ayah, the lapdog, and the thermometer. In the hands of Emily Eden, the authoress of Up the Country and the cherished friend of William Lamb, these topics, uninviting as they appear, come to us clothed with all the spirit, grace, and humour which we might expect from her facile pen and cultivated and original mind. But, unknown to the title-page and advertisements, some ninety or a hundred pages are taken up with the letters of a younger sister, who tries to treat the same subject in the same playful way; but, alas! genius and culture were alike wanting; "Chance" becomes a pampered cur gasping for breath; "Rosina" a brown middle-aged female with betel-chewing proclivities; and the instrument of Fahrenheit sinks into a vulgar perspiration-ometer.

In our notice of the former series of letters* we spoke of them as "thoroughly enjoyable from beginning to end," and, as far as those signed "E. E." go, we may repeat the same opinion of the present collection. General officers, after fights, sham or real, especially the former, are in the habit of writing that, "where all have distinguished themselves, it would be invidious to make distinctions," and the most practised of "umpires" would find the same difficulty in selecting passages for quotation from Miss Eden's writings. Almost at random we choose the following description of her English lapdog's introduction to the Calcutta course:—

My dearest Sister,—I will try to run off a letter early in the morning, for it is so hot, and I am so sleepy after luncheon that I always fall asleep when I am in a transport of sentiment over my letters home. The weather has been better though the last fortnight; occasional days of pouring rains when we can have the windows open, and there have been two or three evenings this last week which were really pleasant—something like the hottest summer evenings of that exquisite country, England—with a little air stirring, and no necessity for gossiping with one's tongue hanging out, like Chance. That little black angel has the audacity to date on India, and never enjoyed better spirits, or a more imperious temper. He was once nearly carried off by some vultures, and he and — a greyhound both narrowly escaped the snare of an alligator. He swims so far out into the Ganges that his own attached servant screams with fright. He has learnt from the natives to eat mangoes, and is very much suspected of smoking his hookah whenever he can get comfortably alone with my tailors. He is allowed, for a great treat, to run before our horses on a cool evening; and the other day, when George was riding with me, Chance insisted on going to the race-course with us. I asked Captain Macgregor to inquire why Chance's own valet was not with him, and he translated the answer that when the Lord Sahib himself took the dog, the sicar, or head of that class of servants, thought it right to go himself. So there was a grand-looking man in the flowing dress of the upper servants, with a white beard down to his waist, gambolling after Chance, who took to running after the birds, and gave a little growl every time his tutor interfered, and the sicar, who was not used to him, looked frightened out of his senses, and then began running again. I could hardly ride for laughing, but I mention the fact for Dandy's edification.

As we have before intimated, this pet occupies a conspicuous place in the correspondence, and his mistress contrives to interest us so greatly in him that we have admitted "Chance" into our own particular family of canine favourites, where he will find himself installed with "Rab," "Argus," "Maida," "Camp," and some five or six other similar heroes. Our next quotation, taken equally at haphazard, is humorous and animated, and as true as a photograph:—

I wish you could see my passage sometimes. The other day when I set off to pay George a visit I could not help thinking how strange it would have seemed at home. It was a rainy day, so all the servants were at home. The two tailors were sitting in one window, making a new gown for me, and Rosina by them chopping up her betel-nut; at the opposite window were my two Dacca embroiderers working at a large frame, and the sentry, in an ecstasy of admiration, mounting guard over them. There was the bearer standing upright, in a sweet sleep, pulling away at my punkah. My own five servants were sitting in a circle, with an English spelling-book, which they were learning by heart; and my jemadar, who, out of compliment to me, has taken to draw, was sketching a bird. Chance's servant was waiting at the end of the passage for his "little excellency" to go out walking, and a Chinese was waiting with some rolls of satin that he had brought to show. All these were in livery, except the Chinese and another man, who had on a green and silver cap instead of a red and gold turban, and as I came out he flung himself down on the ground, and began knocking his head against the floor, whining and talking in the most melancholy way, which, as I don't understand a word of Hindustani, was of great use. However, I took for granted his house was burnt, which happens to all our servants constantly, and they expect us to pay for a new house; so I told the jemadar to tell him to stand up, as I never would give anything to anybody who went on begging in that crouching way, and to ask what had happened; and, after a great deal more whining and sobbing, the jemadar began interpreting: "By your favour, the man say, he be your Lady Sahib's housemaid—what we call matar—and the Lord Sahib's matel have got a red turban, and this man say he got none." So I said I would ask Major Byrne about it, but I had no objection to give him money privately for a turban if there was any difficulty. "Oh! but Major Byrne have given him white turban, only no red cloth in it, and he so sorry." I am sure if he had lost all his relations he could not have cried more, and the misfortune is that Major Byrne is quite obdurate about it, and says he is not to have this rag of his ambition; so, to keep things comfortable, I see I shall have surreptitiously to give him the cover of my dressing-box, which is composed of scarlet baize, and will make up into a very handsome turban.

This gifted lady, besides being a letter writer such as one too seldom meets with, was also an accomplished artist, and was equally at home with the sculptor's tools and the painter's brushes. This talent, perhaps more delightful than any other to its possessor, she was always ready to put in practice for the gratification of those around her. Take the following as an instance:—

I have such an interesting picture to copy just now—a picture by Zoffany of Madame Talleyrand, when she was in this country as Mrs. Grand. It is so pretty. Captain Cunningham borrowed it of the owner to have a copy of it made for himself, and, as there are hardly any artists, and none good at Calcutta, and he would have had to give 100 rupees for a bad sketch from it, I am copying it for him.

This picture was in the possession of Mr. Marshman, then as now the great authority for all matters connected with the by-gone days of Calcutta, and nobody ventured to dispute the name either of sitter or of painter. Both, however, were mere random guesses. We happened the other day to see Miss Eden's drawing, and at once recognised it as a spirited and graceful copy of one of Sir Joshua's many "Kitty Fishers"—that particular one in which the Mabel Gray of our great-grandfathers is represented as Cleopatra dissolving the pearl. From this source, however, grave historians have drawn their description of the wife of Talleyrand, and Mr. Herman Merivale, that most poffunctory of all editors or continuators, complacently carries on the fable by informing us that the mistress of Philip Francis had "more of feminine softness than of strength in her fair countenance; the sensual prevails everywhere over the intellectual."

We wish we could say anything in favour of the editing of these volumes, but we can hardly fancy greater carelessness than is everywhere displayed. We allude partly to senseless misprinting of Anglo-Indian words which have evidently been properly given in the original, but principally to the indiscriminate substitution of a dash—wherever a name occurs. This is destructive of all individuality, as was perceived by Miss Eden when she herself superintended the publication of the former volumes, and was careful to keep each character separate by appropriating a particular initial as its representative.

THE SECRET OF LONG LIFE.*

NEARLY as fascinating as the records of individual longevity are speculations on the subject of the best mode of securing length of days. One set of writers finds the secret in temporance and careful diet, another in high feeding and an epicurean resolve to live while you may. The close study of Cornaro's life might lead to the conclusion that its marvellous length was due to his imperturbable self-interest and self-satisfaction, which shut out all care or thought for others, and made itself independent of external sources of sorrow and anxiety; while the more amusing, though less known, theories of the German Cohausen—who, on the faith of an ancient votive tablet, ascribing a life of 115 years to constantly being in the atmosphere of "puellarum anhelitus," argued, in a perfectly innocent sense, that the tabernacle of man's body might be repaired again and again to an indefinite age by associating much with, and breathing the same air as, the young—recommend themselves to acceptance by the value they set on cheerfulness as promotive of health and length of life. But the paradoxes of the subject are not less manifold than the practical conclusions which have been drawn from it. If sobriety, cleanliness, regularity of life are shown to conduce to days long in the land, so, on the other side, can a curious case be made out for the opposite vices. In short, the question seems destined to remain an open one; and, under such circumstances, it was with curiosity that we opened the Secret of Long Life, especially as the book is dedicated (we suppose by permission) to Lord St. Leonards, a living instance of longevity, a keen, observant, hard-headed lawyer, who both from his own experience and from practice in weighing evidence might fairly be supposed to have formed sound conclusions on the matter. Strange to say, however, the author to whom he has apparently accorded his imprimatur has a most inveterate habit of travelling out of his brief; and though it is true that in what he terms his "exordium"—by a slip of the pen, we presume, for "peroration"—he ascribes the secret of long life to "ideas, independence, and indolence," we can honestly say that until we reached his concluding chapter we were utterly at a loss to determine whether he meant that long life depended on living in a model village, on writing sonnets on aristology, on going to bed at sunrise, or on having a "complete" wife and perfect daughters. If, indeed, he wrote with the weight of a veteran and the experience of an octogenarian or nonagenarian, we might be able to think highly of the secret which he professes to hold; but as, from his not infrequent sketches of himself and allusions to his habits and pursuits, we feel safe in fixing his age at some forty or at most fifty years, it has to be borne in mind that his are the lucubrations not so much of one who has lived, as of one who means to live, long; and the faith to be placed in his prescriptions will be measured accordingly. It is well known to those who are versed in the records of longevity that the desire of life is a very powerful stimulus to prolonging it; and about our author's desire none can have a doubt who enjoy his confidences about his pleasant manner of life, his fine friends, his unfettered, sunny, and serene existence. "I relish this world, and mean to stay in it as long as I can"; "my thesis is that by cultivation of physical and mental health it is easy to reach a hundred in good condition, and that a hundred and twenty ought not to be deemed an unattainable age"; such are the dicta of this epicurean philosopher, as to whose practice we confess that we doubt whether it is not calculated to teach his readers "how not to do it."

But what is his secret? Is he quite certain himself? If he were, he could not but out with it; for though the book is published anonymously, we have not read half through it before we are enabled to identify its writer with the author of The Marquis and Merchant, The Inn of Strange Meetings, and other effervescences of prose and poetic fiction which froth up from the pen of Mr. Mortimer Collins. And in the course of his chapters he discovers his inability to disguise the names of horticultural and literary friends whom he designs not to betray, but to shadow forth in well-rounded periphrases. As has been said, he delivers himself at last of a threefold secret; but does the bulk of his volume agree with this? Let us see. In the first place, then, "ideas" conduce to long life. "A great soul," we are told, "is full of power, and takes easily the accidents of the world." "To think is to live." "An active mind keeps the body out of mischief, and stagnation at a distance." How does all this square with the long life of the Westmorland folks, touching which the author cites statistics in his chapter on "Long Life in Lake-Land"? We take it that the obituary of the Westmorland gazette contains in any given week the names of more names than geniuses; and it betokens lack of faith in his own doctrine to fly off to the subtlety that the man who thinks and does brainwork lives longer, even if he die young, than the idealess churl or the ennuyé aristocrat of ninety or a hundred. It is true that this all turns on the question discussed in Chap. II., "What is Life?" and it is perhaps not inconsistent with our author's somewhat loose theory that "Life is co-extensive with the continuance in statu quo of the atoms of the material form. When they wear out, the spirit moulds itself another tenement." According to this teaching, we are destined to metempsychosis and transmigration from lower to higher states, singing an endless song of "excelsior" until we reach the topmost round of the ladder. Furthermore, says our philosopher, we are to train ourselves for enjoying the future by enjoying the present; and though it is postulated that this enjoyment is to be intellectual, and that we shall "find exercise for our faculties in commune with the invisible and the divine," yet so much are sunshine, good living, sleep, and company necessary to this intellectual perfection, that we are by no means sure that a literal carrying out of the rules laid down might not nip the centurion in the bud before he were well out of his budding stage, and prematurely land him in apoplexy. It may afford some criterion of the be-all and end-all of the writer's intellectuality if we quote a characteristic qualification of his thesis that a poet cannot create except in sunshine :—

A poet may sing in winter now and then, at the latter end of a sea-coal fire and a flask of wine. For coal is fossil sunshine, drunken in by forests that perished myriads of years ago; and wine is liquid sunshine, caught in grape-globes that grew on the margin of Rhine, or Arno, or Charente.

As it strikes us, the weakness of the author's "idea" theory is that it sets too much store by "eating and drinking," in the process of keeping the mind awake and active. No doubt he is right in avoiding town life, even in its highest circles, for other reasons than the closeness, noise, and ill-savours of crowded cities; and though we can go along with him in his prescription of a country life for men of a high class—because "the original genius works best in solitude, with the occasional pleasant interruptions of wife, children, and friends," and "any man who is a scholar, or even a student, and has an ample library, may live happily in the country, and live long"—we incline to think that it should be accompanied with a proviso that these happy folk should live more regularly and simply than would consist with the programme of our author and his Apician friends, if they would avoid those visits of biliousness which we take to be hurtful to intellectual activity. But as the country life of average men is nothing more than stagnation on "vile beer and talk of beeves and corn," our professor of longevity purposes, when his novels, poems, and essays like the present have made him a millionaire, to start an ideal village, a modern Colonos, with good houses graduated to suit all classes, except lawyers: with a village Parliament; a band of doctors, who are to be bribed to cure rather than kill; and an emigration society to ship off such black sheep as have not previously been washed white in a juvenile reformatory. Clubs for gentle and simple, houses-of-call for stray travellers, who will have to show their passports to the village reeve or warden; a church that is not to stand in the light of meeting-houses; a village Eton to encourage learning and athletics, pari passu, amongst the young masters, and, in time, the young misses, too, of the model village; a village green; a model theatre, and other like institutions, "to stimulate society and discourage secrecy"—such are to be a few features of the village of the future, the regulation and due ordering of which, if left to the founder, will, we fancy, interfere with the "independence" and "indolence" which he considers sine-qua-nons of long life. We forgot to say that no newspaper is to find its way into the village, but only a matutinal sheet akin to the Tatler or the Spectator, combining "clarity of thought with politure of style" (sic).

At all events we must sympathize with the writer's enthusiasm for trees. To be sure it is consistent with his belief that he is going to live to 120 to be fond of the saplings which he knew as acorns and hopes to know as mature oaks; but about such longevityarians of the wood and lawn poetries are endurable, as they are about the river that runs past the village—ay, and will run on when even the Collinses and Lord St. Leonards shall have gone to their rest. But the river of our intellectual friend, in order to conduce to the enjoyment which is essential to longevity, requires, we find, to be enlivened by pretty girls in canoes, by the Chloes, Marigolds, and Phillises whom we read of in the Inn of Strange Meetings. Although we do not for a moment suggest that these divide with him the homage logically due to the Eairin of his poetry, and the wife-of-completion and "altera ego" of his prose, yet we cannot help seeing that they do enhance the charm of the river running by, that they colour with gay hues his intellectual existence, and that a life-dream standing in need of such accidents is liable to distractions, and is scarcely compatible with his boasted independence. To the author's dogmas on the marriage of completion our sons and daughters will have something to say. He may be allowed to theorize that a woman should be twenty-five and a man thirty at the time of marriage; but when he stipulates that for the perfecting of family relations, in connexion with a longer lease of life, the term of minority needs to be extended from twenty-one to thirty years, we really shudder at the temptations to parricide which he sets in the way of young people; of whom he says that "the boys are probably Republicans and Deists, the girls Tories and High-Churchwomen."

According to the opening axiom "that length of life depends upon ideas," one might have thought that politics would, at least in this sense, favour longevity. Not a bit of it. Politics are for dull second-rate folks. "The higher minds of the race cannot be expected to do such dirty work." These higher minds must exercise themselves in writing articles "on a bird-haunted lawn, under the lime-trees, with their dogs at their feet, and a bottle of hock close at hand." "See me!" says the writer in effect, in the picture he draws, under the head of "aristology," of the union of ideas with independence and indolence. In p. 135 he says casually, "I often enjoy a sunrise before going to bed," and in Chapter VI. he gives a sketch of his mode of life, pretty much as follows. THE 3:30 A.M. he sits up, throwing off his articles ("healthy literature," of course, and "no lies for money"), then strolls out to hear the nightingales at vesper, and the starlings going to breakfast, and then goes to bed till noon. This, he allows, would not suit hacks who live by work not to be done as they list. This is the life of "ideas." His "panadum," or noon meal at coming downstairs, consists of cold meats, prawns, lobsters, fruit, salad, strawberry pice, sardines, and cold game when attainable, with light wines according to the season. This, again, is not living for hacks, but for well-paid brain-workers who can afford it. For the dinner of "ideas" seems is the hour—on shorthorn sirloins, Southdown saddles, venison, pheasants, and all the accessible home produce that a complete wife can teach "a farmer's daughter" to cook "better than the Vatel, the Udes, and the Soyers."

Of course a gentleman who sleeps (see chapter vii.) so beautifully that in his dreams he hobs and nobes "nectar" or "bitter beer" with Apollo in his visits to Olympus; who cultivates his five senses so well "that a dog—ay, or even a bee—knows him from a cad by his odour"; who associates with patrician classics and naturalists, and has friends "who blend the poet and gardener as no man ever blended them since Adam made his first love-lyric within the nightingale-haunted foliage walls of Eden"; who envies no man; who, like a fine old English gentleman of other days, keeps well in the sun and open air; and who, if he is out of sorts, follows his nose to the sea, which he can sniff from Warwick; of course, one so gifted "has a great pull" (to descend to slang) over work-a-day, brain-taxing, time-bound mortals. Long life, according to his programme, is for such as can "take life easily," the select few who are qualified to be denizens of his modern Colonos, and content to realize the meaning of a word of intolerable coinage, the verb "to laze," which is all that sticks by us of his frothy chapter on the influences of laziness on longevity. We should like to hear what Lord St. Leonards has to say to "lazing" as a secret of long life. We should like also to get from a trustworthy observer of such problems a diagnosis of Mr. Collins's case, and a statement of his reasonable expectation of life. His "ideas" certainly will not wear out his machine, though we should say that the independence and indolence which conspire to facilitate his living too luxuriously, and thereby becoming a martyr to gout and such like disorders, are certainly against the chances of his illustrating his own theory. We take it that if he surmounts these impediments, his chances of long life arise from quite another cause. If unbounded self-esteem and an imperturbable good conceit are (as the example of the French beaux-esprits seems to indicate) eminently conducive to longevity, then the author of the Secret of Long Life is in a fair way to live for ever.

MINOR POETS.

MR. MARTIN F. TUPPER—"he then who, forty years ago, took up this rhythmic strain"—by the publication of the fourth series of Proverbial Philosophy has at length brought his magnus opus to its close. The proud, but well-earned, motto of his title-page is Jamque opus exegit. Not only has he completed his task, but he takes leave of his measure. He says that he

Now will resume, for this last time, his first old style of proverbs,
And then for ever lay aside the harp of Satch's son.

The harp is laid aside before the hand that touched it has lost any of its magic power. Whatever of poetic fancy, of inspired thoughts, of noble words, of harmonious numbers, Mr. Tupper had "in earliest youth, eight lustres back," remains with him now after "years—and years—of studious toil," of "musing reverie by night, and day's fastidious care." Why, with all his poetic powers as vigorous as ever, he should not go on to a fifth, or even a sixth, series it is not for us to say. His Proverbial Philosophy at present contains about 16,000 lines. But, as he himself proudly says, he has not published every line he wrote. On the contrary, "only a tithe is stored, the nine parts lie ungarnered." If we understand him rightly, we shall not be wrong in inferring that he has either in manuscript or in his brain, including also what is here printed, no less than 160,000 proverbial lines. Let him not be too modest, but take confidence that those who have already bought fifty editions of his first series will be ever eager for more, and so long as he can furnish a supply will never slacken in the demand. "Nearly a million copies" of his great work, we are told, "have been sold in America," and we should be greatly surprised if each purchaser of the first million does not at once require a copy of this latest and last series. For it contains, not only a portrait of the poet in the ripeness of age, but "a biographical sketch," and a whole proverbial-philosophical essay on "this book's story." Mr. Tupper himself, as he informs us, "would willingly have been left unnoticed by way both of portraiture and of memoir." Happily, he has yielded to the importunities of his publisher, who has in his turn yielded to the importunities of the public, which at length finds its desire gratified of knowing somewhat of the features and life of him of whose great work it now hails the fiftieth edition. The biographical sketch is written by the editor of Representative Men, who, judging from his most intimate acquaintance with the facts of Mr. Tupper's life, must be, we should imagine, his twin-brother. It is interesting to know that "at Christchurch, as a member of the Aristotle class, he was a fellow-student of many distinguished men—as the late Duke of Newcastle, the late Marquis of Dalhousie, the late Earl of Elgin, the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, and Professors Jelf, Hill, Doyle, and Vaughan." We are not told what position "the future popular author" took among these distinguished men, or where his name was placed in the class-list. We may assume, however, that he shone amongst them all "velut inter ignes Luna minores." At all events, "he took his degree of B.A. in 1832, of M.A. in 1835, and of D.C.L. in 1847." Between him and the future Premier there must, we should imagine, have existed the closest friendship, when we reflect on the wonderful similarity of their minds. Who could not believe, on reading the following lines, that Mr. Tupper was writing, not of himself, but of the Prime Minister?—

Always thinking at a heat, as a Geyser bursting upward,
The spring was never dry, nor pumiped when it ceased flowing,
And though the rush seemed sudden, yet it had long lain hid,
Collected inadvertently as in some mental cavern.

Though Mr. Tupper's name is generally known only as the author of Proverbial Philosophy, yet the list of his published works fills nearly a page of the biographical sketch. Among his earliest publications was An Author's Mind; containing Skeletons of Thirty Unpublished Books. We have never yet suffered from superstitious fears, but the boldest might well tremble to meet thirty such skeletons as these, if once they took it into their heads to issue forth from the mind in which, strangely enough, they are said to be contained. "The writings of Mr. Tupper," we are further told, "bearing the impress of an impulsive, enthusiastic nature, are, it is asserted, poured forth with exceeding ease and rapidity, and partake much of the character of improvisation." We wonder if Mr. Tupper, when he first read this biographical sketch, was in the same perplexity as was Mr. Vincent Crummies when he found in the newspapers curiously accurate notices of himself and of his children, and wondered how the editor ever managed to obtain the information. Scarcely less suggestive and interesting than the biographical sketch is the "Alphabetical List of above Six Hundred Names of Persons and Places incidentally mentioned in this Work." This list has been given, we suppose, to show the breadth of Mr. Tupper's reading. How broad indeed it has been can be seen at a glance. How much must a man know before he could write about all, for instance, who come under the one letter V, as Vashiti, Vacluse, Venus, Vespasian, Vesuvius, Villiers, Virgil, Vishnu, Vulcan! Proudly can our poet say:—

A true book is more lasting than the monumental brass;
Let come what will, nor fire, nor storm, nor sword, nor tooth of time
Can blast this record of my soul, or blot it out or bring;
With Horace I can sing, I shall not altogether die—
With Ovid, Ennius, David, I shall not die, but live.

Mr. Tupper should remember that Horace has also sung of one greater danger that awaits poets than oven fire, or storm, or sword, or tooth of time. If he escape all those, he may yet be borne away in vicum vendentem thus et odore,

Et piper, et quidquid chartis amicitur ineptis.

Mr. Michell, combining, as he thinks, the discoveries of modern astronomical science with written revelation, propounds the theory "that the bright star Alcyone, the principal member of the Pleiad group," is the spot where the soul, after its "journey through the solar system," enters into Paradise. We shall not pretend to follow him in his flight, in which he has dared to "pierce skyey depths where roam angelic forms," nor to examine into the grounds of his theory, which, quite as much as our planet, may be said, in his own words, to have been

From out its torpid chrysalis of chaos rolled.

While we are still in our "swaddling clothes of fragile clay," we may well be excused if we are reluctant to take so vast a flight; and to pass through space where "comets alone the viewless medium feel." Declining under his guidance to take glimpses into Paradise, we have had nevertheless our interest, if not our pity, greatly excited by an equally ingenious theory which he propounds as regards the duration of life in the planet Neptune. He says:—

If we carry out the theory before named, in relation to the term of life assigned by God to his creatures, then must we suppose the inhabitants of Neptune favoured with length of days beyond any patriarch we read of in Sacred Writ. The summer of Neptune comes around but once in 164 of our years; and we can scarcely imagine that the Almighty would create beings to witness only one solar year of their world; consequently man, if permitted to live even for twenty of Neptune's summers, would attain to an age equivalent to about three thousand of our years.

We do not know why Mr. Michell, if he is to argue from analogy at all, should limit the Neptunian man to but twenty solar years. He would be quite justified in assuming that the duration of life will be fourscore years, and that man "would attain to an age equivalent to about" thirteen thousand of our years. How stupendous are the reflections to which such a thought gives rise! Mr. Michell, in the short life of this world of ours, has already written seven volumes of poetry "of between 200 and 300 pages each." We have calculated that these contain about 42,000 lines. If, however, he had lived in Neptune, we must, following his argument from analogy, assume that he would have written 6,882,000 lines, which, according to our estimate, would, if laid end to end, have reached 324 miles, 140 yards. We shall never for the future gaze into the heavens at night without feeling wonderful compassion for our fellow-critics up in Neptune. Think of 324 miles, not counting the odd yards, of such poetry as the following:—

What means the unwonted burst of torrid beams,
Arrowing in coruscations swift and bright,
From the veiled centre of the universe?
The shafts fly silverly across the gloom;
They reach grim Darkness in his farthest seat,
And startle Desolation. Ether glows
With rosy tints, foretelling earth-born flowers,
Its depths all tremulous as with ecstasy.
Soft-shine the vaporous sides of forming globes;
Harmonious sounds go pulsing thro' the void,
Sweet yet supernal music, from the source
Whence music afterwards gushed richly down
To ravish new-made worlds.

From Mr. Michell and his glimpses of Paradise we pass to Mr. Middleton, Poeta Doo as he modestly styles himself, and author of Ah, Happy England! "This poem is dedicated to the unmarried world," and it "has one peculiarity. It is Shakspearian. Every one has his or her say, and says it slap out." The fishwives of Billingsgate have also every one her say, and say it slap out; but this peculiarity of theirs we have never hitherto been accustomed to describe as Shakspearian. Mr. Middleton is, we should imagine, very young. He is certainly very foolish, very conceited, and occasionally very coarse. He is arrogant enough to pretend to be not only a poet, but a Shakspeare, before he has learnt to distinguish between sense and nonsense. It is certainly an odd notion among young writers that extravagance of thought and expression is a certain sign of poetic talent. For ourselves, if we had to decide between Mr. Middleton and the author of Magnall's Questions, for instance, as to which of the two is the more Shakspearian, we should give it against the poet without a moment's hesitation. For a writer who not unfrequently knows what he is writing about has at all events a certain kind of resemblance to Shakspeare to which Mr. Middleton most assuredly can lay no claim. If he aspires to be a second Shakspeare, we would recommend him first to try to raise himself to the level of the common run of folk, whose words, if not full of any very deep meaning, are yet plain enough. Let him take one of the ordinary subjects of the day—the sewer question for instance—and try to write about it clearly enough to come within the understanding of a vestryman. When once he has succeeded in this, let him next put his composition into verse, and if still it can be understood, let him take heart, and gradually rise to still greater themes. If he goes on steadily in this course, he may at last find himself able, without the assistance of the preliminary exercise in prose, to compose from the outset in verse, and yet to be not altogether deficient in sense. How far, however, he is at present removed from this, the following extract from his poems will show:—

Thus cornered, creviced talent such as Plato's
Can only value age in its potatoes;
Instead of seeing that mankind must fit
The never changing laws which rule us all,
Such aping geniuses would cramp necessity;
Would cramp necessity, as if deriding God
They thought necessity a hubble or
Some bladder-swollen toy for them to prick
Reducing it at leisure: and thus the fools,
The talent—moles have toyed at life;
Have set them up this status as a God,
Conveniences of which must judge the moral!
And such a status! such a crush of statuses!

Mr. Middleton in a note informs his readers that "Plato's 'Republic' is the absurdity or selfishness of senility. The arguments on justice are utterly false reasoning." We remember hearing how one day in an aged painter's studio a young gentleman—probably about the same age as Mr. Middleton—was running down Italy. While he was clearly proving that there was nothing to see there worth seeing, the painter, as he went on painting, was heard keeping up a running commentary, like Uncle Toby's whistle during the reading of Emulphus' Course, of "Poor devil! Poor devil!" While Mr. Middleton has settled Plato, it is some consolation to find, from an advertisement affixed to the present volume, that he has spared us Virgil. Nay, moreover, being well aware that "no past translation conveys more than a shadow of Virgil," and that "translation is a transposition and intensification of ideas from one language to another, and not a mere transposition of words," he has condescended—second Shakspeare though he is—to translate afresh the first four books. His translation, as he tells us, as a whole, "appeals directly to painters and to the whole poetical world"; while the "fourth book appeals directly to every living woman." Some of the rhymes may, for all we know, appeal directly to every cockney ear, as for example that contained in the following lines:—

The horse advances, gains the city's fort,
A huge awe-spiring mass of murder's thought.

Mr. Middleton represents Aeneas as on one occasion asking—
But shall I speak, or grind my crashing jaws?

We hope that the next time he fancies that the Muse is working within him he will be able to keep silence, even if he has, in his effort at self-restraint, to "grind his crashing jaws."

Though Mr. Mortimer Collins is not the most original of poets, reminding us sometimes of Byron, sometimes of Keats, and sometimes of Clough, it is yet somewhat hard on him, we fear, to bring him into the same company as Mr. Tupper, Mr. Mitchell, and Mr. Middleton. He is neither commonplace like the first, nor pretentious like the second, nor silly like the third. He writes often gracefully, and often cleverly, and succeeds, in our opinion, far better as a poet than as a novelist. At times he offends by using slang expressions, and still more frequently does he go out of his way to show his love of tobacco by introducing his cigar. He surely could write a poem on Charing Cross without first telling us that as he stood

In the Square of Trafalgar,
The swift Vesuvian flashes
For a poet's calm cigar.

Gray, in his ode on "A Distant View of Eton College," might surely with as much propriety have told us that his spectacles—that is to say, if he happened to use them—flashed in the sun as he fitted them on his nose so as to gain a clearer view of the antique towers. Mr. Collins can write, and generally does write, a good deal better verses than those we have just quoted, or we should not have apologized to him for the company into which we have introduced him. The following lines from a poem entitled "Winter in Brighton," though they are certainly too much after Clough's style, are yet clever enough:—

If you're a thousand a year, or a minute—
If you're a D'Orsay, whom every one follows—
If you're a head (it don't matter what's in it)
Fair as Apollo's—
If you approve of flirtations, good dinners,
Seascapes divine which the merry winds whiten,
Nice little maids and still nicer young sinners—
Winter in Brighton!

The author of Samson, a Poem from the Bible, thinks it necessary to find some justification for what he calls "Single Poems." "Johnson's London," he says, "and Gray's Elegy (a poem that every poet envies), are notable instances." He goes on to add, "The merit being adequate, why should not the experiment be repeated?" He is needlessly fearful, however, lest the reviewers may, "on account of its comparative shortness, throw this poem aside." We can assure this successor of Johnson and Gray that, so far from scorning his brevity, we rejoice in it as affording us at all events one, if only one, opportunity of bestowing on him a little praise. There is at all events one modern poet who, like almost all the rest, having nothing to say, has yet managed to get it said in less than a thousand lines. A story is told of a country fellow who was amazed at the extortion of a London dentist, who, having in a few seconds extracted a double tooth, charged him a guinea, whereas the village blacksmith had often, in trying to draw a tooth, dragged him three or four times round the smithy, and never charged more than a shilling. In like manner, we suppose, the author of "Samson" imagines that reviewers value poets in exact proportion to the trouble they give them. Just as there are some strange people who like long sermons, so there may be some strange reviewers who like long poems. As for ourselves, we can only say that, whether with poet or parson, we will do our best to be pleased, if only they will be short. It is somewhat difficult, however, to admire the poet before us, even if we allow with him that "blank verse is more and more becoming intelligently free." So "intelligently free" is our poet's blank verse, that, if it were not for the printer's aid, it would be almost impossible to discover that he and his hero had not been talking prose all the time. "A sympathetic reader," however, as he observes, "will quicken or retard the lines as demanded." It will require a very sympathetic reader to make much of such lines as the following:—

And finding (whether provided by the Lord,
And in his hands became a giant tool),
A new jawbone, the jawbone of an ass,
He, freed, put forth his hand, and took it up,
And with it fell upon them, and destroyed
A thousand men; 'mongst whom, a scarlet pile,
What time the sunset smote him round with fire,
And seemed to make a sacrifice of the whole,
He said, or sang,— "With the jawbone of an ass,
Heaps upon heaps with the jawbone of an ass
Have I slain a thousand men!"

Our poet "respectfully suggests that it were as well to read the chapter in Judges besides the poem." We must congratulate him on his moderation. He might have suggested that we should read his poem instead of the chapter in Judges.

PATTY.

THERE are many airs of a brisk and popular kind which remind one of something one has heard before. Here a bar, there a movement, carries a certain echo of reminiscence, perhaps not as a distinct repetition, but as a suggestion; so that, although the whole may be bright and taking enough, we miss in it anything like the fire of originality, and are only pleased at second-hand as it were. So it is with some works of fiction. They are prettily written, the characters are amiable and well described, the scenes are nicely set, and the story runs smoothly in its appointed lines; but there is a curious flatness about it all, a feeling as of going over old ground, and knowing what is coming; the grammar of construction necessitating certain actions, of which there is at most but a choice between two, with a very decided chance in favour of one. Patty is one of these pretty but unoriginal books. It is a charming story, free from the graver class of defects, though it might be all the better for the removal of some minor blunders; it is pleasantly written, in spite of an occasional unnecessary avoidance of nominatives; and the interest is kept up fairly enough throughout, though it might have been better sustained at the end, which falls terribly dead, being, so far as Patty herself is concerned, a very decided anticlimax. But, pretty and nice as it is, it is not a creation in the true sense, and there is scarcely a character or a scene which does not read more as a réchauffé than as work at first-hand. Patty herself is in the beginning merely fluty in Adam Bede; and though the sequel of her fortunes is essentially different, the key-note of the character remains the same. As for Nuna Beaufort, dreamy, unpractical, sweet-natured Nuna, the "lily lady" where Patty is the cottage rose, she, too, is a type of not infrequent occurrence; while Will Rogers, as the stalwart bucolic lover who has manliness and virtue but no culture to speak of, with Paul Whitmore the artist, whose tastes are æsthetic but whose morality is shaky, are both old acquaintances, if pleasant ones. There are certain peculiarities in some of the characters which we can hardly reconcile with common sense; the first and most important being the extraordinary rapidity of Paul Whitmore's manner of making love. Granting that his passion for Patty was, as we imagine it is intended to be represented, of the lowest and most instinctive kind, it seems odd that it should have blazed out in such sudden and overpowering violence. Nor would it, being the kind of love it was, have taken the plaintive and sentimental tone given to it when Patty comes into her fortune, and makes her first use of her newly acquired wealth to turn against the man whom only a few hours before she was proud to call her lover. The whole episode stamps Paul as a mere schoolgirl in male attire; men even of the self-indulgent kind not generally yielding to a week's fancy with such desperate self-abandonment. The authoress, too, forgets, or perhaps does not understand, the divorce which artists are able to make between the beauty of the model they paint and the fascination of the woman they elect to love and marry. As an artist Paul must have been used to pretty girls, so that the loveliness of Patty would not have had such an overwhelming effect on him; unless indeed he was more hopelessly weak and of less moral worth than he is described to be. Having made this blunder in the beginning with one fair face, Mrs. Macquoid repeats it in Paul's sudden attachment to Nuna, which, however, is of a somewhat higher character than was his love for Patty, yet at the best not of a very noble kind. Nuna, too, loves Paul in just the same headlong manner; though with such a nature as hers, unsensual, poetical, dreamy, we might have expected more virginal pride and reticence on the one side, and the need of deeper roots and slower growth on the other. Patty's passion comes more naturally; but the whole of the love-making is too sudden, too abrupt, from Paul's first intoxication at the sight of a pretty rustic in a pink cotton gown to the marriage of a well-born gentleman with a nameless woman met by chance at a foreign hotel, with very many of the characteristics of an adventuresome about her. It is all wooing at railway speed, passion at high pressure; and, though just barely possible in each instance, in an accumulated form it is to the last degree improbable, and gives a hurried and unnatural appearance to the story throughout.

The character of Patty is touched in with what seems to us to be a slightly undecided hand. A cottage girl, who in the tumult and delight of her first love could speculate on the amount of money likely to be possessed by the gentleman who makes love to her, and whose kisses throw her into such burning raptures of delight, shows a keener appreciation of relative values than is likely. To her any gentleman would have been a rich man. The change from her present sordid circumstances, which would have been wrought by her marriage with even an artist, would have been great enough to have satisfied her in the beginning; and her desire for jewels would have been sufficiently fulfilled had she been able to buy things of less value than diamonds. Her ambition might have grown with use, and probably would have done so; but between her life as Paul's wife and her condition as she was—the drudge of her miserly old father, dressed in a "washed-out cotton," obliged to milk the cow, and kept without companionship—there would have been too great a contrast to have allowed her for the present further aspirations. This abruptness of feeling is the cardinal failing of Mrs. Macquoid's work. She has not given her characters time to develop, and all her circumstances are without sufficient reason why. The character of Patty is especially open to this objection, from the first page to the last; from her pondering on Paul's probable fortune while she is blushing with passion at the remembrance of her love, to her solitary walk on the garden terrace, in her black velvet gown, "trying to be good." In which accomplishment, in spite of the author's encouraging words, Patty, if true to herself, will never succeed. Nuna's transformation from a careless and untidy little dreamer to a clever nurse and good manager follows the same rapid course, and seems to point to a grace independent of education, in which theory we are no believers; and we scarcely think that Patience Coppock would have burst her bonds and thrown off the restraint of a lifetime in the volcanic manner assigned to her. Indeed we regard Patience Coppock as a mistake altogether; and her strange meeting and living with her old lover unrecognised is rather painful than pathetic. She wants centrality of action and motive, and meanders through the story in a very disagreeable manner. She could have been dealt with more effectively; but as she is, she strikes us as all out of drawing, and rather an excrescence than an integral element of the plot. Again, Patty's education is as rapid as all the rest, and miraculously thorough, considering the short time it takes. She goes to a French school, learns there a few superficial airs and graces and much questionable worldly wisdom of the cynical sort, and in a few months becomes "a finished lady," marvellously like the real thing, for all that her gold is only lacquer. Yet how she has been able to overcome her decided provincial accent so soon, and in a foreign country too, where she could not have had good English models to imitate, remains a secret for the knowledge of which many a lowly-born woman, raised by the grace of fortune to a good position, would give much. That she was thus able is certain; else Maurice Downes, the proud, worldly, middle-aged gentleman of fortune and position, would not have been taken in so completely as he was. Some word, some slight intonation, some little slip of later memory and instinctive recurrence to old ways, must have surely happened to have startled, if not warned, the fastidious and refined English gentleman; but we do not find the least indication of such a chance, which, moreover, would have given colour and lifelikeness had it occurred; and the peasant girl of only a few months ago is depicted as the perfectly well-bred and self-possessed lady who can put to confusion blue blood itself, and disarm fashionable insolence with its own weapons. It is all eminently unnatural as a study of character, and improbable as regards the plot.

We are disappointed that we hear so little of Will Bright. He and his love and his sorrow run into sand, to which undesirable terminus indeed the whole story has too strong a tendency. We know of course that he will go on loving Nuna to the end of his life, but we should have been glad to have seen him made happy somehow; and we think it rather cruel of the authoress to let him drop so entirely when she had no further need of him. In character he was far more worthy of happiness and of the prize of Nuna's love than Paul; and he carries the reader's sympathy with him as the weak and passionate artist never does; but he gets huddled out of sight in a very undignified manner, and we can only hope for a good future for him, of which we have no indication. An opportunity of subtle painting is lost when Nuna goes to stay with him and his mother. True, she was married and Will was honest; but he loves her all the same; and if the imprudence, as it would seem, of a visit paid by a neglected and unhappy wife to an old lover was committed at all, it might as well have been made of avail. On the other hand, what possible good was there in throwing Paul into Patty's way again? The risk was too great to be run for mere vanity, and there was nothing else to gratify. A bolder writer would have handled that dangerous theme more powerfully, and more according to nature, if less objectionably, than Mrs. Macquoid has done. A clever adventurous—as Patty practically was, in spite of her money—whose soul was set on worldly ambition and social success, would not have perilled the stake for which she was playing for the gratification of a paltry vanity and spite, to regain the love of a man she had thrown over, and to distress a girl whose sole crime was that she had once been her social superior. She had no longer any love for Paul, and Nuna was too far removed from her to annoy her senses or memory; why, then, did she run the risks she must have run in seeking to detach the artist from his wife? and, above all, why did she carry him off on that foreign tour during Nuna's absence? What was the gain? A woman such as she is represented would have had some more important object in view than the childishness ascribed to her, and a better trained writer would have made more capital of the incident; and here, again, we miss the life-likeness of a well considered character, and seem to come into a land of shadows and pasteboard humanity.

Still, with all its shortcomings if judged by a high standard of merit, Patty is a pretty book, and by no means unwholesome. It might be improved, as indeed what work might not? As we have pointed out, more distinctness of type in Patty herself would have given greater vitality to the story, and thrown a more vivid interest round her path and fortunes; and a more elaborated style of narration showing the gradual growth of feeling, and a more closely knit chain of circumstances—more sequential writing in fact—would have kept up the flow better, and would have prevented that sense of jolt and jerk and moral gymnastics from which the reader suffers as things are. Mrs. Macquoid must, however, remember that to judge of work by a high standard and to point out deficiencies is to show more appreciation for an author than to say a good word for inferior work because there was no possibility of anything better from that hand. Severity is sometimes greater praise than kindly indulgence, which is too often a euphemism for contempt.

NORTH LONDON COLLEGIATE and CAMDEN SCHOOLS for GIRLS.—A COURSE of LECTURES will be delivered during the next Term on the "Theory of Education," for Teachers of both sexes, by C. H. LAKE, Esq., B.A. (Lond.), one of the Examiners for the College of Preceptors in the Theory and Practice of Education. Full particulars may be obtained of Miss Brown, 12 Camden Street, N.W.

OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS at the UNIVERSITIES.—Mr. H. M. HEWITT, M.A. (First Classman), and Rev. T. GALLIERS, M.A. (Twelfth Wrangler), are forming a SPECIAL EVENING CLASS for the EASTER EXAMINATIONS.—2 Farnley's Inn, E.C.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE, 43 and 45 Harley Street, W.—Incorporated by Royal Charter 1850, for the General Education of Ladies, and for Granting Certificates of Knowledge. The CLASSES in the College and School will RE-OPEN for the Lent Term on Monday, January 22. Prospectuses, with full particulars as to Fees, Scholarships, &c., may be had on application to Miss MIDGLEY, at the College. A SPECIAL CLASS will be formed, on the entry of Four Names, for the Study of Greek, or for Conversation Classes in Modern Languages. Boarders are received by Mrs. DOUGLAS and Miss PARRY, in the College; and by Mrs. SMYTHE, 7 Melcombe Place, Dorset Square; and Mrs. SEARLE, 25 Alfred Place, Bedford Square. E. H. FLUMPTRE, M.A., Dean.

CLIFTON COLLEGE.—SCHOLARSHIPS.—At the Entrance Examination for next Term on Tuesday, 30th January, one or more HOUSE-MASTER'S SCHOLARSHIPS, value £50 a-year for two years, will be given to the Candidates who sufficiently distinguish themselves. The following Scholarships will be open to Competition at Midsummer next:—One of £75 a-year for two years; one or more of £50, and one or more of £25 a-year, tenable for two years or till election to other Scholarships. Further information may be obtained of the HEAD-MASTER or CHURCHWARDEN, the College, Clifton, Bristol. Boarders receivable on Tuesday, 30th January. Names of Candidates for Scholarships to be sent to the Secretary not later than Saturday, 27th January, 1872. Clifton, 1st January, 1872.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON, SCHOOL.

Head-Master.—T. HEWITT, M.A., F.R.S. Vice-Master.—E. R. HORTON, M.A., Fellow of St. Peter's College, Cambridge. The NEXT TERM will begin for New Pupils on Tuesday, January 30, at ten a.m. The School is close to the Governesses' Station of the Metropolitan Railway, and only a few minutes' walk from the Terminal of several other Railways. Prospectuses, containing full information respecting the Government Scholarships given in the School, Fees, and other particulars, may be obtained at the Office of the College. January 1, 1872. ## THE AMERICAN DEMANDS.

THE admirers of the Treaty of Washington are naturally unwilling to admit that the American claim is fatal to the reputation of the diplomatists who fancied that they had established a precedent for arbitration as a substitute for war. It is true that no Government except that of the United States would have been capable of repaying the sacrifices of English feeling by demands which combine insult with wrong; but the threatening demeanour which now excites irritation and alarm in England is the same which extorted the concessions embodied in the Treaty. There can be no doubt that the sharp practice of the President and his advisers is unanimously approved by his countrymen, although some American critics admit that the damages which can be recovered will bear but a small proportion to the amount of the claim. It is not, however, known that a single American writer or speaker has censured the extravagance either of the demand for some hundreds of millions or of the abusive misrepresentations by which it is supported. A patriotic complacency in every national wrong which can be perpetrated or contemplated is in the United States regarded as the most indispensable of public virtues. It may seem strange that a Power which is likely to be neutral in the majority of future wars should propound the doctrine that neutrality ought to be made more costly than belligerency or defeat; but Americans are well aware that they are practically invulnerable and inaccessible to European attack. Their own history furnishes them with numerous examples of cruisers equipped in their ports for participation in foreign warfare; and they have uniformly and successfully repudiated all liability for the captures effected by American Albatrosses. If they were required to pay the cost of a war supposed to have been prolonged by their aid or connivance, they would not refer the question to any tribunal at Geneva or elsewhere, but would simply defy the complainant to enforce his demand. The affected confidence in the justice of the arbitrators which is professed by disappointed English enthusiasts probably causes unmixed satisfaction in the United States. It is true that the admission of the American claims is simply inconceivable; but, if they are taken into formal consideration, the Treaty will be conspicuously exhibited in its true character of an abject capitulation. One of the Rules established under the Sixth Article of the Treaty has happily been, for its own purposes, tacitly abandoned by the American Government. The scandalous admission that a neutral Power is bound to prevent its ports from being used for the supply of arms to belligerents would have been made the excuse for further extortion, if it had not been flagrantly inconsistent with the conduct of America during the European war and the Cuban insurrection. It was the business of the English Commissioners, or rather of the Government which controlled the negotiation, to secure, in return for their humble apology and for their acceptance of an ex post facto rule of law, a limitation of the American claim within reasonable bounds. Unless the terms of the Treaty are found to exclude the greater part of the American claim, the rejection of the demand on the merits will not exclude the coveted triumph of violence and cunning. The mere discussion of the question will prove that the English Government preferred to dissension with the United States the possible payment of a sum equal to half the cost of the twenty years' war with the French Republic and Empire. It had been thought that the Americans had consented to waive at least one preposterous ground of complaint. The Treaty contained no reference to the alleged precipitancy of the Proclamation by which the QUEEN recognized the existence of a state of war; but the agents who have drawn the case home, with the sanction of their employers, furbished up the stale grievance in aggravation of damages, if not as a substitutive claim.

The rejection of the claim, if it were otherwise doubtful, is conclusively proved by its possible or maximum amount. The English Election Judges lately suggested to a Parliamentary Committee the propriety of treating the expenditure of an extravagant sum by a candidate as conclusive proof of corruption. The attempt to extort for alleged breaches of neutrality more than the cost of a war is entirely inconsistent with good faith. Nothing could have been easier for the English Government than to have terminated the blockade of the Southern ports, and to have transferred to the Confederates, as their allies, the command of the sea. Those who pretend that the capture of some scores of merchant vessels prolonged the war by two years would scarcely deny that the alliance of England with the Confederate States would either have secured their permanent independence, or have indefinitely postponed the Northern conquest. The annual expenditure of fifty millions would have amply sufficed for the struggle, and abstinence from all participation is taxed at ten times the amount. It is notorious that the Emperor of the French would have been eager to concur with England in the defence of Confederate independence, for the purpose of ensuring the success of his Mexican enterprise. Mr. RUSSELL and one or two other English politicians failed even to obtain a hearing when they suggested that the true policy of England would be to assist in establishing the independence of the Confederacy as a check on the arrogance and ambition of the United States. It is perfectly clear that if the American claims were ratified by the Tribunal of Geneva, the arguments of the professed enemies of the United States would be retrospectively justified. Mr. SEWARD's correspondence is full of expressions of anxiety for the maintenance of neutrality by England; but he would perhaps concur with his successor in the desire to exact a penalty for compliance with his wishes. Ten years ago it would have been thought useless to insist that England should be both neutral and responsible for the cost of the war; but extreme deference, when it fails to arouse generous feeling, naturally invites insolence and extortion. The English Commissioners at Washington undoubtedly intended, if possible, to gratify American susceptibility by straining the law of nations into a recognition of liability for the captures of the Alabama. It is doubtful whether any body of jurists can be induced to sanction the innovation; but an award for the value of the ships and cargoes destroyed by the Alabama would not have been unwillingly accepted by the majority of Englishmen. The American agents cynically demand damages not only for the proceedings of a vessel which escaped from the Mersey, but for the injuries inflicted on commerce by the Sumter, which was built and equipped in an American port. The hospitality which could not be refused to a Confederate man-of-war is made a pretext for offence, although it is well known that the French Government accorded the same treatment to the vessels of both belligerents, and that the Alabama sailed from the harbour of Cherbourg for the encounter in which she was destroyed. It would be both useless and improper to anticipate the arguments which will be urged before the tribunal at Geneva; but the hostile spirit which is indicated both by the tone and by the substance of the American claim is a legitimate subject of comment.

It is not too much to say that the demand for the cost of one or two years of war cannot have been honestly preferred. Mr. SCHNER, indeed, advanced a similar claim in the speech by which he sought to flatter and to stimulate American hostility against England; and General GRANT and Mr. HAMILTON FISH repeated the demand in documents which in other respects also sounded like declarations of war; but neither the President nor the Secretary of State can have seriously believed that the Treaty of Washington would have been signed on the understanding that the demand of an enormous tribute was held in reserve. That it was not expressly excluded was perhaps the fault of the English Commissioners; but all negotiations are conducted on the assumption that both parties are governed by certain principles of delicacy and honour. Mr. SUMNER, General GRANT, Mr. FISH, and the counsel who draw the recent claim are all equally aware that the cruise of the Alabama had no bearing, direct or indirect, on the duration of the war. A certain number of Northern merchants and shipowners suffered from the capture and destruction of their property; but the Confederate Government was in no degree richer or more powerful in consequence of the injuries inflicted on the commercial marine of the enemy. If indeed the North had been defeated, it might have been possible to contend, with more or less plausibility, that the catastrophe was accelerated by the activity of the Confederate cruiser, and by the negligence or inefficiency of the Federal navy; but there is no relation between the cruise of the Alabama and the operations in Virginia or in Louisiana. The brief argument of the American agents on this point is almost humorous in its cynical absurdity. The battle of Gettysburg, which put an end to the invasion of the Federal States, is selected as the natural termination of the war. "The 4th day" of July, 1864, saw the aggressive force on land of the insurrection crushed. From that day its only hope lay in prolonging a defence until, by the continuance of the permitted "violations of British neutrality by the insurgents, the United States should become involved in a war with Great Britain." Again, "the Tribunal will see that after the battle of Gettysburg the offensive operations of the insurgents were conducted only at sea through the cruisers." War, therefore, is not war when the weaker party is reduced to the defensive. After the battle of Gettysburg the Confederate Government never thought of surrender; and at a much later date General LEE defeated General GRANT in a series of pitched battles, with a Federal loss equalling in numbers the whole Confederate army of Virginia. If it is assumed that the Confederates would have discontinued the war as soon as they were reduced to the defensive, it follows that during the victorious advance of LEE into Maryland the Federal Government ought to have discontinued the struggle. It is impossible that the Americans can deceive themselves into a belief that their Government is actuated by any motive except the desire to humiliate England. It may be admitted that the Treaty of Washington countenanced the belief that no demand would be too extravagant to succeed; but nevertheless the American statement has been received with feelings of surprise and disappointment. There is perhaps little advantage in discussing the conduct or temper of a foreign Power which prefers to have an ethical code of its own. Englishmen are rather concerned with the fresh illustration of the newfangled policy which consists in profuse humiliation in the presence of every powerful adversary.

THE FRENCH BUDGET.

LAST Saturday M. THIERS made a great financial speech in favour of his scheme for the taxation of raw materials. This, it appears, was the corner into which he had been employing his dexterity in driving the Assembly. His arguments were, however, by no means solely financial, and he appealed to his hearers even more on political than on economical grounds. He also resolutely refused to allow them to examine any questions but those which he submitted to them. A large portion of his speech is, therefore, outside of the region of finance, and cannot be discussed on those bases on which the discussion of a Budget usually proceeds. If the country must have the Truce of Bordeaux, and if the Truce of Bordeaux is interpreted with the sanction of the Assembly to include the acceptance of whatever Budget the Government presents, there is no great use in employing such arguments as political economy provides to show that the Budget is a bad one. M. THIERS insists also on having ten millions provided by new taxes; but he will not hear of any discussion as to the preliminary point whether those new taxes are needed. He has raised the expenses of the army by three millions, and he only deemed it necessary to observe that, if any of his hearers thought a reduction in this enormous estimate could be made, they would on examination find that any possible reduction would be so trifling that to make it would be wholly useless. The simple fact is, that if M. THIERS proposes to spend three additional millions on the army, there is no one in France who can oppose him. In the same way he proposes to raise eight millions sterling by taxation to pay off a portion of the advances of the Bank, for the very laudable purpose of restoring specie payments. But no one in France is in a position to question whether the restoration of specie payments could not be effected more cheaply, and it seems quite natural to Frenchmen that the Head of the State should be generally supposed to be asking for a larger fund than is necessary for this purpose, in order that he may have a fund in hand for any secret policy he may favour. Having thus shown that ten millions must be derived from new taxation, and that the continuance of the Truce of Bordeaux depended on his being allowed to raise it in the way which he most fancied, he proceeded to show, or rather to state, that no other taxes but taxes on raw materials would produce the necessary amount. He threw overboard the project of augmenting proportionately the existing taxes, for, as he said, the land could not possibly bear any additional taxation. This was quite at variance with his statement in his speech on the Income-tax that the scheme of taxation before the war was perfect; for obviously, if the land only paid its exactly right proportion of what the nation required, it could bear an augmentation as well as any other source of revenue. But he knew, and his hearers knew, that he could not afford to quarrel with the peasants, and that, even if an augmentation of the direct taxes on land was just, it was politically dangerous. There is no arguing on financial grounds with a Minister who talks politics while he affects to be talking finance; and when M. THIERS said that an Income-tax in every form was tainted with Socialism, there was no good in disputing with him. He stated his willingness to get a quarter of the ten millions he wanted from other sources, such as an augmentation of the sugar duties; but the other three-quarters he avowed he must and would have from taxes on raw materials. It was only by a concession to human weakness that he argued in his favour. If the Assembly has to do his bidding, it might seem superfluous to add persuasion to force. But he chose to do so. He offered in the lightness of his heart to prove that these taxes on raw materials would not only do France no appreciable harm, but would do her a great amount of appreciable good, and that they were quite in harmony with the English Treaty of Commerce. If the master of many votes condescends to argue, and once gets into the vulgar arena of financial discussion, his arguments may be criticized just as if they were not the arguments of an adroit Saviour of Society.

The new taxes on raw materials will fall on a great variety of articles; but Mr. THIERS confined his remarks to the taxes on cotton, wool, and silk, and it is enough to attend to these articles as specimens of all the raw materials to be taxed. There are imported into France about one hundred million kilogrammes of cotton, according to the statement of M. THIERS, and each kilogramme is worth two francs. A tax of twenty per cent. or forty centimes will give forty millions of francs, from which there is to be deducted a drawback of four millions; the amount of manufactured cotton goods representing a tenth, or rather less than a tenth, of the cotton imported. The revenue will thus be benefited to the extent of nearly a million and a-half sterling, while the consumer will scarcely feel it, the additional cost being about a halfpenny a yard on calico. A subsequent speaker contested this estimate, on the ground, apparently a valid one, that M. THIERS had founded his calculation on statistics collected while Alsace was still a part of France, and his view was that, after allowance had been made for the abstraction of the consumption of Alsace, the revenue would only receive about a million sterling. M. THIERS also appears to have completely ignored the main objection to taxes on raw materials, that the consumer pays much more than the first amount of the tax, as the capital requisite for its payment lies idle until numerous subsequent processes have converted the materials into the manufactured article. The profit to the State will therefore be probably much less, and the burden to the consumer much greater, than M. THIERS was willing to allow. But no doubt the revenue will derive a considerable benefit from the tax on raw cotton; and as France does not produce cotton, there is nothing of a Protectionist character in this tax. It is otherwise with the taxes on wool and silk. M. THIERS was especially strong on the absolute necessity of having a duty levied on foreign wool in order to protect the French grower. The owner of French sheep cannot, he thinks, compete with Australian and other foreign wool, and so he must be protected. It happens that out of two hundred million kilogrammes of wool employed in French manufactures, one hundred millions are produced in France, and one hundred millions come from abroad. M. THIERS takes the weight of the hundred millions coming from abroad as 45 millions after the wool has been cleaned, and the value of each kilogramme at 5 francs. He proposes to impose a duty of 88 centimes per kilogramme on this quantity, which would produce 36 millions of francs to the Treasury, subject to a drawback of 10 millions, or 26 millions net, while the French wool-grower would be protected by a duty of 18 per cent. against his foreign competitor. But who will pay this duty in the long run? In this particular case the consumer will not pay it, as M. THIERS thinks; for on a coat costing four or five pounds the duty will only be a shilling, and the tailor will easily be able to bear that amount of loss. So that farmers, whom all the world loves, will be richer, and no one but tailors, whom every one hates, will be the poorer, and so this is a very good tax. Silk, again, stands on its own peculiar footing. A drawback equal to the duty is to be granted, and as the quantity of silk imported from France appears on the face of the statistics to be exactly equal to that exported, the State would derive nothing at all from the tax. But M. THIERS says that the dye of the manufactured silk adds so much to its weight that one-third of the imported silk really stays in France, although the weight of the dyed manufactured silk is equal to that of the raw silk imported. There are a million and a-half kilogrammes of foreign silk on which no drawback will have to be allowed, and on this quantity a tax of twelve francs per kilogramme, or about sixteen per cent., will, according to M. THIERS, give a clear revenue of a little over a million sterling; while the poor growers in the South of France will be proportionately protected from competition. And so little will the tax be felt by the consumer—for here, curiously enough, it is the consumer, not the milliner, who is to suffer—that a grand dress with some twenty yards of silk in it, and now costing 24*l.*, will only cost twelve shillings more when the tax is imposed.

Humble as the Assembly may be before the predominating influence of M. THIERS, it was scarcely possible that statements such as these should pass without challenge. M. MONTGOLFIER showed on Tuesday that to get sixty millions of francs from silk and wool the Government was going to give a bonus to French producers of forty-eight millions, so that the consumer would have to bear almost double the burden of the taxation. He also showed that the amount of silk exported was greater than that imported, so that French producers would turn the drawback into a bounty; for out of four and a-half millions of kilogrammes imported he would only consent to deduct half a million for the increased weight through the dyes used. The drawback, however, would, he thought, be insufficient to protect the French manufacturer, and thus he would lose the foreign market, and Lyons might as well give up making silk altogether. M. AMBROISE JOURET also showed that the French manufacturers must employ sixteen millions sterling more than they have now invested in order to find capital for the payment of the duties, and this would plunge many of them into great difficulties. If any arguments could tell, these might fairly be called telling arguments; and those urged against the imposition of these duties as an infraction of the Treaty of Commerce with England were scarcely less weighty. The treaty provides that, if an article produced in France is subjected to a new tax, the French Government may impose a corresponding duty, and if a drawback is allowed on an article of French production, a corresponding duty may be imposed. Australian wool now comes into France under the treaty duty-free, and if a tax were placed on French wool there might, according to the treaty, be imposed a corresponding duty on Australian wool; or, if the French Government first imposed a duty on French wool and then gave a drawback on it, there might be a corresponding duty imposed to prevent Australian wool getting the benefit of the drawback. But the French Government does not intend to levy any duty at all on French wool, while it does intend to subject Australian wool to a duty. How is it possible that this should be considered in accordance with the treaty? M. JOHNSON, a deputy from Bordeaux, pointed this out, and M. THIERS vouchsafed him the oddest reply a Minister ever gave. He entreated him not to be so unpatriotic as to put the English up to this argument. It was, he thought, a very subtle one, and if M. JOHNSON would but hold his tongue, very likely the English would never find it out. M. THIERS is engaged, he says, in negotiating with the English Government as to the treaty, and these negotiations are going on extremely well. The English do not deny that France may impose compensating duties, and they are willing to see whether some modifications of the treaty may not be acceptable in England. It is, according to M. THIERS, the height of unpatriotic folly in a Frenchman to give the English a hint that duties should be laid on French products before compensatory duties can be levied on similar English products. If the English are awake enough to see this, then there is nothing left but for France to give formal notice of its wish to abandon the treaty altogether. But, although M. THIERS is strongly convinced that the wisest thing is to abandon the treaty altogether, he is aware that many Frenchmen do not agree with him in this opinion, and to humour them he is willing to give England a fair trial; and if England is as simple as adroit Frenchmen may reasonably hope, and will agree to call duties on English products compensatory duties, although similar French products are not taxed at all, he does not see any reason why the supporters of the treaty in France and England should not have the innocent amusement of believing their treaty to remain in full vigour.

MR. ROEBUCK AT SHEFFIELD.

MR. ROEBUCK'S speech to his former constituents at Sheffield is characteristic, amusing, and almost touching. Like many other zealous advocates of innovation, he has lived half round the circle of political thought, and yet the change in his opinions has been so gradual that he feels little or no sense of inconsistency in opposite convictions which have the permanent quality of honesty and of warmth. Mr. ROEBUCK, indeed, candidly admits that in his youth he made some mistakes, as when he wrote an essay under the title "Of What Use is a House of Lords?" Since that time he has found out that the House of Lords performs the functions of a Second Chamber, not in conformity with ideal perfection, but better than any substitute which has been suggested in England or tried in Continental Europe. On topics which have risen to the surface in later times the earnest Radical of forty years ago has nothing to retract. It is, indeed, highly probable that he may sometimes have denounced the Irish Church; but it is only within a few years that the question of disestablishment became practically important. The Irish Land Bill could never have been introduced in the days of PEEL, of STANLEY, and O'CONNELL; but it may be confidently asserted that, if such a measure had then been proposed, Mr. ROEBUCK would have been one of its warmest supporters. At a more advanced age he utterly disapproves of the whole policy of the present Government. The Irish Church Act is distasteful to him because it is acceptable to the Roman Catholic hierarchy, and he is not inclined to recognize in exceptional circumstances an excuse for interference with freedom of contract between landlords and tenants. Mr. ROEBUCK is perhaps too much inclined to confuse the motives which dictate the adoption of a policy with the reasons which may recommend it to an impartial judgment. It is certain that the Church Act and the Land Act tended to confirm Mr. GLADSTONE in the possession of power; and unfavourable critics, such as Mr. ROEBUCK, may suspect that his main impulse was that of personal ambition; but a measure is not condemned as unjust or inadequate because its author may have had a personal interest in its success. It has indeed been sufficiently obvious that, as Mr. ROEBUCK says, the leaders of the two political parties have been bidding against one another for public approbation, and that, after Mr. DISRAELI had played the card of household suffrage, he was effectually over-trumped by his opponent. But Mr. GLADSTONE may have done good service to the country by the proceedings which enabled him to command a large majority in the House of Commons; and Mr. ROEBUCK'S analysis of his motives, though acute, is altogether one-sided. Mr. GLADSTONE is not a cold-blooded speculator in politics, but rather a fanatic who believes any theory which happens for the moment to suit his purpose. The feminine element which Mr. ROEBUCK discerns in his character is not confined to the vindictiveness which he has frequently displayed. There is also something womanlike in the impassioned earnestness which can at one time see only half a question. When Mr. GLADSTONE, during his political tour through Lancashire, repeatedly exulted in the approaching defeat of Mr. ROEBUCK at Sheffield, he probably thought that it was for the benefit of the country, as it was undoubtedly a gratification to himself, that one adversary should be removed from his path.

It has evidently not crossed Mr. ROEBUCK'S mind that, notwithstanding his distrust of Mr. DISRAELI, and the absence of any connexion on his part with the Parliamentary Opposition, he has himself by a natural and gradual process become a thorough-going Tory. It is highly desirable that at a time when many things are becoming unsettled, such politicians should have a hearing. The self-complacency of the present Minister, and the abject sycophancy of some of his followers, require to be corrected by a vigour of criticism which is only to be expected from a moral and political antagonism verging on antipathy. It is not to be supposed that Mr. ROEBUCK cherishes any personal enmity to Mr. GLADSTONE, but he finds his versatile earnestness, his occasional violations of the Constitution, and his passionate love of quibbling altogether intolerable. More dispassionate observers might remark that Mr. GLADSTONE has nevertheless performed great public services, and that when he is under no temptation to employ tortuous methods, he often succeeds by the legitimate use of argument and persuasion; but Mr. ROEBUCK's portrait has at least the likeness which is found in a good caricature. Mr. GLADSTONE will perhaps console himself for the attack by the reflection that Mr. ROEBUCK lives in London, and that he has therefore some corrupt interest in purchase in the army, or in some other abuse which has been corrected by the present Government. On the other hand, it may be suggested that Mr. ROEBUCK spoke in a provincial town, and that some of his hearers applauded some of his remarks. There is reason to fear that metropolitan scepticism has penetrated as far as Sheffield, though it had two or three months ago not extended to Whitby. Mr. GLADSTONE himself does injustice to the London Clubs, of which BROOKS's is not the least celebrated. A member of that body lately, in a letter to the Times, described the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE of England as "one of the 'free-lances of the Liberal party,'" because he had ventured in a dignified letter to censure the indefensible conduct of the PRIME MINISTER and the LORD CHANCELLOR in the matter of the Judicial Committee. If Mr. GLADSTONE is not satisfied with a devotion which may almost be called impudent, he will scarcely find stronger proofs of allegiance even in the columns of the provincial papers. The correspondent who writes from BROOKS's further defends the job on the ground that the Act of Parliament which has been evaded was passed in a hurry; and it might have been supposed that the Ministers were in some degree to blame for enacting a law so imperfect that it could be justifiably disregarded. Mr. ROEBUCK adopts the view that the proceeding was "as barbed, as sorry, and 'as thorough a cheat as ever was passed on a gaping multitude by a thimble-rigger';" and calm or friendly critics, while they regret the unnecessary strength of Mr. ROEBUCK's language, will not deny that the transaction furnishes some excuse for his too vivid expressions of indignation. It may be collected from Mr. GLADSTONE's concise answer to the CHIEF JUSTICE that he will rely on the division of responsibility between himself and the CHANCELLOR, and an ingenious critic has compared the apology to a well-known contrivance recorded by STERNE for distributing between two speakers the pronunciation in separate and harmless syllables of an obnoxious word. Mr. ROEBUCK is not inclined to be satisfied with any subtle or far-fetched apology.

When Mr. ROEBUCK formerly doubted the utility of the House of Lords, he would perhaps not have been greatly shocked at a theoretical Republic. At Sheffield he would perhaps scarcely have thought it worth while to notice the recent and abortive agitation, if he had not conjectured that the promoter of the movement was encouraged by persons more important than himself. Mr. ROEBUCK may, he says, be regarded as a suspicious man, but that he has suspicions he admits. He "cannot help thinking that the agitation was 'undertaken with full knowledge of the consequences,'" and he is certain that to Sir CHARLES DILKE the consequences will not be disadvantageous. In other words, the seconder of last year's Address has reason to hope for promotion from Mr. GLADSTONE, who indeed noticed his speeches against the Crown in terms of courteous and moderate dissent. Mr. ROEBUCK undoubtedly breathes an air of suspicion. The mob popularity which might perhaps have been earned by successful advocacy of the overthrow of the Monarchy furnishes a sufficient explanation of the efforts of the Republican agitator, nor is there the smallest reason to suppose that his enterprise has been in any way countenanced by his political superiors; but if the Ministers are exposed to far-fetched and unfounded suspicions they have themselves to blame. After wantonly proclaiming himself a convert to universal suffrage, to the claims of deceased wives' sisters and of female politicians, and to a dozen other crotchets, Mr. GLADSTONE has destroyed all confidence in the steadiness of his convictions; and the wildest paradox which he could adopt as an article of faith would excite more indignation than surprise. On the last Lord Mayor's Day he was still a loyal subject of the Crown; but at Greenwich he confined his defence of the House of Lords to a statement that he would think once and twice and thrice before he consented to its abolition. After the reward conferred on the ringleader in the Hyde Park riot, the appointment of even Sir G. DILKE to an office under Government is not incredible; yet Mr. ROEBUCK is once more a victim to preternatural suspicion when he hints that the riot itself was the result of a vast conspiracy for placing the present Ministers in power. It was bad enough that Mr. GLADSTONE withheld, at a moment of great danger, his aid from the Government which was charged with the maintenance of the public peace. It is not known whether he formally concurred in the improper appointment which is no the only misapplication of patronage by the present CHANCELLOR. Waste of time and of strength probably prevented Mr. ROEBUCK from including in his review the foreign policy of the Government. It is not to be supposed that he approves of the abject capitulation of Washington, especially since it has been illustrated by the commentary of the American statement of the Alabama claims. In other respects Mr. ROEBUCK's speech would have been more comprehensive if he had not concentrated his attention on the supposed defects of Mr. GLADSTONE's character. It is to be regretted that an uncharitable view should be taken of any character, and especially of that of an eminent statesman; but political dislike sometimes evokes the same kind of sagacity which is often displayed in the conduct of private quarrels. Satire is no always just, nor invective well founded; but it is not against the strong points of any man's nature or conduct that the attacks of an adversary are directed.

PARIS AND THE ASSEMBLY.

IT seems possible, after all, that M. VAUTRAIN's election may miss its mark. M. THIERS appears to have hoped that the exhibition of the Paris electors clothed and in their right minds would convince the Deputies that Versailles is no the natural meeting-place for a French Legislature. Yet, if the expected result had come to pass, the Assembly would have shown itself strangely illogical. It cannot be said that the arguments for a return to Paris are strengthened by the recent election. There has never been any doubt that the majority of the Parisians are on the side of order. A community so largely given to retail trade may be trusted to dislike street fighting. But the Paris shopkeepers are not miraculously secured against being forced to put up with what they dislike, and the Assembly probably believes, and is certainly justified in believing, that in the event of the Chamber being invaded by armed rebels, the supporters of M. VAUTRAIN would be found guarding their own hearths and homes. A few thousand determined revolutionists are a match for ten times that number of peaceably disposed citizens. The Assembly has chosen to misread the lesson of the Commune, and the stress which has been laid on M. VAUTRAIN's return is very well calculated to confirm it in its error. M. BUISSON, the reporter of the Committee which has advised against a return to Paris, insists that the insurrection of March failed because it could not lay hands on the Assembly, and from this he argues that the way to make all future insurrections equally unsuccessful is to keep the Assembly well out of their reach. It would be a truer account of the matter to say that the Commune broke down because the Assembly had troops whom it could trust. If the Versailles army had followed the usual fashion of French soldiers in time of revolution, and fraternized with the insurgents as soon as they were brought face to face with them, the position of the Assembly would have been as insecure at Versailles as in Paris. The Deputies might have had time to make their escape before the Communists entered the town, but it may be questioned whether, having once got away, they would have had sufficient resolution to meet again elsewhere. What the defeat of the Commune has really done is, as has been often pointed out, to break the tradition that what Paris wills France wills. The spectacle of the great city holding out resolutely but hopelessly against the steady advance of French troops obeying the orders of a French Government, must have been infinitely discouraging to the Republican fanatics who had thought that whoever could get possession of the Hôtel de Ville would have the victory at his feet. It may be true that this spectacle would never have been exhibited if the Legislature had not been sitting outside Paris, though this assumes a degree of feebleness in M. THIERS and in Marshal MACMAHON which is hardly consistent with fact. But, granting this to be the case, it does not follow that men whose real strength has been revealed to them by a defeat can never exert that strength again. What the Assembly has done is repeated. Wherever the Assembly may be seated, the same men ought now to know that the French nation is something more than a mere echo of the Paris mob.

judicious precautions before a revolution, and reasonable firmness in the hour of revolution, the right of the nation to review the decisions of the capital can be successfully asserted. Whatever other elements of weakness the existing Assembly may possess, it has at all events no taint of that unwillingness to fire on the people which was fatal to the last King of the French. This view of the case would have been equally true, no matter what had been the result of the recent election. The real strength of the Government at the moment of actual attack is not in the number of unarmed shopkeepers who secretly wish it to win, but in the fidelity of the armed soldiers who are prepared to ensure its winning. Under a proper military system there ought to be no difficulty in getting hold of this essential condition of keeping order in a disturbed country. M. THIERS will be ill advised if in the coming debate he rests his case on the political virtue of M. VAUTRAIN's friends. It is satisfactory of course to be assured that there are a large number of Parisians who wish that the Assembly should reign over them. But to suppose that these respectable but unwarlike citizens can be trusted to give effect to their own desire would be entirely to mistake their temper. They want a Government which will protect them, not a Government which looks to them for protection.

The particular indication which the Assembly has lately given of its indisposition to return to Paris is the rejection of a motion to take up the Bill for investing the Councils-General with legislative functions, in the event of the Legislature proper being deposed or subjected to violence. There is no reason to suppose that the Assembly is hostile to this measure on its own merits. It is humiliating, no doubt, to have to confess that anything of the kind can be required, but to withhold such a confession would argue a culpable unwillingness to see facts as they are. The legitimate Governments of France have not always been able to hold their own against the sudden violence of a factious minority, and on more than one occasion the cause of order and liberty might have been materially served if the supreme authority had devolved by force of law on somebody beyond the sphere of the immediate insurrection. The course of a Paris insurrection has usually been to deny the claim of the Legislature to represent the country, and then to use the machinery of Government to bring about the return of a new Legislature devoted to the interests of the momentary holders of power. The acceptance of the proposal to make the Councils-General a second line of defence would give the authors of the next revolution two legislative bodies to deal with instead of one. The members of the Councils-General owe their places to popular election, and in the event of the Assembly being from any cause incapacitated for doing its work, a body chosen from the Councils-General would be as accurate an expression of the feeling of the country as any that could be devised beforehand. But though the Assembly may have no objection to the proposal itself, it has a very strong objection to discussing it before determining whether it shall return to Paris. If the majority were anxious to reverse their former decision on this point, they would naturally have welcomed so convenient an excuse for changing their mind. But the fact that the conversion, under certain circumstances, of the Councils-General into a provisional Legislature affords them such an excuse is for the moment sufficient to condemn it. Until the motion for returning to Paris has been negatived, the majority have no wish to see the step deprived of any of its risks. Later in the Session, when it has been settled that they are to remain where they are, they will probably give a favourable hearing to a proposal which will then come as an additional instead of, as now, a substituted security.

If M. THIERS is as anxious as he appears to be to get the Assembly to Paris, he has chosen an unfortunate time for recalling the worst atrocity of the Communists. There is absolutely no reason why the murderers of the hostages should only now be put on their trial. If they had been the first prisoners arraigned on a capital charge, M. THIERS might have been credited with a wish to ensure them a calmer and more impartial hearing than they could have looked for in the first horror caused by their crime. But urgency has not been the fault of M. THIERS's proceedings hitherto, and the character of the trials seems to undergo no change as the events to which they relate become more distant. On any other supposition these men ought to have been tried first of all. The offence alleged against them was the gravest committed under the Commune, though it seems to excite less interference in the party of order than the almost venial crime which could alone be charged against Rouget. If they had been tried while the recollection of the Commune's crimes was fresh in the public mind, even a wholesale execution would have seemed an excusable excess of severity.

about even the most guilty of them will now seem like a defiance of the demand for an amnesty which formed the basis of the Paris election as well with M. VAUTRAIN's supporters as with M. VICTOR HUGO's. And every day of orderly government makes it harder to explain why the trial of civil offenders is left in the hands of military tribunals. A little promptness six months ago would have enabled the Government to dissociate itself for the future from all the memories of the excesses of the Versailles troops. By an extraordinary want of judgment, M. THIERS has so distributed his severities that the one act of his reign which he ought to wish the Parisians to forget, shall be continually brought to their recollection.

MR. FAWCETT AND THE GOVERNMENT.

IF Mr. GLADSTONE is in the habit of reading the reports of criticisms on his policy, he will have had the pleasure within a few days of comparing Mr. FAWCETT's comments with Mr. ROEBUCK's and Mr. HORSMAN's. It cannot be said that either speaker is highly complimentary, but they assail the Government from opposite directions. Mr. FAWCETT is still young enough to be a zealous Reformer, though he is seldom in accord with the majority of the Liberal party, or with their recognized leaders. While Mr. ROEBUCK complains that the Irish Church and Land Acts were introduced for the purpose of keeping Mr. GLADSTONE in power, Mr. FAWCETT asks why the English Church also is not destroyed; and he demands legislation for the purpose of transferring a portion of the property of English landowners to their tenants. After taunting the Government with its slackness in regard to the Church and the land, Mr. FAWCETT proposed to reform the law in a direction which has not hitherto been attempted. He was shocked at the spectacle of an Attorney-General occupied for a week or a month together in addressing a jury on behalf of a private client. The TICHBORNE case, although it may furnish a popular illustration of the divided interests of law officers, is not more engrossing than the general practice of the leaders of the Bar. If the Government requires only legal advisers exclusively devoted to their official duties, it must dispense with the services of the heads of the profession. Sir RICHARD BETHELL, Sir ROUNDELL PALMER, Sir W. BOVILL, and Sir JOHN KARSLENE probably made a larger income by private practice than by official fees during their respective occupations of the place of Attorney-General. No leader of the Bar would accept an appointment which might perhaps last only for one or two years, at the cost of sacrificing all his professional emoluments and prospects. The question is precisely the same with the comparison which has often been made between political Ministers and permanent civil servants. There is something to be said for government by clerks; but as long as the House of Commons retains its power, none but its chiefs will command public confidence and respect; and an Attorney-General with the rank and position of an Under-Secretary would not be strong enough to maintain himself against the contempt or opposition of the principal members of the Bar. If Mr. FAWCETT lives to the age of Mr. ROEBUCK, he will perhaps discover that it is necessary not only to note an anomaly, but to suggest an alternative.

It might also be worth Mr. FAWCETT's while to reconsider his determination to act without regard to party. If every member, or every independent member, insists on the adoption of his own opinions, it will be necessary to devise some other mode of government than by a Parliamentary Constitution. There are indeed some points on which political connexion ought to be disregarded; nor can Mr. FAWCETT be blamed for expressing the universal opinion on the evasion of the Judicial Committee Act; but when he proceeds to demand a vote of censure on the Government, he takes but a circuitous method of advancing the Liberal cause. The debates in both Houses will contain a sufficient condemnation of the act which has been perpetrated; and it is even possible that Mr. GLADSTONE himself may be for once convinced that he has done wrong. A vote of censure by the House of Commons would compel the resignation of a Minister who still commands a large majority, and who, like M. THIERS in France, has no competent successor. Only an impracticable purist would wish to bring a professedly hostile Government into office for the sake of recording an abstract resolution in the Journals of the House of Commons. It is not "better" that half-a-dozen Administrations should fall than that Parliament should sanction this act of lawlessness. Or rather it may be said that by abstaining from a vote Parliament will sanction nothing. The fall of half-a-dozen successive Administrations might perhaps lead to a revolution, and it would certainly tend to weaken authority; yet nothing can be more certain than it would be impossible to form a stable Government if Mr. GLADSTONE were at the present moment driven from office on an accidental and non-political issue. The presence in the House of Commons of a few detached politicians such as Mr. FAWCETT is not without its advantage. There is much justice in his complaint of the evils which result from excessive subservience to the leaders of a party; but a prudent man will always be inclined to suspect that, if he holds an exceptional position, he is, like a privileged person in private society, an object rather of toleration than of envy. All Governments are liable to blunders, and it must be confessed that Mr. GLADSTONE's mistakes are sometimes peculiarly irritating; but if all his measures were considered exclusively on their merits, it would be impossible for him to govern the country. Many votes are given in favour of a Ministerial proposition because the majority prefers that the power which must be entrusted to some body of men should be exercised by its own leaders. A prudent Minister will not strain the allegiance of his followers by such measures as the Licensing Bill of last Session. Mr. FAWCETT concurs with Lord DERBY in the belief that the evils of the liquor trade are not to be corrected by the institution of a gigantic monopoly which, like all other monopolies, would tend to increase of price and to deterioration of quality. In all probability Mr. BRUCE will, in the ensuing Session, abstain from encumbering himself and his colleagues with an impracticable measure. To the Temperance fanatics and the promoters of the Permissive Bill Mr. FAWCETT is not bound by any ties of loyalty and discipline. Nothing can be more manly than his announcement that he will never consent to give a local majority the tyrannical power of enforcing abstinence on their neighbours. It is perhaps an inconvenience to be governed by a Premier who has every quality except common sense, and by a Home Secretary who shares only the defects of his chief; but unfortunately there are no other leaders at present to be found; and when, as in the case of the Licensing Bill, their blunders are too extravagant, total failure furnishes the best remedy for legislative incapacity.

A large part of Mr. FAWCETT's indefatigable energy has been devoted to Indian affairs; and he blames the House of Commons for paying render attention to trivial questions of parks and public buildings than to the interests of "180,000,000 of our 'Indian fellow-subjects.'" According to Mr. FAWCETT, the Indian expenditure has risen within fourteen years from 32,000,000*l.* to 53,000,000*l.*, and the debt has been increased threefold; and it might have been convenient to add that the comparison is made between the periods before and after the Mutiny, and that a large part of the increased outlay is due to the proved necessity of maintaining a larger European force in India. One-third of the total debt has been incurred for the construction of public works, "which have been so ill devised and so 'extravagantly constructed that upon the aggregate outlay 'the returns are insufficient to pay the interest on the money 'borrowed, and a considerable portion of the money has been 'altogether lost.'" The remedy proposed for the alleged mismanagement is that the House of Commons should exercise a constant supervision over the finance and administration of India; yet it is impolitic that either the House itself or a Committee should make itself responsible for the details of public works. When the East India Company was abolished, there was some reason to fear that Indian affairs would be exposed to the mischievous effects of party struggles, and to the corrupt or ignorant intervention of English politicians. Experience has shown that the subject-matter was too large for an Assembly which finds ample employment in the legislation and government necessary for the United Kingdom. The government of India has been administered, as in former times, by the Viceroy and the civil and military authorities in India, under the control of a Secretary of State, who is checked and assisted by a Council of some of the ablest and most experienced officers who have formerly held high positions in India. There can be no doubt that errors are sometimes committed, as when the able and indefatigable Minister who now presides at the India Office lately determined to cripple the whole railway system of India by introducing a new variety of gauge. It is also true that, as Mr. FAWCETT says, many charges are from time to time imposed on the Indian finances which ought properly to be defrayed by the English taxpayer; but the House of Commons is itself chiefly responsible for an injustice by which its constituents profit; and it is desirable that the greater part of the affairs of India should be locally managed. It may be that some great Indian disaster will hereafter "distract every English home, from John

"o' Groat's House to the Land's End"; for a vast and distant empire necessarily involves many possible causes of danger. Mr. FAWCETT is well employed in studying the risks which exist, and the securities which may be provided; but his researches will probably lead him to the discovery that the habitual interference of the House of Commons would be more dangerous than any other source of misgovernment.

It may be hoped that the protest of a genuine democrat against the socialistic follies which have been promulgated by Mr. SCOTT RUSSELL and, to a smaller extent, by Sir JOHN PAKINGTON, will produce some effect on those who are likely to be deluded by promises of food and dwellings provided by the State. Mr. FAWCETT still retains his attachment to liberty and his belief in personal independence. It would indeed have been strange if his unsparing criticisms on the policy and conduct of the Ministry had led him to hope for Utopian felicity under the paternal care of a Government which has not, in the discharge of its ordinary functions, succeeded in gaining his confidence. Mr. HORSMAN's speech at Liskeard shows that in questioning the soundness of Ministerial policy Mr. FAWCETT does not stand alone. Several years have passed since Mr. HORSMAN was celebrated by Mr. BRIGHT as a chief seceder to the Cave of Adullam, and as one half of the ambiguous animal with undistinguishable head or tail. Mr. HORSMAN's mutinous tendencies were punished by a temporary exclusion from Parliament; and when he reappeared he had become one of the most earnest supporters of Mr. GLADSTONE's Irish policy. His natural inclination to tamper with party discipline seems to be breaking out again; for he inquires why everything which the Government has touched since the passing of the Irish Land Bill has proved a failure. The Education Bill involved falsehood to the Liberal party; the match-box tax was a blunder; and the substituted Budget was something worse. The object of the Licensing Bill was the reverse of that which ought to have been pursued, but Mr. HORSMAN, apparently thinking Mr. BRUCE scarcely responsible for his own measures, kindly adds that he was not to blame. The Army Bill was introduced when the Government had no scheme of re-organization, and in using the Royal Prerogative the Government "followed a course for which Ministers in other days had lost 'their heads and monarchs had lost their crowns.'" Finally Mr. HORSMAN apprehended that the Government intended to crown their errors by altering the rules of the House of Commons; and he assured them that he made his remarks in no unfriendly spirit. "It was not a friend who flattered," and it was certainly not Mr. HORSMAN. Mr. GLADSTONE, when he can spare a moment from listening to the plaudits of the Telegraph and the country members, may perhaps profitably listen to the whispers in which Mr. HORSMAN, Mr. FAWCETT, and Mr. ROEBUCK remind him that he is mortal. It is scarcely possible that they can all, like the unprincipled opponents whom he denounced at Whitby, have a corrupt interest in purchase in the army.

THE DUKE OF PERSIGNY.

ANOTHER, and almost the last, of the small band of personal adherents of the late Emperor NAPOLEON has passed away. The EMPEROR has to mourn the loss of a perfectly exceptional friend and supporter, of a man who not only shared his fortunes, was staunch to him in adversity and prosperity, gave him every help that a ready head and a faithful heart could give, but who believed in him and his cause, was firmly and honestly persuaded that in the Napoleonic ideas lay the only key to the welfare of France, and who planned or associated himself with the fiascos of Strasbourg and Boulogne, and the triumph of the Coup d'état of 1851, in a spirit not only of personal devotion, but of fanatical patriotism. The Duke of PERSIGNY believed in NAPOLEON and Napoleonism very much as the comrades of the PROPHET believed in MAHOMED and Mahomedanism; and in these later days it at least marks a man as a man apart that he should in the France of the nineteenth century be possessed towards a leader and a cause with the burning spirit of Arabian devotedness. The son of a soldier named FIALIN, who fell at Salamanca, the Duke served in the army of CHARLES X. until, after the revolution of July, he was forced to leave the service on account of the hostility he felt and expressed towards the Orleans Government. For three years after 1831 his most enthusiastic and inquiring biographers admit that he lived in an obscurity which all their efforts have failed to dispel. But in 1834 he suddenly reappeared as the Vicomte de PERSIGNY, having created for himself, or, as he said, restored to himself, a title which at least gave him distinction, whether it had or not any ground in the dim legends of his family history. The Viscount made society aware of his re-existence by publishing a violently Bonapartist journal called L'Occident. His poverty prevented his extending the life of this publication beyond the limit of a single number; but even a single number sufficed to show the BONAPARTE family that a most singular person, with the most singular views as to what they and their ideas were worth, had revealed himself. The attention of LOUIS NAPOLEON was called by his uncle JENOUX to the indisputable merits and probable utility of the new partisan. The young Prince and the Viscount met, and thenceforward, for more than thirty years, they have shared together the shade, the sunshine, and the eclipse of their fortunes. In 1836 the Viscount planned and shared the hazardous enterprise of Strasburg; but although arrested, he managed to escape into Germany and thence into England, whence in 1840 he accompanied the Prince to try once more at Boulogne what luck would bring them. They were captured, and the Viscount was sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment; but as time wore on, and no great harm seemed likely to come either from him or his friend, he was allowed to live at Versailles under a very mild system of supervision. There he was living when the Prince came in 1848 to shine out before long in the glories of his Presidency. Bonapartism was at last triumphant, and the good time he had so long dreamt of had come to France and to the friend of LOUIS NAPOLEON. Pleasant things were at once showered on him, but he never held any very conspicuous position until after the Coup d'état, to the success of which he devoted his untiring energies and his undoubted gifts for conspiracy. Thenceforward great honours and high places and splendid opportunities of political influence were at his command. He was made an incontestable Count, and then a Duke; he was twice Ambassador in England, twice Minister of the Interior; the daughter of a Prince and an appropriate fortune to start him in married life were provided for him; and he was made, of course, a Senator and a Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour. In the later days of the EMPEROR's reign, however, although the personal ties that bound him to his Sovereign were as strong as ever, he kept himself, or was kept, somewhat aloof from the arena of practical politics. He allowed it to be known that his views varied somewhat from those of the EMPEROR. He combated the opinion that the Napoleonic ideas were compatible with Parliamentary government when he first saw the EMPEROR inclined to give way to what he considered an illusion; and afterwards, when the EMPEROR began to make concessions, he thought that a bolder line should be taken, and that more should be given, and more rapidly, if anything was to be given at all. Politically speaking, his day had gone by before the war of 1870 broke out and Sedan hurried his friend and his friend's cause into the abyss of utter humiliation. The dreaming Bonapartist of 1834 lived to see the coronation as Emperor of the Second NAPOLEON, but he also lived to hear the tidings of Sedan. Few persons probably have ever had reason to appreciate more vividly the truth of the old saying, that no man ought to be accounted happy until he is dead.

There is always something touching and interesting in the life of a man whose one great characteristic has been fidelity, even though we may not very much admire the persons or the causes to which this fidelity has been shown. There has been a time in English history when men like the Duke of PERSIGNY have run a course only dissimilar to his because their cause was never successful. The STUARTS, whatever may have been their faults, provoked a fervour and romantic attachment to their persons and their interests, got men to conspire for them, run hair-breadth dangers for them, die for them, sing in their honour, swear in their honour, and dream of nothing and care for nothing except that the CHARLIES might have their own again. The leading Royalists and Jacobites of this adventurous class were not perhaps very able men, not fitted really to govern a great kingdom, not at all good judges of the permanent interests and fitting policy of a nation; but they gave a brightness and a lustre to the Stuart cause which even at this distance of time makes that cause the cause of poetry. The Duke of PERSIGNY was not unequal to the honours he achieved, or had thrust on him. He was a popular and not incapable Ambassador, having pleasant things to say to men and women, and active in forwarding the interests on advancing which his master was bent. When he had to act as Minister of the Interior, he at least showed that he had a distinct conception of his duties, and that he would not tolerate any opposition of whatever kind to the Head of the State.

was a first-rate man for enterprises like those of Strasburg, Boulogne, and the Coup d'état; a fairly good Ambassador and Minister of the second class, and much more than competent to be a Senator; but he was not the man to be of great use to his master in the higher region of politics. It was not at all necessary for his peculiar branch of eminence that he should have any very high gifts in this way. It was enough that he was capable, presentable, shrewd, and agreeable. For this was all that was needed to make his fidelity respectable and meet for high recompense. He was too clever, too much a man of the world, too resolute to be regarded in the half-comic light of the foolishly attached personal follower of the EMPEROR. It was not a light matter that the EMPEROR should have such a devoted friend as the Duke of PERSIGNY. And to the EMPEROR he filled a place which no one else could fill. They had been associated together as no other comrade of the EMPEROR had been associated with him; and in all their long connexion the Duke had never wearied in his devotion. He always took the EMPEROR and everything the EMPEROR did and had done in a serious light, and heartily believed in everything the EMPEROR had chosen to think in harmony with his position. This must have made him invaluable to the EMPEROR. Other men shared his fortunes, associated with him, gave him their best aid and advice, took from him the good things he had to give, and smiled gently when anything brought to remembrance the eccentricities or failures or weaknesses of their chief. But to the Duke of PERSIGNY everything Napoleonic was sacred, great, and glorious. It is easy to imagine what a deep comfort to the EMPEROR it must have been that he had about him one man who could be trusted to think of the eagle of Boulogne without any sense of the ridiculous; who had himself attended on, or perhaps helped to carry, that unfortunate bird; and yet not merely bore up in perfect honesty against his memories of it, but actually accepted it in good faith as an admirable living embodiment of the aspirations of the BONAPARTES. Perhaps none among the faithful followers of the STUARTS ever got quite so far as this. And the enthusiastic attachment of the Duke of PERSIGNY not only did him credit, and cheered his master, but it raised and ennobled the cause to which he attached himself. Bonapartism is not dead in France, but there are no more Dukes of PERSIGNY. Bonapartism is but the name for the schemes of one set of intriguers among the hosts of intriguers in divided France. There is no longer a belief in Napoleonic ideas; no longer any attachment to a man. There is merely a calculation that Imperialism may yet be a winning card, and perhaps a sincere belief that a Government which, as it is said, gave France twenty years of prosperity, is the best sort of Government that France could have. It must be allowed that the success of the EMPEROR was as much above what is generally put forward as the programme of the Imperialist party as the Duke of PERSIGNY was above the vulgar herd of Imperialist courtiers and adventurers. The EMPEROR really had ideas, and to shoot Communists and give the people bread and amusements, which now forms the whole programme of Imperialists, was only part of the programme of their chief. Misfortune and the exposure of the evil tendencies of his system have now obscured at present the memory of what he was; but history, we think, in recording the devoted attachment of the Duke of PERSIGNY to LOUIS NAPOLEON, will also record that LOUIS NAPOLEON had some qualities of head and heart that made him not undeserving of that attachment.

IRISH EDUCATION.

THE Resolutions adopted at the Roman Catholic meeting in Dublin on Wednesday ought to be considered apart from the speech with which they were introduced by Cardinal CULLEN. In the latter there were some statements which the speaker would certainly find it difficult to prove, and there was a general tone of serenity which seems inconsistent with some of the admissions he himself made. If Cardinal CULLEN is right in believing that "the most influential and distinguished members of the Anglican body" are with the Irish Roman Catholics on this question, and that "the principal liberal and enlightened Protestants of the Empire" wish them success, a temperate enumeration of the real or supposed grievances under which he considers the members of his Church to be labouring would be more to the purpose than some general declamation. Nor is it quite fair to the Government to take no notice of the Report of the Royal Commission, which is the probable, though not the necessary, basis of future legislation. When, for example, Cardinal CULLEN asserts that "in National Schools under Pres-

"byterians, thousands of Catholic children receive religious instruction from Presbyterian teachers, recite anti-Catholic prayers, and read the Protestant version of the Bible," it would have seemed only natural to point out that these particular hardships would be absolutely prevented if the recommendations of the Commissioners were adopted. Under a rule that no child registered as a Roman Catholic shall be present when religious instruction is given by a Protestant, proselytism becomes impossible. This rule has been in operation since 1866, but it has hitherto been clogged by a proviso that the prohibition shall not apply to children whose parents express a desire that they shall receive religious instruction with the rest. In appearance nothing can be more innocent than this exception. It simply protects the freedom of the parent against the possible hardship of an inflexible rule. But when the circumstances of Ireland are taken into account this seeming innocence disappears. Why should a parent who has registered his child as a Roman Catholic desire him to receive religious instruction as a Protestant? The case of a real conversion is provided for by the parent being at liberty to change the entry in the register, and to announce that he and his children have ceased to be Roman Catholics. The only motive he can have in the immense majority of cases is to please the patron of the schools, who is probably the Protestant squire, or more usually the patron's wife. An Irish peasant will not change his religion to avoid offending an employer, and there are not many employers who would place much value on such a conversion. But there are peasants probably who, with the same end in view, may express a wish that their children should remain in school while the Protestant teacher is giving religious instruction, and there are employers, it may be feared, who would welcome the opportunity of bringing Roman Catholic children "within the sound of the Gospel," and would exert pressure upon the parents in order to obtain it. The case of a parent wishing his child to be brought up in a religion different from his own is of too rare occurrence to call for any special provision. If such an anomaly is ever forthcoming, the means of obtaining Protestant teaching are not likely to be wanting in a parish where the patron of the National School is a Protestant.

The adoption of these recommendations would be a sufficient compliance with the demand contained in the latter part of the Sixth Resolution carried on Wednesday. The Dublin Roman Catholics do not deny that "in particular circumstances mixed schools cannot be avoided;" they only ask that where this is the case "measures shall be adopted to save Catholic children from the danger of proselytism." In the earlier part of this same Resolution, however, they plead that in a great part of Ireland there are numerous National Schools "which are frequented wholly, or almost exclusively, by Catholics," and in these they "call for such changes in the rules of the National Board as will allow the practice of Catholic exercises of piety and of Catholic teaching in schools which are practically Catholic." We have said in a former article that this request appears plausible enough in itself. It may be thought, for instance, to be a piece of superfluous strictness to forbid Roman Catholic pictures to be hung up in a school which has never from the day it was opened been attended by any but Roman Catholic children, and which is planted, perhaps, in a district containing none but Roman Catholic families. But before a relaxation of this rule can be sanctioned, it must be shown that in the event of a Protestant family settling in the neighbourhood, and sending their children to the National School, the protection which is now guaranteed will at once be revived in their favour; and also that there is no danger of obstructions being placed in the way of Protestant children entering a school where their admission would compel an immediate and important change in the arrangements as to religious teaching. The issue practically submitted is whether a school "frequented only by Catholics," and alleged to be likely from the character of the neighbourhood to continue to be so frequented, might safely be recognized as a Denominational School with a stringent conscience clause, on condition that, as soon as a child registered as a Protestant is found attending, the ordinary restrictions shall once more come into force. It is obvious that, if such a rule were adopted, the managers of an exclusively Catholic school might have a strong motive for deterring Protestants from sending their children, or even from settling in the district. The main object of regulations about religious teaching is to ensure that there shall not be a child in Ireland who may not "have the benefit of secular instruction without any danger of his receiving religious instruction to which his parents may conscientiously object."

and the Commissioners are clearly right in holding that "in all places where there is only one school which can reasonably expect support from the State, that school must be open to children of all denominations." When it is argued that such a school is, as a matter of fact, attended only by children of the same denomination, and that therefore it may be possible to allow some of the precautions against proselytism to lie dormant, the very material question arises, what security can be taken that these indispensable precautions shall come into play again the moment the school ceases to wear this exclusive character. It is admitted by all reasonable people that proselytism, either direct or indirect, must under any circumstances be prevented, and that school managers ought to enjoy as much freedom in other respects as is compatible with the rigorous observance of this condition. The point on which the Roman Catholic Resolutions go beyond the recommendations of the Royal Commission is in the suggestion that in schools "practically Catholic," religious emblems may be used, and incidental religious teaching given in addition to the formal religious instruction at fixed hours. We have formerly shown, however, that the Royal Commissioners regard this suggestion as inadmissible, as leaving a loophole for possible proselytism, from which in the end the Roman Catholics themselves would be the greatest sufferers.

The Resolutions which relate to the higher education are unexpectedly moderate in their wording. They contain no specific demand for the establishment of a separate Roman Catholic University, or for the endowment of a separate Roman Catholic College. The Eighth Resolution, which is specially concerned with this subject, sets out that Catholics are "at present virtually deprived of the advantages of a higher education," and calls upon the Government to "establish a University system in this country of which Catholics can conscientiously avail themselves." The notion of the endowments now applied to the promotion of University education in Ireland being shared by colleges belonging to the three religious communions which virtually divide Ireland between them, is one which consistent Liberals could, of course, only entertain on the assumption that the State took proper care that the secular education given in all of them was up to a certain standard. Supposing such a concession to be too distasteful to English Radicals and Irish Protestants to have any chance of being adopted by the House of Commons, it is important to observe that its abandonment would not necessarily involve the rejection of the principle embodied in this Eighth Resolution. Endowed Denominational Colleges are not essential to the idea of "a University system of which Catholics can conscientiously avail themselves." Endowments might, according to one suggestion which has been made, be given to the University, and be held by members of the several colleges, just as certain University endowments at Oxford are held now by a member of Balliol, at another time by a member of Christ Church. If some such plan was adopted, Roman Catholics would get just so much of these endowments as their abilities enabled them to carry off in open competition. Every Scholarship or Fellowship or Professorship that fell vacant in the University would be tried for by Roman Catholics, Anglicans, and Presbyterians, without respect of persons, and the prize would fall to the share of the religious body which sent up the best man. For the endowment, though attached to the University, and wholly unfettered by religious restrictions, might be held by a resident at any one of the affiliated colleges, and would thus serve as a stimulus to every college alike. Clever young men, too poor to maintain themselves during their University career without help, would have the same inducement to go to a Roman Catholic College which made them eligible for a University Scholarship as to one which had Scholarships of its own to be competed for.

ALLEGED INSANITY OF CRIMINALS.

TWO persons have been tried within the last few days for murder, and in both cases the defence of insanity has been propounded on medical authority. The case of Watson presents, however, hardly any basis for this defence, and the case of Edmunds, irrespectively of the history of her family, does not offer any circumstances stronger than have been found in other cases in which the same defence has been rejected. The answer to the medical theory which has been submitted in these cases has been often given, and it is simply that the general admission of that theory would inevitably encourage murder. A fair test of this theory was furnished by the case of TOWNLEY, which occurred a few years ago. It was proved that insanity had existed in the family of TOWNLEY. It was also proved that TOWNLEY had expressed to the medical witnesses who examined him the opinion that he had not committed any crime. He attempted to justify his act by alleging that the lady whom he had murdered was his property; that she had been illegally wrested from him; that he viewed her in the light of a wife who had committed adultery, and that he had as perfect a right to deal with her life as he had with any other description of property. The fact was that the lady had been engaged to marry TOWNLEY, and the engagement was broken off, whereupon he obtained an interview with her and killed her. Now it is possible that the defence which was set up in that case might under peculiar circumstances have succeeded; but it is manifest that if imitators of TOWNLEY had appeared, it would have become necessary, whatever the doctors might say, to hang them. It must be admitted that public opinion influences the administration of criminal justice in this country, and public opinion is liable to fluctuations. Some years ago corporal punishment was in extreme disfavour, whereas now people apparently like their newspaper to inform them how a garrotter looked during his flogging, and it is frequently suggested that other offences besides robbery with violence might be usefully visited with the lash. Garotting indeed went on until nobody was safe in the streets after dark, and it was felt that the civilization and humanity of the age must submit to the unpleasant necessity of reviving a punishment which had been regarded as only suitable to a period of ignorance and barbarism. TOWNLEY was found guilty, but was not hanged. He was condemned to penal servitude, and afterwards destroyed himself. But suppose that he had been acquitted on the ground of insanity, and that, as is only too probable, that form of insanity had become common, there would soon have been a general concurrence of opinion that hanging was the only effectual cure for it. "If," said the Judge in TOWNLEY's case, "his real motive was that he conceived himself to have been ill used, and either from jealousy of the man who was preferred to him, or from a desire of revenge upon him, committed the act, that would be murder. These were the very passions which the law required men to control; and if the deed was done under the influence of these passions, there was no doubt that it was murder."

It happened that Mr. Baron MARTIN, who tried TOWNLEY, also tried EDMUNDS, and his experience of such trials dictated the remark that it was common to raise the defence of insanity when people of pecuniary means were charged with the commission of crime. The proofs of insanity in the family of the accused were stronger and more recent in the case of EDMUNDS than in that of TOWNLEY. The father of EDMUNDS became insane, and died in a lunatic asylum. She had a brother whose history may be told in the same words. She had a sister who suffered from hysteria, and who attempted in a fit to throw herself from a window. Other members of the family had been similarly affected. This was the substance of the evidence given by the prisoner's mother and other witnesses, and, supposing that the evidence as to the prisoner's conduct and conversation left a reasonable doubt as to her sanity, the proof of insanity in her family would be entitled to considerable weight. But even if we allow that the evidence of the medical witnesses who examined the prisoner did go to this extent, the prisoner herself made a statement in court which went far in the opposite direction. She is reported to have said that she wished she had been tried on the other charge which had been brought against her, and she added, in reference to Dr. BEARD, "It is owing to my having been a patient of his, and the treatment I received in going to him, that I have been brought into this dreadful business. I wish the jury had known the intimacy, his affection for me, and the way I have been treated." It must be remembered, in any comments which we may make upon this speech, that the prisoner has not been tried upon the charge to which she referred, and that Dr. BEARD has not been tried at all. We make use of the speech only for the purpose of testing the defence put forward on the prisoner's behalf, and, looking at the case apart from the evidence of insanity in the prisoner's family, we should say that it would be almost conclusive against that defence. She says that Dr. BEARD's treatment of her has brought her into this dreadful business. Supposing that her complaint against Dr. BEARD is true, she supplies an explanation of the motive which led her to commit the crime for which she was tried which is quite as adequate as any explanation given by other criminals. Supposing that the complaint is false, she displays a degree of cunning and cleverness which does not often indicate insanity, although not perhaps inconsistent with it. The same remark applies to her allegation of pregnancy, which appeared upon examination in the usual manner to be unfounded. Our ancestors would have said that she was a wicked woman, and would have hanged her without compunction, even if they had believed that her wickedness was partly caused by the wickedness of man.

The medical testimony in the case was perhaps weaker than in other cases where the same defence has been attempted. Dr. LOCKHART ROBERTSON regarded the case as on the borderland between crime and insanity. He thought the prisoner's intellect quite clear and free from any delusion, but her moral sense was deficient as is usual in the descendants of insane parents. This is almost exactly what was said by Dr. FORBES WINSLOW in TOWNLEY's case:—"His moral sense was more vitiated than I ever found that of any other human being." Mr. Baron MARTIN, in that case, told the jury that if TOWNLEY knew that the act which he committed was contrary to the law of God and punishable by the law of the land he was guilty of murder. This, indeed, is all that an English Judge can say of such a case, and perhaps it is all that he ought to say. The doctrine of vitiated moral sense excusing crime cannot be admitted without endangering the foundations of morality and criminal justice. Take, for example, the character which would have been described, in the words of a well-known play of the last century, as that of "a bold intriguer and a gay companion." The heroes of many comedies of that time were men of vitiated moral sense, but it would never have occurred to any psychologist to suggest that seduction or adultery was pardonable because it was committed without compunction. Another medical witness, Dr. WILLIAM WOOD, "was very much struck with the prisoner's absolute indifference to her position, and he failed altogether to impress her with its seriousness." These, again, are almost the exact words which were used by Dr. FORBES WINSLOW in TOWNLEY's case. This witness discussed with the prisoner the subject of what was said to have passed between her and Dr. BEARD. He asked whether she thought it wrong for a person to destroy the life of another person because she believed that the husband of that person wished to get rid of her. "After some hesitation she said she thought it would be wrong, but she did not say it in such a manner as to lead him to believe she really thought so." The witness here admits, while attempting to qualify the admission, that the prisoner had that capacity of distinguishing right from wrong which the law holds to be sufficient to render her responsible for her actions. It seems to follow that until the law is changed there is nothing more to be said about the case. Dr. MAUDSLEY gave evidence to the same effect. "He found an extreme deficiency of moral feeling as to the crime with which the prisoner was charged, and she did not appear thoroughly to realize her position." Such evidence ought to be disregarded in this as it has been in many other cases, but it happens that the medical witnesses are supported by the fact that near relations of the prisoner have been committed to lunatic asylums on the usual certificates, and have remained in them until death. Mr. Baron MARTIN, commenting upon similar evidence which was given in TOWNLEY's case, said the object of that evidence was to show that it was possible, and not unlikely, that the hereditary taint might exist in the prisoner. "All the evidence," however, failed to show the existence of any delusion in the prisoner's mind which could explain his act." These words fit accurately to the present case, but it must be acknowledged that the evidence of insanity in the prisoner's family went much beyond that which was given in TOWNLEY's case. It is of course possible that the doctors may be right although they give wrong reasons for their conclusions. We may observe that Dr. MAUDSLEY has given the same reason for the same conclusion in the case of WATSON, where we cannot help saying that both reason and conclusion appear to us preposterous. It has of course been remarked that, if the prisoner EDMUNDS had committed suicide, and the evidence of insanity existing in the family had been given at an inquest, the jury would have arrived without hesitation at a verdict which would have been generally approved. It is, however, unnecessary to add that in all such cases we ought not to be unduly influenced in our estimate of facts by the indisposition which we feel to give apparent sanction to a theory of irresponsibility for crime which we regard as mistaken and pernicious.

THE METRIC MANIA.

THERE is a very simple and easy method of agitation, which consists in fixing the attention steadfastly and exclusively on one side of a question, in utterly ignoring everything that has been or can be said on the other side, and in continually repeating the same arguments and assertions as if they had never been challenged and confuted. Simple people are sometimes confounded by this daring and unscrupulous pertinacity. They imagine that it is impossible that statements which have over and over again been contradicted and exposed should be calmly and confidently put forward as if they were accepted truths. These are apparently the tactics of the gentlemen who have undertaken to bring their country under the bondage of what is called the metric system. On Wednesday a meeting was held in one of the off-rooms of the Mansion House to promote this object. The weather was unpropitious, and to this circumstance is ascribed the smallness of the company who responded to the invitation; but it may be doubted whether the brightest sky would have brought together a larger gathering. It does not appear that, with the exception perhaps of Sir J. LUBBOCK and Dr. FARR, who spoke from private and professional points of view, there was any one present capable of pronouncing an authoritative opinion on the subject. Speeches were made and resolutions were passed, asserting that the introduction into this country of the metric decimal system of weights and measures would greatly facilitate commercial intercourse and save a great deal of time and trouble in practical business; that the metric system was of peculiar value in the mechanical arts and manufactures, from its perfect decimal division, and from the direct relation which it offered between the measures of length, capacity, and weight; and that a system of decimal coinage would be a necessary corollary to the introduction of the new system of weights and measures. The gist of the resolutions was, of course, that the French system of coinage, weights, and measures, ought to be immediately introduced into this country. It is desirable that this proposal should be stated in the plainest manner, and that the full extent of it should be clearly understood. It is obvious that the decimalization of the coinage and of weights and measures must go together, and that to make this change in one case and not in the other would be a purely mischievous proceeding. The metric maniacs seem to have thought in the first instance that the country might be more readily persuaded to take their cherry in two bites than to swallow it whole; and if they could have committed us to metric weights and measures, the decimalisation of the coinage would have followed as a matter of course, since the former measure by itself would simply have caused great inconvenience without any advantage. The public, however, was not to be deluded so easily as was supposed, and it has now been determined to bring out the whole project honestly in the face of day. We are warned that nothing less is in view than the compulsory substitution of the French coinage, weights, and measures for the familiar and time-honoured modes of reckoning which are inextricably mixed up with our history, our literature, our ways of business, our scale of prices, our daily habits of life, and our expenditure. The use of the metric system is already permitted, but, as nobody apparently is willing to adopt it, it is proposed that henceforth it shall be enforced by law, with the addition of a decimal coinage.

Before considering the disadvantages of the change, let us look at the benefits which we are told to expect from it. The speeches of Sir J. LUBBOCK and Dr. FARR were in a great measure beside the question, for they were mainly directed to prove the desirableness, which we are not concerned to contest, of having a uniform system of coinage, weights, and measures throughout the world. It would also be a great advantage if all the world spoke the same language; but there are as yet no philosophers sufficiently advanced to propose that French should be substituted for English as the vernacular of the country. It would, no doubt, be a convenience to merchants and bankers who have accounts with foreigners to be spared the trouble of converting their bills into foreign denominations and vice versa, although the fluctuation of exchanges would still remain. Statisticians would also find their calculations simplified if the same system of notation prevailed among all civilized nations. Sir J. LUBBOCK (who was not, however, prepared to say that the metric system was in all respects the best) and Dr. FARR had perhaps some reason for recommending the change from their own professional points of view. If it were adopted, Sir JOHN could probably dispense with one or two clerks, and Dr. FARR might now and then get to bed an hour sooner. We should certainly be glad to promote the economical management of foreign business in the City, and to secure to statistical philosophers the full measure of repose to which their arduous labours entitle them; but other people may also claim to some consideration. In point of fact, there is no law against computing by decimals if anybody chooses to resort to it; sums can be worked by decimals, and, with a little trouble, the results can be re-converted into common numeration. At the meeting it was urged that the metric system would be a boon to chemists; but it happens that, as we once before had occasion to remark, this class would gain very little from the change, inasmuch as proportions only are concerned in chemistry, the actual quantities dealt with being a matter of indifference, and there is nothing to prevent a chemist from expressing proportions in decimals.

It is perhaps needless to say that the agitators at the Mansion House did not take the slightest notice of the long series of reports of Committees and Commissions directed against their pet crotchet. Our present system of weights and measures is by no means perfect, and it is possible that improvements might also be suggested in our coinage. These are questions which may deserve further consideration; but the arguments against an entire revolution of our coinage and weights and measures are altogether overwhelming. It must be remembered that this is not a subject on which the philosophers are on one side and the populace on the other. The metric mania has been condemned by the highest scientific authorities, including Professor AIRY and the late Sir JOHN HERSCHEL. The basis of the metric system is, as is well known, an absurd chimera—one of those foolish freaks of vanity which continually discredit the French among reasonable people. Sir JOHN HERSCHEL has shown in his letters to the Times that, in point of fact, our British system refers itself with quite as much arithmetical simplicity, through the medium of the inch, to the length of the earth's polar axis (a unit common to all nations), as the French system does, through the medium of the metre, to the elliptic quadrant of a meridian passing through Paris (a unit peculiar to France). It also refers itself with more precision than the French to our standards of weight, capacity, and length. It would certainly be a great disadvantage to give up a system which admits readily of binary division. In the small affairs of life, in retail trade, in house-keeping, and the "petty cash" of business, the facility afforded by the duodecimal system in this respect is very important; and if we look to the greatest happiness of the greatest number, the convenience of the multitude must be set against the office expenses of wealthy bankers, and the occasional annoyance of statistical philosophers. It is somewhat singular that in the capital of the chief commercial country in the world it should be seriously proposed that we should give up our own system of reckoning in favour of that of another country much inferior to us in commercial standing. If there is to be a change, it might more reasonably be proposed that it should be on the other side. Sir J. LUBBOCK remarked that, if we could not induce other countries to adopt our system, it would be better for us to adopt theirs rather than be shut out from trading with them. We might admit the argument if there were any reason to suppose that we suffered from our singularity in this respect, but the Board of Trade Returns certainly do not indicate that we are at present "shut out" from commercial relations in any quarter. It is perhaps hardly worth while to speculate as to the compulsory establishment of the French system in this country, because we do not for a moment believe that such a course is practicable. Even if the army were employed to reinforce the constabulary, it is impossible to suppose that the great body of Englishmen, and still less that more resolute and conservative part of the population, Englishwomen, would allow themselves to be policed and dragooned into doing business in francs and centimes, metres and litres. Official calculations would be made in the new reckoning, various commercial firms would follow the example, and in the course of time, if the change were decreed, it might come into tolerably wide operation; but at the very earliest this would not be until a generation had passed away. In the meantime the greatest confusion and discomfort would prevail; to many it would occasion serious loss, to some even ruin. We have only to reflect on the extent to which pence and shillings have become standards of price in all sorts of ways, for cabs, fees, periodicals, admission to places of amusement, and for all kinds of small articles in constant demand, in order to understand the revolution which would be caused by the abolition of these familiar and indispensable coin. What had formerly cost sixpence would have to be reduced to fivepence, while articles at a shilling would perhaps be raised to fifteenpence. On every side we should have disturbance and perplaidy, and it is impossible to doubt that for a time domestic trade would be seriously injured. Even in France at the present day the people still cling to the old ways. Parisian writers almost invariably reckon by sous instead of centimes; and the absence of farthings, which are perhaps beneath the notice of capitalists and philosophers, is a serious loss to poor people. The disadvantages of a change would be certain and enormous, while the advantages would at the best be petty and equivocal. The spiritual zeal of the advocates of the metric system appears to have infected the Educational Committee of the Privy Council. Under the latest edition of the Code, this system has been made an obligatory subject of examination in elementary schools. It is directed that a chart of the system—a most formidable-looking document, as we can attest from actual inspection—shall be exhibited on the walls; and children who are still struggling with the elements of arithmetic are required to meditate upon “the advantages to be gained from ‘uniformity in the method of forming multiples and sub-multiples of the unit.’” The disturbing effect which, according to the old doggerel of the school-room, fractions are supposed to exercise on the youthful mind will thus be introduced at an earlier period and considerably intensified. It is not quite fair, either to the children or the public, that the time of the former should be occupied in learning what will in all probability never be of any practical use to them, especially while there is so much difficulty in getting them taught really essential and important things. The sham simplicity and superficial clearness of the metric system may have, at first sight, a plausible appearance; but the more thoroughly the subject is examined the stronger will be the conviction that our own system is superior to the French both in theory and practice, and that any defects which may belong to it can be repaired without sweeping it away altogether.

THE INTERNATIONAL CHRISTIAN LEAGUE FOR THE PROMOTION OF MORAL SCIENCE.

WE have quoted at full length, because we know not how to condense, the title of a singular Association which has suddenly burst upon the world at Manchester. We are not a little puzzled to understand the objects which it proposes to itself, and the means by which it hopes to carry them out. We imagine, vaguely enough, that it is intended to be some kind of dim reflection of that lively body, the Social Science Association; and we may surmise that it is intended to provide a more orthodox rival to a Society which rather piques itself upon a philosophical superiority to all forms of creed. In order to arrive at some more distinct estimate of its purposes, we may look into its composition and glance at the series of Resolutions which were passed at its first meeting. The gentlemen who “took part in the proceedings”—for the League does not appear to have assumed sufficient consistency to provide itself with a Council or a Committee—included the Dean of Canterbury, the Rev. W. B. Pope, tutor of a Wesleyan College, the Rev. Canon Berdsey, the Principal of Owen's College, and the Rev. Dr. Fraser, a Presbyterian minister. Its leaders, therefore, would appear to be Low Churchmen and Dissenters. Their aim is apparently to promote that desire for a wider union which must be felt by all sincere Christians, but which has generally been expressed most strongly by members of the opposite party in the Church. The first Resolution, which, like the others, is intolerably wordy, expresses this sentiment. It says that “the first condition of national morals is the unity of the Church of Christ, and, as this unity consists, not in uniformity, nor in the fusion of denominations, but in the recognition of each other as fellow-Christians, by the members of all Evangelical Churches, therefore it is a primary duty of all such fellow-Christians publicly to recognise each other.” This is a very queer statement. The unity of the Church is compatible, it appears, with the Church being split up into any number of sects, so long as two conditions are observed. The first is, that the sects must be “Evangelical,” whatever that means; and the second, that they must “recognise” each other. That word “recognise” is a terrible puzzle to many people, as we have learnt from the discussions about the wickedness of “recognising” vice by making laws in restraint of it. In this case it has probably been selected as indicating the very lowest degree of common feeling by which any body—if that which is really an aggregate of competing bodies can be called by such a name—can possibly be bound together. The bond of Christian unity, when it is neither to be a common belief nor a common government, but a mutual recognition, will certainly not be strong. Dr. Payne Smith, some, however, to have thrown some light upon the subject by a speech of which we regret that we have a very imperfect report. He observed that the establishment of the right of dissent was one of the greatest gains that had ever been made to the Christian Church. No one certainly will regret that necessary step towards complete toleration; but Dr. Payne Smith's reason was peculiar. At present, he said, “the truth was much wider than the mind of any one of them could well stretch to.” Perhaps the time would come, in this world or the next, when our minds would be sufficiently enlarged for the recognition of all truth, but at present the various denominations are useful because each denomination holds one truth more fully than others. This is really an grotesque view as we have often encountered. The Christian faith, it seems, resembles patterns which are so big that it takes two, or indeed a dozen, men to display them. We remember a story of a school where the boys were in the habit of repeating the Creed in a certain order; a strange stranger coming one day found that a most important article of faith was omitted, and on inquiring the reason was told, “Please, sir, the boy who believes in that Person isn't here to-day.” On the same principle Dr. Smith appears to think that by putting together, say, a Baptist, an Independent, a Presbyterian, a Samaritanian, and a Quaker, you may get a complete system of dogmatic belief. There is one obvious difficulty. It is frequently proposed to aim at the attainment of unity by believing only that part of the Christian dogma which is common to all sects; but nobody ever before proposed to attain it by combining all their distinctive tenets—and for the obvious reason that the tenets are apt to be contradictory. One cannot believe at the same time that infant baptism is of Divine authority and that it is a human corruption. However, Dr. Payne Smith may, for aught we know, have explained himself in some more intelligible manner.

The second Resolution, proposed by a Wesleyan, was that, as “the second condition of national morals” was the acceptance of a “higher law of life,” the Christian Churches were bound to unite for the “creation of a science of Christian morals.” A Presbyterian then moved that “all Catholic Churchmen” ought to “concert operations.” A Baptist moved that the principles of “systematic beneficence” ought to be recognized by Christian Churches in the “dispensation of their wealth.” This was the “fourth condition of national morals”; and the last speaker, an Independent, then moved that, as “the highest and finest condition of national morals” was the influence of divine grace, the Churches ought to “unite their supplications, as well as their counsels and operations.” The meeting here separated, apparently under the conviction that it had been doing something for the promotion of Christianity and civilization.

We confess that our own state of mind is pretty much what it was upon first reading the title of this singular League—one, namely, of profound bewilderment. The Resolutions have that terrible flow of language which is probably used in the vain hope of concealing from those who speak, as much as from those who hear, that they really don't themselves know what they would be at. So far as the meeting indicates a vague but amiable desire for the conciliation of hostile sects, we have not a word to say against it; but we should like to ask the Dean of Canterbury and his more sensible supporters whether they really believe that they are likely to promote anything beyond a preposterous growth of platitudes. Some modern Leagues have been found very useful in influencing the votes of the House of Commons; and there were Leagues in old times that have left their mark upon history. But nothing more ludicrous has often entered into the minds of men than the notion of using the modern League—the machinery, that is, for getting a number of popular speakers on to a platform and evoking “loud cheers”—in order to do the work of the old Leagues, which rested on the enthusiastic devotion of zealots or fanatics, eager to force a new ideal upon the world. Dr. Payne Smith has before him a task from which the old Covenanters, or the followers of Ignatius Loyola, might have shrunk in dismay; and he proposes to accomplish it by inducing a number of dissenting ministers and Evangelical clergymen to indulge in periodical speech-making. It is possible, indeed, that he really expects nothing more than to promote a few friendly meetings between Churchmen and Dissenters. If so, the language of the Resolutions is of an amazingly “mouth-filling” order. What, for example, does the League mean by proposing that Christian Churches should unite to form a “Science of Christian Morals”? We were always under the impression that it was the special boast of Christian advocates that our religion provided a perfect system of morality, enforced by the highest sanctions, and absolutely free from impurity. What is it that the Christian Churches are invited to do? Are they to add a new set of laws to the existing code, or are they to discuss questions as to the rival claims of intuitive and utilitarian systems of ethics? The Resolution states that the “higher law of life is only possible to be accepted after it has been discussed and formulated by the best minds in all parts of the Church.” What does this mean? Cannot we decide that it is our duty to love our neighbour until the propriety of such a course has been discussed by Dr. Payne Smith and the Rev. Dr. Fraser? Are we not to accept the “higher law” till a Resolution has been passed in its favour at some Council elected by the Evangelical Churches—whatever they may be? Even if such a Council should come to some conclusion on the subject, if ninety-nine of the members were in favour of one theory and one of another, what possible authority would such a decision possess? Should we know anything more about the question than we knew before, or would any sensible man be in the smallest degree biased in his opinions? When it is stated that it is not possible to accept the “higher law” till it has been “formulated” by the best minds, what are we to think of our unfortunate ancestors, or indeed of ourselves, who live before the formulation has been accomplished? Have not they and we accepted some law, and are we fools for having done so prematurely? Ought we to go on until the said formulation on the hypothesis that these-called Christian duties are all open questions? A set of equally puzzling questions arises when we go to the other Resolutions. Christians, it is said, are to pray for grace; they are to dispend their wealth on principles of systematic beneficence; they are to concert operations, as such concert is quite consistent with their independent existence. This is all very well; but surely we don't want an Association to tell us that prayer for Divine assistance is a Christian duty, or that Christians are bound to be careful as to the employment of their property. Again, the third Resolution asserts what is obviously not the fact. Concert in operations implies a certain surrender of independence. If A and B promise to follow the same path, one of them, or both, must give way more or less to the will of the other. If, however, we admit that different Churches may be wisely employed in combating the common enemy rather than competing with each other, it may be quite true, but the obvious moral is that Churches ought to unite. That is the one radical remedy for discord, and so long as there are sects there will be sectarian animosity, even though fifty Deans of Canterbury were to preach the necessity of union.

We will venture to put the true state of the case, as it appears to us, a little more simply. A certain number of persons who call themselves Evangelicals have remarked that other parts of the Church have derived strength by expressing the growing desire for unity. They wish to make use of the same cry. They find it difficult to do so, because they are split up into a number of fragments. However, they fancy that they can provide some new kind of cement by the modern machinery of public meetings. In order to have something to say, they talk a number of those platitudes on which everybody can agree, because they mean nothing, and which have a quasi-philosophical air because they are composed of such very big words. But, in truth, they either ought to propose that the Association shall supplant the Christian Church as hitherto understood, or to admit that the Christian Church supplies all that they ask without any need of spouting or platforms. To do them justice, some of the persons present seem to have come to this conclusion. A conference was held after the meeting, and the Secretary explained that there was at present "no ascertained standard of morals in the Church." Hereupon Dr. Fraser asked, very pertinently, what they had been doing during the last 1,800 years? The Secretary replied that the Church had been all that time "neglecting the gravest duty of its existence"—which is a conclusion hardly likely to be accepted by many Deans, or indeed by many Christians. Even if the statement is true, we cannot but doubt whether Dr. Payne Smith's Association is likely to do better than the Christian Church. We feel some sympathy with a Mr. Barber, who remarked that, though he had been listening all the evening, he confessed himself utterly unable to understand how it was intended to work the Society. We fear that we cannot help him.

POLITICAL ALCOHOLISM.

IT is admitted that Mr. Gladstone's majority has been for some time declining both in numbers and enthusiasm, and there has been a good deal of curious, though somewhat superfluous, speculation as to the cause of this phenomenon. Mr. Gladstone himself has referred it to a fixed law of nature. All large majorities, he assures us, decline after a year or two, and the wonder is, not that his majority should have begun to fall off, but that this should not have happened sooner and more rapidly; his is, in fact, the first Liberal Government which has subsisted for three years with a large majority. This was perhaps the most cheerful view that could be taken under the circumstances. If a large majority is fatal to the longevity of Ministries, it is a fault which is continually being mended in the case of the present Administration. The objection to the theory is that it is not historically exact. Lord Melbourne's second Government had, if not a large, at least a sufficient majority, and existed for six years; and Lord Palmerston, with the exception of the brief interregnum of Lord Derby's Government, was in office from 1855 down to his death at the end of 1865. It is somewhat singular that Mr. Gladstone should have overlooked in his historical retrospect the existence of two Administrations which not only upset the theory of his defence, but help by the force of contrast to suggest a very obvious and simple explanation of the present condition of the Liberal party. Mr. Gladstone's plight is no doubt due to a fixed law of nature; but not to the imaginary law which he invented for the occasion. The reason of the decay of his majority is to be found, not in its inconvenient largeness, but in the reckless and exhausting uses to which it has been applied. Mr. Gladstone insisted on putting the country through a course of treatment which involved much excitement and exaltation of spirit, and he must not wonder if the natural and inevitable period of reaction arrives at last. It is perhaps a legitimate boast that a great deal has been accomplished in three years, and that it could not have been accomplished by any other treatment than that which Mr. Gladstone has pursued. Without stopping to inquire whether there was any necessity for pressing the pace in this manner, and whether the same results could not have been obtained more safely and effectually by less violent means, it may be remarked that in any case the process was exhausting, and that its consequences ought to have been foreseen. Mr. Gladstone chose to adopt a line of policy which could only be carried out by the profuse administration of political stimulants, and it is not surprising that there should at length be a general protest against the continuance of so dangerous a system. Alcoholism may have its uses in politics as in medicine, but it constitutes a perilous and pernicious diet; and there is a general impression that it has already been carried somewhat too far. Borrowing the language of the recent Medical Declaration, it may be said that the inconsiderate prescription of political stimulants has given rise, in many instances, to the formation of intemperate habits (of which painful examples are to be found in the violent language and revolutionary proposals of the more advanced section of the Liberal party); and that it is desirable that political leaders should exert their utmost influence to inculcate habits of great moderation in the use of exciting appeals to popular sentiment and passion.

A craving for political excitement, accompanied by a certain languor and depression, is the natural result of the course of treatment to which the country has been subjected. The divisions which exist in the Liberal party represent on the one hand the sulky irritation of those who have acquired a confirmed appetite for the drams to which they have lately been accustomed, and who resent the threatened withdrawal of them, and, on the other hand, the alarm which is entertained by more sober and steady politicians lest the administration of stimulants should settle down into a regular habit. A wise physician considers not only how he can most quickly cure disease, but what will be the subsequent effect of different methods of treatment on the constitution of his patient. Violent measures may be necessary on an emergency, but they should be followed by sedatives and repose. It may also happen that a doctor who, from his daring and determination in the use of heroic remedies, is especially serviceable at the critical moment of a desperate disorder, is not the best man to do the work of the ordinary family attendant, and to deal with the small ailments of everyday life. A weakness for heroic treatment is apt to become a dangerous passion. It has happened more than once that a skilful surgeon has been suspected of a predilection for amputation, just as a "daring pilot in extremity" has been accused of whistling for a wind:—

Pleased with the danger, when the waves went high
He sought the storm; but, for a calm unfit,
Would steer too nigh the sands to boast his wit.

A bigoted faith in uniformity of practice is a familiar form of political delusion. It is dogmatically assumed that there can be only one good system of government, only one good type of statesmanship, and that what is good once is good for ever and always. In point of fact, the excellence of a particular form of government, or of a particular school of statesmanship, depends altogether on the circumstances of the time, and what is good at one season may be almost necessarily bad at another. Nothing can be more absurd than the notion that gratitude for political services of a peculiar kind binds a country to submit, under altogether different circumstances, to the administration of a statesman whose temperament and modes of action, however valuable previously, are quite unsuited to the new condition of affairs. Most people have had experience, at one time or another, of the utility of a prompt and stringent blister, but only a lunatic would think it a good idea to wear a blister habitually as part of his everyday apparel because it had once done him good when he was threatened with bronchitis. Mr. Gladstone's Irish policy was unquestionably a great achievement, and it is natural that his admirers should point to it as a proof of his capacity for rousing public opinion, and carrying the country along with him in a great scheme of legislation which was to regenerate the world and put an end to all discord and unpleasantness. Mr. Gladstone's powers in this way will be readily acknowledged, and it may even be admitted that there are perhaps occasions when a great effort cannot be made without recourse to stimulants. At the same time it is desirable that the inevitable consequences of this kind of excitement should be distinctly recognized. When the fit is off, qualms follow, and there is a tendency to recur to the dose on the slightest provocation.

There are moments in the life of a nation, as of an individual, when the heroic treatment may be appropriate and necessary; but, as a rule, something simpler and involving less strain on the nerves, less excitement at the time, and consequently less reaction afterwards, is more suitable to the ordinary course of affairs. It is the source at once of Mr. Gladstone's strength and weakness that he has always a tremendous reason for the most ordinary bit of business. Of course it is a very good thing that the national debt should be kept down as far as possible; and there are a great many commonplace reasons, which are nevertheless very important, why this should be done, as, for example, that it keeps up our credit, and maintains a sound financial equilibrium. But when Mr. Gladstone a few years ago had a proposal of this kind to make, he was quite above such trivial observations. He discovered that in a few years all our coal would be used up, and it was indispensable that we should make a desperate effort to pay off the debt before the chief source of our wealth was exhausted. Again, there was a good deal to be said in favour of disestablishing the Irish Church and clearing up the muddle into which the land question had fallen, so as to give landlords and tenants a fresh start, with a clearer view of their relations to each other; only, of course, when these questions were looked at in a plain matter-of-fact way, doubts and difficulties sprang up, and it was by no means certain that mischief would not be done by meddling with them rashly and precipitately. Mr. Gladstone's fervid rhetoric supplied the dram which dissipates scruples and inspires the mind with passionate resolution. It was proclaimed that the business on hand was not a piece of ordinary legislation, but a message of peace to Ireland, and the sealing of a bond of fraternal love and harmony for the rest of time. Human nature was to become something quite different from what it was before, and Heaven and earth were to come together in a way which would anticipate the Millennium. The play has not exactly fulfilled the promises of the bill, and it is not surprising that there should be some disappointment in consequence. If the thing had been done soberly and quietly it might perhaps have taken more time, but future difficulties would not have been created by a discrepancy between visionary expectations and small practical results. More would have been thought of the mouse if there had been no fevered dream of a brood of lions. There is a variation of Lord Melbourne's "Can't you let it alone?" which Lord Derby, following Lord Palmerston, seems disposed to adopt, and it is this—You had better let matters alone unless you feel quite sure that you will do good by meddling with them; do not meddle more than is necessary, and do not expect too much from anything you do. Of course this is not the mood in which heroic things are done, but it happens to be the mood of the country at the present moment. Heroic legislation is on its trial, and before we have any more of it, it will be as well that we should wait and see what comes of it. The history of the Wexford estates, for example, during the next few years will throw a good deal of light on the working of the Land Act, and the new relations which have been established between the Government and the tenants who have bought the estates at apparently extravagant prices. A study of the party politics of the last few years shows that the alcoholism has not been exclusively on one side. There is now, however, a strong desire throughout the country that habits of political temperance should be cultivated. It is especially important that legislation on social matters which may in any degree infringe on the liberty of individuals and the freedom of private contract should, to quote again from the doctors' Declaration on a kindred subject, "be so framed as not to be interpreted as a sanction for excess, or necessarily for the continuance of its use when the occasion is past."

NEWSPAPER COMMENTS ON LEGAL PROCEEDINGS.

THERE seems to be a disposition on the part of some of the newspapers to resent, and even to repudiate, the well-known rule against the discussion of questions which have been submitted to the judgment of a Court of law. In theory, the right to publish reports of trials is still exercised on sufferance. The Judges are held to be supreme and absolute in their respective Courts, and it is assumed that they have power at any time to prohibit the publication of reports, just as they have the power to exclude the public and to sit in private if they see fit. Practically, of course, the press is at liberty to report judicial proceedings as fully as it pleases, provided only that the reports are fair and accurate, and that they do not embody comments on pending questions. It is now contended that the right of reporting ought not to be even nominally a matter of sufferance, and that it ought to carry with it the further right to comment freely on the course of the proceedings. The Judges of a previous generation would probably be even more amazed than shocked and horrified to find a Conservative journalist demanding such untrammelled freedom, or, as they would consider it, license, for "the free press of a free State"; but we are afraid that it would only strengthen their conviction of the dangerous tendency of the concessions which were gradually obtained from them. It does not follow that, because the Judges were in the wrong in attempting to suppress reports of trials, the newspapers should now be allowed to say anything they please in regard to what passes in the Courts of law. It is evident that the Tichborne case has been a sore trial to the patience of some of our contemporaries. They have suffered the agonies of Tantalus in the brimming wave which mocked his thirst. For months they have been, as it were, half buried in materials for the most thrilling articles, and yet have been debarred from turning their riches to account by fear of punishment for contempt of Court. An occasional attempt has been made to deal with the subject in a side way, but this indulgence has only sharpened the appetite which it failed to satisfy, and has imparted a more acute sense of the vexatious restraints of the law. If the trial had chanced to take place in America, the claimant, defendant, counsel, witnesses, and probably even the Judge and jury, would have been repeatedly interviewed, and every phase of the case would have been sharply and unreservedly discussed in the newspapers. Perhaps it will not be very long before our own cheap press indulges in a similar license. It is apparently only the fear of the Judges which now keeps it in check, and already the exportment has been tried of dealing with criminal trials in a way which we imagine would not be permitted in a civil case. Not content with reporting in the usual manner the trials for murder which have just taken place at the Old Bailey, some of the morning journals have published at the same time a highly coloured description of the appearance of the prisoners and the Court, interspersed with free comments on the tactics of counsel and the value of the evidence as each case was unfolded. One of the counsel is complimented on his "dignified presence and deep impassioned voice," another on his "calm, lucid, and judicial" style of addressing the Court. It may be presumed that if the reporter happened not to be satisfied with the looks or behaviour of the bar, he would consider himself equally at liberty to express his opinion. It is not desirable that the advocates who have to prosecute or defend prisoners should be encouraged to regard themselves, or should permit it to be supposed that they regard themselves, as performers seeking popular applause. A dignified presence has not been vouchsafed to all even of the leading counsel at the Old Bailey, nor is the sort of oratory which is heard there invariably calm, lucid, and judicial. If a protest is to be made against personal criticism of this kind, perhaps it had better be made while the penny-a-liners are trying it on, for a beginning, in a complimentary vein. If counsel are to be puffed in the papers, they may perhaps expect, as the next step, to be applauded or hissed in Court. The question whether a barrister conducts his case judiciously obviously involves an opinion as to the merits of the case itself. To say, for example, as one of the newspapers did this week while a case was in progress, that Serjeant A., "with the skill of a practised advocate, glided over" certain parts of the evidence, is as much as to say that this evidence was damaging to his client. It is difficult to imagine anything more injurious to the judicial temper of our Courts, of which we have hitherto had so much reason to be proud, than that the conduct of an important case should from day to day be made the subject of loose criticism by ignorant and irresponsible writers, who are chiefly anxious to produce smart sensational articles, and to administer "eye-openers" to their readers.

One of the reporters who have this week been sent by their employers to do the Old Bailey, remarks, with apparent regret, that, if English trials were conducted, as no doubt he thinks they ought to be, "with a view to sensational effects," the case for the prosecution against Mr. Watson would have concluded with the production of the box in which it is supposed that he had intended to conceal the body of his wife. There are indeed a great many effects of this kind which might be introduced. Why should not the body itself be exhibited, or, at least, a wax model of it? A hint might be taken from the Alsatian piece which is just now being performed at one of the theatres; and, if the accused could not be brought, under the influence of mesmerism, to re-enact the incidents of his crime, the counsel for the prosecution might give their version of it with histrionic vividness. The reporter from whom we have just quoted appears also to have been greatly disappointed that Serjeant Ballantine in another case addressed the jury "with a total absence of gesticulation." If the Serjeant wishes to stand well with these critics, he should lose no time in putting himself in the hands of Mr. Toole or Mr. Irving, and must take more pains with his gesticulation in future. It is lamentable to think of the opportunities for dramatic display which are at present thrown away by a perverse adherence to old traditions of professional dignity and self-respect. A few months since, an American lawyer shot himself in Court with a revolver with which he was illustrating an incident of the case; and not long since, at a trial in Brussels, the carcass of a sheep was produced to show the effects of gunshot wounds, while an expert in firearms went through an interesting performance illustrative of various forms of suicide and assassination. It may be admitted that at present our system of judicial procedure falls very far short of the melodramatic ideal which would satisfy the penny-a-liner. One result of getting up trials with an eye to striking effects would perhaps be to remove the difficulty which is sometimes experienced in procuring jurymen. A place in the jury-box, instead of being dreaded and shunned as at present, would become an object of keen competition. The only danger would be that, if trials were made too attractive, enthusiasts who found it difficult to obtain admission in any other way might be tempted into criminal courses for the sake of a good front seat when their own case came on. In the meantime, if the trials as they actually take place are tame and formal, the reporters do their best to atone for these deficiencies. The writers who are employed on this kind of work appear to have graduated in the "penny awful" school of fiction, and it may be admitted that their romances of the Old Bailey are quite as thrilling as Ada the Betrayed or Sixteen-String Jack. On the first day of what is called the Brighton Poisoning Case, Miss Edmunds sat for her portrait to a couple of these accomplished artists, or rather we should say the artists painted her portrait in their peculiar style, though whether from life or imagination it is impossible to tell. It is quite clear that one at least of the pictures must have a good deal of imagination in it, since they are quite dissimilar. In one, Miss Edmunds is presented as a careworn, hard-featured woman of thirty-five, "plain, decidedly plain"; in the other, as "young, bright, and not uncommonly." It is an old-fashioned principle of English justice that an accused person should be deemed innocent until proved to be guilty. The reporter who resented Miss Edmunds's plainness seems to have been troubled by no qualms of this kind. He read her guilt in the expression of her countenance; a summary process of judicial inquiry which, if it had been followed by the Court, might have saved a good deal of time, trouble, and expense. Occasionally, we are told, the prisoner "smiled a saturnine smile." It is in the lower features of her face that her character appeared to the writer to be most conspicuous, and the various features are minutely noted, in the form of an indictment—profile, irregular; upper lip, long and convex; chin, straight, long, and cruel; lower jaw, heavy, massive, and animal in its development; lips, loose and pendulous, and so on. The left side of the mouth, it is added, twists up with a sardonic, defiant determination. We have no doubt that there are people who relish this sort of trash, but it is strange that a journal with any pretensions to respectability should stoop to pandar to such morbid and disgusting tastes. It must be remembered that this description of a prisoner on trial for her life was published during the progress of the case, and it is difficult to understand what comes of the rule against comments on pending questions if a journalist is allowed to excite prejudice against an accused person by depicting her as cruel, brutal, and sardonic, with just the sort of features and expression which one might expect to find in a woman who had committed the crime imputed to her. It is quite certain that if anything approaching to this had been said of either of the parties in a civil case, the Judge would at once have punished the offender; and it is difficult to understand why a rule which is deemed of so much importance in civil cases should be infringed with impunity in criminal cases.

It would be absurd, of course, to argue that judicial proceedings should be wholly withdrawn from public comment; but it appears to be not unreasonable that comments should be forbidden on cases which are actually pending before the Courts of law. Neither Judges nor juries are infallible, and they are all the better for knowing that the manner in which they discharge their duties will be closely scanned and frankly criticized; but criticism should at least be reserved until the case to which it applies has been finally concluded. A very good example of the confusion of mind which prevails on this subject is to be found in an article contending for the absolute freedom of the press to discuss matters which are under litigation. The writer quotes Lord Hatherley's statement of the principle, when Vice-Chancellor, that "the rules which have been laid down as to fair comments on matters of public interest and notoriety do not extend to comments on matters still pending, waiting for argument and decision, which have a direct tendency towards directing and swaying the mind of the Court or jury by whom the case is to be determined." But, asks the writer, do not the speeches of counsel, the evidence of witnesses, and the remarks which are thrown in by the Judge tend to "sway the mind" of those who read the reports in the papers, and why should "a hard and fast line be drawn between what witnesses and advocates may say, and what journalists may write?" The answer to this question is so obvious that we are surprised the writer should have failed to see it. The reason why a line is drawn between the public writers and the persons who are engaged in a judicial inquiry is simply that the latter are bound by certain strict rules of procedure, while the former are not. An advocate who makes an assertion in Court is required to produce evidence in support of it. The witnesses have the fear of cross-examination before their eyes, and give evidence under the solemn responsibility of an oath. It is the Judge's constant care, in which he is of course assisted by the counsel on either side, to prevent the admission of improper evidence. But an anonymous writer in a newspaper is under no such responsibilities; he may say anything he pleases, and though what he says may not be strictly untrue, it may, from the manner in which it is worded, convey a false impression, or may embody testimony which would be rejected in a Court of law. It is assumed that the counsel on each side will do their best for the interests of their respective clients, and that the Judge is capable of preserving the discipline of the Court; and it requires very little reflection to see that judicial proceedings could not be satisfactorily conducted on any other system. The absolute control of the Court over the whole course of the proceedings is indispensable; and it is quite clear that journalists are not under the same restraint as witnesses and counsel. A sound and necessary rule may be unwisely over-strained, or under exceptional circumstances may be wisely suspended; but it would perhaps be for the public advantage if the Judges, instead of relaxing their right to punish for contempt of Court, exercised it more strictly and consistently, by applying it to criminal as well as civil cases.

FAMOUS PREACHERS.

THERE are various methods by which the "bubble reputation" is sought and obtained, and in the present day the preacher's mouth is certainly a commoner, if a less illustrious, source of fame than the cannon's. That there are preachers, both English and foreign, who as fully deserve their reputation in the nineteenth century as the "golden-mouthed" Chrysostom did in the fourth, we are very far from denying; and we doubt not that the results of their zeal and eloquence are equally beneficial, though congregations at St. Paul's or Notre-Dame do not clap their most telling periods, as St. Chrysostom and St. Cyril were applauded, though by no means invariably obeyed, by their enraptured hearers at Antioch, Alexandria, and Constantinople. It is, indeed, curious to observe how close is the similarity, in points of detail, between ancient and modern preaching, though the stricter decorum of our own day has banished, at least in the Church of England, all outward demonstrations of approval from the sacred walls. Then, as now, the sermon was sometimes delivered from the altar steps, sometimes from the ambo or pulpit; then, as now, shorthand-writers eagerly employed themselves in taking down notes of the discourses of famous preachers, so that St. Gregory of Nazianzus especially addresses them in his farewell sermon at Constantinople, and at a later date Claudentius of Braccia complained of their transcribing him inaccurately. Then too, as now, sermons were sometimes, though rarely, read off entirely from notes or manuscript, as is so common in England, or committed to memory, like those of Bourdaloue, Massillon, and the great French preachers generally; sometimes delivered partly extempore, according to a plan previously prepared; and sometimes altogether extempore. Thus

St. Augustine tells us that his choice of subjects was occasionally suggested by the passage of Scripture which the lector had been reading, and St. Chrysostom speaks of something he witnessed on the way to church, or which occurred during divine service, suggesting the theme of his discourse, as when the lighting of lamps during his sermon had drawn off the attention of his audience. Very likely we might be able to trace an analogy in another respect also, if our means of information about those remote ages were as full as those supplied by the more various and voluminous literature of the present day. But, as a matter of fact, only the discourses of really distinguished writers have come down to us, and there are no journals or biographies, or serials and newspapers, of the patristic era to enlighten us on the popular taste in the matter. But we know that even apostles anticipated the snare of "itching ears," and it is more than probable that popular preachers often won as cheap a reputation among the early Christians as among their descendants.

How that reputation is sometimes acquired in our own day is to most educated men an insoluble enigma. That there are preachers who really deserve it we have already admitted, and there are some, it may be added, who deserve much more of it than they obtain; but it is not with these that we are concerned just now. Of all the forms of literary or quasi-literary charlatanism, it is hardly too much to say that there is none so conspicuous as that of the pulpit charlatan. If it has passed into a proverb, quantuli sapientul regitur mundus, we might with equal truth observe, quantuli eloquentul delectatur mundus, where, moreover, mundus does not stand only for what is somewhat euphemistically described as "the religious world." In the latter case, the problem is not so difficult to explain. To a large section of religionists, "preaching the Gospel" is the one great ordinance of Christianity, to the exclusion of prayer, sacraments, and perhaps some other things besides. And, as the late Dean Gaisford is reported to have spoken from the University pulpit of "taking into our favourable consideration the minor facts of the Gospel narrative," it is only natural that persons whose one criterion of piety is the hearing of sermons should be willing to take into their favourable consideration the minor graces of the preacher who exerts so critical an influence on what they term their "eternal prospects." It is both pleasanter and more amiable to believe that where the style is so obvious and so important there is a flavour of the duode mixed with it. And hence, to a preacher who has hit on the true standard of Evangelical orthodoxy much is both credited and forgiven. There is a story told of a candidate for ordination who, having displayed in his examination papers a blank ignorance of the first rudiments of theology, was seriously rebuked by the Bishop for presuming to undertake the instruction of others in subjects of which he knew so little, and was asked how he proposed to preach? The youthful aspirant, who was an Irishman, promptly replied, "Ah, my Lord, nothing can be easier: I guess I'm the boy to preach the saving truth of justification by faith." And it is extremely likely that if he had not very properly been refused ordination, his augury would have been justified by success. Another story, said to emanate from one of the most distinguished prelates on the Bench, has a similar bearing. He had set an ordination candidate to preach in his private chapel before himself and his chaplain. The preacher, whose conception of the duties of his office was, like his Irish brother's, a very definite and somewhat narrow one, began at once by dividing his hearers into the converted and the unconverted. "Stop there," said the Bishop; "in which class do you place me?" Nevertheless, commencing with this not very reconcilable classification is to many persons, like the blessed word Memento, very full of consolation, if it is not indeed a decisive criterion of a good or bad discourse. The orthodox twang is with many persons—especially if accompanied with a loud voice in the case of the uneducated, who are always apt to be deaf—the one secret of eloquence. "Dear Mr. Spotsaway," as the old woman remarked lovingly, "he goes to my heart; he goes through me." And thus we may set down the preacher's agreement with the theological views of his hearers, particularly when those views are Evangelical, as one of the royal roads to reputation. It is always pleasant to have your own "doxy" emphatically endorsed by a person who speaks with authority, and not less so when the sanction includes a sweeping condemnation of your neighbour's "doxy" for time and eternity. Still there are preachers and preachers even among the orthodox, and this is not the whole account of the matter.

The Times is often full at the silly season with piteous complaints of the dulness and prolixity of sermons. And yet, considering that there is no Act of Parliament, nor even any rule of the Church, except for the unconfirmed, to compel people to hear them, it is wonderful how few of the complainants ever dream of taking the remedy into their own hands. No doubt the devout female sex preponderates largely in many congregations, and there are preachers of the Rev. Charles Hemyman type who are at least as much indebted for their acceptable ministry to the skill of the hairdresser and glover as to their own. Still this large-hearted tolerance, and more than tolerance, for the students of the pulpit is by no means confined to devotees in pinstripes. The long list of preachers published every Saturday in the daily papers must, we suppose, be regulated by the law of supply and demand, yet certainly not a tithe of the names which ordinarily appear can make the slightest pretension to distinction of any kind; and the same remark applies to the copious reports of sermons which on certain occasions, as, for instance, at Christmas, overflow columns after columns of the newspapers. It is a dreary task to pick the needles out of the bundle of hay. What, then, is the secret of attraction? Often, no doubt, that the successful orator is tickled, for the fragrance of the pulpit, unlike the fragrance of the room, is by no means independent of nonpareils. Just as one man may steal a horse while another is condemned for looking over a hedge, so a titled talker of the voracious twaddle may have crowds hanging on his pompous platitudes, each one of them as ready to swear to his eloquence as each of the five hundred spectators to swear that the monumental lion wagged its tail, while his less fortunate brother may discourse with the tongue of angels to empty benches. When a man is a "Right Reverend," or a Monsignore, or even a Dean, not only does the mystical prefix cover a multitude of indubitable sins, but create a multitude of wholly non-existent virtues. Perhaps he has been lucky enough for some popular writer to have blown his trumpet, for some noble patron to have smiled upon him, or for him to have some connexion, real or supposed, with the aristocracy, and his fame is made. His fluent nothings are words of wisdom, and a sonorous voice reveals the music of eloquence in its loud metallic ring. Fama volat, and each fresh hearer swells the chorus of laudation; vires acquirit eundo. There are those of course who detect the imposture, but they hardly dare whisper the discovery under their breath. Not to every one is given the nerve of the Evangelical spinster who observed sorrowfully, when the preacher she had been listening to with rapture turned to the East for the ascription of glory at the end of his sermon, "I thought he had the gift of the Spirit, but alas, he has only the gift of the gab." And so strong is the pressure of public opinion, or rather of vulgar error, that most people dare not even in thought rebel against it. Not to know the merits of the spoiled darling of the elect, who are also the élite—one of the chosen band advertised every Saturday in the Times, who adapt the gospel to the aristocracy—is to argue yourself unknown. It is safer to follow a multitude than to brave its frown. Populus vult decipi, and therefore decipiat. We know how fixed epithets, inseparable as "rosy-fingered morn," have become attached to great names in theological literature. There is the "judicious" Hooker, the "imaginative" Taylor, the "brilliant" Hall, the "honest old" Burnet, the "profound learning" of Barrow, the "strong sense" of South, the "keen logic" of Chillingworth, and the like. It would not be more difficult to upset any of these established reputations than to dethrone a preacher who has once, by the caprice of fortune, been set up on his pedestal till the cultus of some newer idol consigns him to oblivion.

Meanwhile an anecdote, the authenticity of which we can guarantee, may serve to illustrate the critical value of newspaper encomiums on the pulpit, which are probably compiled much in the manner that schoolboys write—or in the good old days used to write—their Latin verses with the aid of the Gradus ad Parnassum. A certain popular preacher had been advertised to appear on an important occasion, but, as it turned out, he was called elsewhere at the last moment, and the intended sermon was not delivered. Eloquent it might, or might not, have been if it had been preached, but, like the old speculation on what would have happened if Abraham had really killed his son, the question must for ever remain unsolved. However, next day a long account of the service at which the distinguished preacher was to have discoursed appeared in the newspapers, in which he was stated to have "delivered a most eloquent sermon." Laudari à laudato viro may be a justifiable ground of satisfaction, but to be praised for your eloquence by those who have never heard it can only gratify a very voracious appetite for applause. And the misfortune is that, while income is so freely offered to many who do not deserve it, there are preachers not mute, but inglorious, whose eloquence is wasted for want of the notes sacer. The fact is, that a really good sermon is neither an easy nor a very common achievement, and they are comparatively few who appreciate it. To reflect with blind fidelity the prevalent tone of religious sentiment, and elaborate a theology which is the merest microcosm of prevalent beliefs in your own particular circle, to display a gift of tongues not exactly Pentecostal, but which enables you to speak to all men—and more particularly to all women—in a language which they think they understand, these are the graces, combined with a faultless attire, a serene self-possession, and a, let us say, seraphic smile, which ensure success. Originality of thought and genuine power of speech are essential ingredients of eloquence, but not of the average eloquence of the pulpit.

MR. HARCOURT ON ENGLISH HISTORY.

REFERENCE has been made by Mr. Vernon Harcourt to the failure of the First Napoleon's attempt to invade England, in order to show that apprehension of future invasion is unreasonable. It is quite true, as Mr. Harcourt says, that Napoleon abandoned this attempt in 1805, and it is also true that, having marched his army in September of that year from Boulogne to Ulm and Austerlitz, he did not march it back again. But if Mr. Harcourt advises this country to incur deliberately the danger in which it was unvoluntarily exposed in 1805, we can only say that his study of English history has led him to a strange conclusion. By great fortune meeting the patriotic devotion of his country, this country escaped once from the imminent peril of invasion, and we are inclined to believe that it will escape always. Napoleon, when he planned his attack, was able to dispose of the naval power both of France and Spain. He had one French fleet in Toulon and another in Brest, and the Spanish fleet lay in Cadix, Ferrol, and Carthage. He ordered the Toulon fleet to put to sea, join the Spanish squadron at Cadix, and then sail to the West Indies. He hoped that Nelson, who commanded the English fleet in the Mediterranean, might be drawn after the combined fleet; and if its commander could give Nelson the slip, and return before him to Europe, he might join the other French fleet in Brest, overpower the Channel fleet of England, and give to Napoleon the "quinze jours" which, as he said, was all he wanted for his invasion. This plan did up to a certain point succeed, and it is difficult to believe that under a more vigorous commander it might not have succeeded further. The Franco-Spanish fleet did get back to Europe before Nelson. It fell in with an English fleet under Sir Robert Calder, fought an indecisive action, and put into the Spanish port of Ferrol, instead of attempting to fulfil Napoleon's design by appearing in the English Channel. Hereupon Napoleon laid aside his plan for that year, and marched away his army. Even if the French Admiral had acted with more resolution, Nelson was not very far behind him, and it is probable that Cornwallis, who commanded the English fleet off Brest, could, with the help of Calder, have resisted the utmost power of the Franco-Spaniards until Nelson came to his assistance. The truth is that the combined fleet would have been unmanageably numerous, while the English would have compensated for inferiority in strength by unity of command and superior naval skill.

But let any reader exercise his imagination upon the condition of England while Napoleon was waiting at Boulogne for his "quinze jours." For many weeks uncertainty had prevailed as to the position of the Franco-Spanish fleet, and of Nelson who had gone in pursuit of it from Gibraltar to the West Indies. The Channel fleet under Cornwallis was keeping its usual station off Brest, where one French fleet was lying ready to come out as soon as another French fleet and a Spanish fleet should appear to help it. Mr. Harcourt says that the fleet of England, compared with the fleets of Europe that might be combined against it, is stronger now than it was when it sufficed to baffle the calculations of Napoleon. Even if this assertion were true, the situation of affairs in August 1805 was in the highest degree critical; but it is not true. At that time we had proved by twelve years of almost uninterrupted warfare what ourselves and our various enemies could do upon the sea, whereas at present nothing can be predicted of the result of a naval engagement, except that it would in all probability be speedily and heavily destructive. Even before the battle of Trafalgar this country had reached a height of maritime power which it may or may not ever attain again, but from which it certainly is very distant now. The enthusiasm of the early days of the French Republic, which manned the Montagne and the Jacobin, had yielded to the steady courage of British sailors under Lord Howe. The obstinate valour of the Dutch could not prevent their obliteration as a naval power by Duncan. The Spaniards, with their large fleet of lofty ships, were over-matched in seamanship and ready audacity by Jervis, as they had been in bygone time by Drake and Hawkins. Lastly, when Napoleon had disciplined the vehement spirit of revolutionary France, the maritime superiority of England was again and more decisively demonstrated by Nelson at the Nile. Mr. Harcourt seems to forget that, if we went into a naval war now, our Nelson would have to be discovered, and possibly might not be forthcoming upon research. He seems to forget also that, besides the seamen actually in pay for the year which he selects for comparison with a recent year, the ports of England, after all those years of conflict, were full of sailors who had had experience of war, and whose services, if they did not volunteer upon an emergency, a pressing would have made available. Besides, Mr. Harcourt should have remembered that, at the time to which he refers, this country had a reserve of ships of war beyond those in commission, such as it has not now, and, looking at the rapid changes in naval architecture, is unlikely ever to have again. In the year 1805 there were in commission for sea service 83 line-of-battle ships, and in ordinary 33, while the number of ships of the same class for harbour service was 39. It had been proved by twelve years' experience that the loss of any of these ships either by wreck, accidental fire, or hostile force occurred so rarely as to be amply supplied by the new ships which were or ought to have been built. But some of the most powerful of modern ships are suspected to be unseaworthy, and nobody can calculate the destructive force of torpedoes and other contrivances which may be employed in the next naval war. If, however, Mr. Harcourt intends to represent that the condition of the British navy at the period to which he refers was satisfactory, his own authorities would confute him. He recommends the naval estimates of 1802 and 1803 to the attention of the "apostles of panic" of the present time. Let him look into James's Naval History, which he has at hand, and he will find that that trustworthy author, referring to the number of ships that appear in his Annual Abstract as "built" at the beginning of 1805, says:—"Nothing can better demonstrate the exertions made by the new First Lord of the Admiralty (Lord Melville) to recover the British navy from the low state into which it had previously fallen." This, then, was the effect of the economy which Mr. Harcourt now proposes for our imitation. Let us remember what were the efforts by which men made up in those days for the deficiency of material. Cornwallis maintained the blockade of Brest for twenty-two months, including two boisterous winters. Nelson noted in his diary of July 20, 1805, that he had not quitted his flagship until that day for two years wanting ten days. By such exertions of such men was Napoleon barely frustrated of his "quinze jours." We recommend to Mr. Harcourt's particular attention Nelson's own account of his intentions during the last few weeks of his long cruise. "I am thankful," said he, "that the enemy has been driven from the West India Islands with so little loss to our country. I had made up my mind to great sacrifices, for I had determined, notwithstanding his vast superiority, to stop his career, and to put it out of his power to do any further mischief." Because our navy saved the country once from extreme peril, Mr. Harcourt wishes us to assume as prudent men, adopting a permanent line of policy, that it would be certain to do so at any future time. Swift, discoursing on an incident in the Acts of the Apostles, remarked that modern preachers, although inferior to St. Paul in the power of working miracles, did very far surpass him in that of putting people to sleep. We think that Mr. Harcourt is far more capable of lulling the country into false security than of finding the men or measures which would save it from such tremendous peril as it encountered in the nine months preceding the battle of Trafalgar.

It appears improbable that this country will ever again attain even that degree of naval security against invasion which it reached in the beginning of 1805; but our fathers did not think that security sufficient to dispense with preparations for combating invaders upon the soil of England. Peace was made with France in 1802, and war broke out again next year. It may be true, as Mr. Harcourt says, that there were no Volunteers in 1803, but there were half a million a few years later. An organization was gradually created by which an invader might have been successfully encountered; but no such organization exists now, and it is to be feared that invasion would take place, if at all, before it could be created. "We are told," says Mr. Harcourt, "that it is a reasonably safe computation that some Power may throw 100,000 men on our shores when we least expect it." There is no need to go the length of representing this computation as "reasonably safe"; if it is barely possible, that is enough to justify, and indeed demand, every practicable measure of precaution. Consider the enormous accumulation of valuable property in the Southern counties, and the cost of only a few days of successful warfare with an invader in Kent and Sussex. We can only quote once more Lord Overstone's words—"It must never be." Looking at the matter merely as one of commercial prudence, and without regard to national honour, any reasonable rate of insurance ought to be cheerfully paid for the protection of the vast wealth of London. There is, indeed, one method of reducing the estimates of which Mr. Harcourt complains, and if Englishmen would prefer to serve their country in person rather than in purse, a defensive force might be created which would for ever banish from the minds of Continental strategists the notion of a campaign in England. Mr. Harcourt, however, instead of urging timely preparation, chooses to propagate the mischievous delusion that preparation may be made after war has commenced. "When the danger really came, the English people made ready to meet it. . . . There were no Volunteers on foot in 1802; in 1804 there was something like 400,000. As the preparations of Napoleon progressed those of England grew." If there were now in Europe an enemy of England as able and unrelenting as Napoleon was, he would desire nothing better than to see her imitate the example which Mr. Harcourt here produces for her guidance. He would make his preparations quietly, and declare war when they were complete. If Mr. Harcourt imagines that the naval power of England, compared with the rest of Europe, is as great now as in 1803, we think that he must have read very imperfectly the books of history from which he quotes. But, indeed, his own figures suffice for his refutation. He says that the number of line-of-battle ships in commission, which had been 100 in 1801, was reduced to 32 next year. There were, therefore, 64 line-of-battle ships in ordinary which could have been sent to sea as quickly as crews could be found for them on any symptom of hostility being shown by France. And it was known exactly what each of these line-of-battle ships could do, which is more than can be said of the experimental ships of which our fleet now consists.

It pleases Mr. Harcourt to describe Antwerp as "the favourite bugbear of panic-mongers," but it is hardly possible that he can have failed to understand the important part which Antwerp played in the designs of Napoleon against England. Napoleon never abandoned the plan of invading England, but he postponed it to other plans; and he determined when he resumed it to render Antwerp a principal station of his invading fleet. "Nothing certainly," says Mr. James, "could exceed the eligibility of the situation he had selected." The unfortunate expedition to Walcheren in 1809 was undertaken by the British Government in the hope of destroying the fleet and naval establishments which Napoleon had by that time created. The possession of Antwerp by a great military Power would in truth reduce this country to a condition like that under which it existed, and indeed flourished, during the years of Napoleon's prosperity. The country was entitled to have, and had, the fullest confidence in its fleet, but nevertheless it was prepared any day to fight for existence on its own soil. Mr. Harcourt may easily inform himself as to the nature and extent of the preparations which were made to receive a French army in the Southern counties. The anxiety which co-exists with such preparations may have a valuable effect on national character, but it is not comfortable, nor does it facilitate the operations of productive industry. We do not doubt that Mr.

Harcourt is correct in saying that "steam is on the side of the superior naval force." But, looking to the demands of our trade and colonies, and to the possibility of intervention from the other side of the Atlantic in European complications, we have not, and are not likely soon to have, anything like the naval superiority which we had at the beginning of 1805, when this country narrowly escaped invasion. The effect of Mr. Harcourt's speeches and writings on English history will probably be to convince the public that he belongs to a party to which the honour of England cannot be safely trusted.

PISA.

THE changes in the coast-line which on one side of the Italian peninsula in one sense destroyed, in another sense called into being, the renowned city of Ravenna, have on the other side dealt in nearly the same way with the no less renowned city of Pisa. It is hard, perhaps impossible, to see the Adriatic from the tower of St. Apollinaris in Classe, and it is but a faint glimpse of the Tyrrhenian sea which rewards the traveller who climbs the more famous tower of Pisa. It is hard, as we look on that slight streak in the distance, to call up the days, days spreading over a long series of ages, in which the city in which we stand was one of the great havens of Italy, nay, whenever political circumstances allowed, one of the great seafaring powers of the earth. Our first glimpses of the old Etruscan city set her before us as

The proud mart of Pisa,
Queen of the Western waves,
Where ride Masalia's trimmies,
Heavy with fair-haired slaves.

And when the power of the local Rome had passed away, when her Empire had split up again into countless principalities and commonwealths, Pisa again appears, in the new birth of Italy, as one of those great maritime cities which disputed the dominion of the Mediterranean alike with the Saracen rovers of Spain and Africa and with the Cæsars who still held the straits of the Bosphorus and the Hellespont. It is hard to believe that the thoroughly inland city on which we look down was once the rival of Venice and Genoa alike in naval warfare and in naval traffic. But Pisa, unlike Venice and Genoa, depended on a river as the immediate highway for her fleets, and a river is a less trustworthy stay of naval power than either the open sea or the lagoon. The change in the coast doomed Ravenna to final insignificance; but it gave her first a moment of unrivalled greatness. To Pisa it caused a gradual fall from the height of power and glory to the most bitter form of bondage. The rival of Venice and Genoa became the subject city of inland Florence. But there is a cycle in human things. New modes of communication are opened by the discoveries of modern skill, and, as new cities rise, old ones sometimes rise again. Pisa, shorn for ages of her traffic by sea, looks forward, under the development of the Italian railway system, to become one of the great centres of communication by land. She looks to reap at last the reward of her ten years' struggle, and she trusts that this new tide in the affairs of men may again raise her above the city which was once her local tyrant, and to which she has had so long to look up, as first her provincial and then her national capital.

The great architectural works which now form the chief glory of Pisa are closely connected with the early history and the early triumphs of the commonwealth. The great metropolitan church, the noblest pile reared by the native art of Italy, is emphatically a trophy of the warfare to which Pisa owed her ancient glory. The foundations of the mighty Duomo were laid out of treasures won in naval warfare with the Saracen. To take in the position of Pisa in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, the time when the city on the Arno stood forth as a great European Power, we must bear in mind how completely the sea was up to that time the dominion of the two powers whose existence in European history men are apt to forget. The Western Empire and the kingdoms into which it split up were essentially land powers. They were like France under the elder Buonaparte, or like the new German Empire at this moment. Their rulers were lords of the mainland, but they were not lords of the sea, and therefore they were not lords of the islands. The dominion of the Mediterranean was disputed between the Eastern Emperors and the various Saracenic powers which grew out of the division of the Caliphate. The great islands of Sicily and Orete obeyed alternately a Byzantine and a Mahometan master; they paid no homage to Rome, Pavia, or Aachen. It was the maritime commonwealths of Italy which first won for Western Christendom any share in the dominion of the great inland sea. Such at least was the work of Genoa and Pisa; Venice, the outpost of the Eastern Rome, can as yet hardly be looked on as part of Western Christendom. And of the three we can hardly doubt as to giving to Pisa the highest place as a worker for the general interests of Europe. Pisa was in the eleventh century what Venice became long after, the bulwark of Christendom against the Moslem. No power took a more active share in the great crusades against the infidel, and Pisa, unlike Venice, was free from any share in that mock crusade which overthrew the Roman Empire of the East, and paved the way for the coming of the Ottoman into Europe. But Pisa, like the Christians of the far East and of the far West, was already a crusading power before crusades were preached to Western Christendom at large. The maritime commonwealth did what Emperors and Kings had failed to do, and won back the great island of Sardinia from the Saracen. Within that her insular realm Pisa had Judges and even Kings to her vassals, and, when her episcopal church was raised to metropolitan rank, the land which she had won back for Christendom was fittingly made part of the new ecclesiastical province. With the Saracens of Spain, of Africa, and of Sicily the warfare of the Republic was never-ceasing, and it was a warfare in which the Republic had as often to defend its own homes as to invade those of the misbelievers. The alternations of the struggle are well marked in the meagre entries of the national chronicle:—

Anno 1005. "Fuit capta Pisa a Saracenis."
 Anno 1006. "Pisani devicerunt Saracenos ad Regium die Sancti Sixti."
 Anno 1012. "Status Saracenorum de Hispania venit Nissas et destruxit eas."

Later on, in 1035, 1050, and 1075 we read how Pisan fleets took Bona and what the chronicler is pleased to call Carthage, how they drove back a Saracen prince who had again established himself in Sardinia, and how after each victory the loyal commonwealth—Ghibeline before Guelph and Ghibeline were heard of—dutifully sent the crown of the vanquished prince to the Emperor. At last, in 1063, we come to the entry which most concerns us, an entry which may still be read on the front of the pile whose foundation it records:—

Anno 1063. "Pisani fuerunt Panormum et fractis catenis portus civitatem ipsam ceperunt, ibique sex naves ditissimas ceperunt, Saracenis plurimis interfectis, et combusserunt naves quinque; unam Pisas duxerunt mirabili thesauro plenam, de quo thesauro eodem anno majorem Pisanam ecclesiam inceperunt."

These entries set before us the loftier character of the Pisan commonwealth, at once maritime, crusading, and imperialist; but they are mixed up with other entries pointing to the causes which in the end brought the commonwealth to its fall. Mixed up with the records of the great strife with the Infidel are the records of the local warfare by land with Lucca and by sea with Genoa. The never-ending rivalry with Genoa led in the thirteenth century to the two sea-fights of Meloria—the first where the Ghibeline commonwealth made prey of the prelates bound for the Papal Council, the other that crushing overthrow in which history, as commonly read, sees the main cause of the downfall of the commonwealth. But perhaps a single defeat, however overwhelming for the moment, would not have crushed Pisa for ever, had not physical causes already determined that maritime rule was to pass away from the city of the Arno. Be this as it may, the history of Pisa, when forced to struggle on as a purely inland Power, is a sad contrast to the earlier days of her naval greatness. One fearful tale, the tale of the most fearful doom which ever fell on convicted traitor, has made the name of Pisa and her Tower of Hunger familiar to every ear. But the course of later Pisan history is on the whole a dull one. Pisa, like Venice, had been transferred, but, unlike Venice, not wholly by her own act, from the scene of her ancient glory to a scene on which little glory was to be won by her. At one moment the stern tyrant of Lucca, at another the oppressed bond-slave of Florence, engulfed at last in the common humiliation of Medicean dominion, chosen on account of her desolation as the theatre of an Ecumenical Council, twice only do the fortunes of Pisa call forth any real interest or sympathy. The Ghibeline city, true to her old faith, wakes into life as the Cæsar from Lützelburg, the last real restorer of the Empire, comes to do honour to her loyalty, and at last to lay his dust within her mighty temple. She wakes again to a yet truer life in her last struggle with the revived democracy of Florence, so zealous for freedom for herself, so chary of letting others share with her in the gift. But, at least after the death of Henry the Seventh, the old Pisan commonwealth, the commonwealth which checked the advance of Saracen and Turk, the commonwealth which filled the East with her merchants and her warriors, and which raised as her trophies the noblest monuments of Italian skill, must be reckoned among the things which have passed away for ever.

We have quoted the entry from one of the Pisan chronicles which assigns the beginning of the metropolitan church to the year 1063. Another chronicle, also in the great collection of Muratori, places the date twenty-six years later. To a Northern inquirer the difference is of no great consequence. In either case the building is contemporary with Durham; if we accept the earlier date, it is also contemporary with Eadward's work at Westminster and with Eadwine's work at Jarrow. In the history of art the difference made by the few years between Jarrow and Durham bridges over one of the greatest gaps on record. But, after all, Jarrow is a rude specimen of the style of which Pisa is the noblest monument, while Durham is the equal rival of Pisa in a distinct style. As a group, the buildings of Pisa are probably unrivalled in the world. Nothing can be more unlike the usual way in which the great churches of Continental cities are crowded and jostled by inferior buildings than the broad space in which the four great ecclesiastical structures of Pisa, the Duomo, the Baptistery, the Campanile, and the Campo Santo, all stand close together, apart from all other buildings, except the wall of the city itself, in a corner of whose circuit the wonderful group is placed. But it is hardly more unlike the position of those Italian churches—Venice, of course, being the crowning example of all—in which it has evidently been sought to give effect to the building by making its front look out on a wide open space. At Venice indeed St. Mark's is a mere appendage to the secular buildings of the commonwealth, the presence of which hallowed the home of its rulers. But even where the Duomo or other great church stands more independently than it does at Venice, there is not the same air of an ecclesiastical quarter which there is at Pisa. But, though we find at Pisa a distinct ecclesiastical quarter, its feeling is as unlike as possible to that of an English cathedral close. In England the close is commonly something cut off from the city; in some cases the city itself is simply something which has grown up outside the close. At Pisa, though we are in an ecclesiastical quarter of the city, we still feel that we are within the city, that the great church and its satellites were the work and the possession of its citizens, and not the separate domain of an ecclesiastical prince. So unusual a site was beyond doubt chosen advisedly. The metropolitan church was built on ground which had been occupied by a humbler church of St. Reparata; the original cathedral must therefore have stood on some other spot—most likely, as in most other cases, in the heart of the city.

As a matter of mere style, of mere architectural detail, the Duomo of Pisa differs but little from the forms which we have already seen at Lucca. We must remember that the Duomo of Lucca was rising at the same time as the Duomo of Pisa, and that according to one account these two great works were begun in the same year. The original design of the Luccan church has been lost among later additions and rebuildings. At Pisa, just as at Salisbury, though the west front must in actual age be many years later than the apse, we still see one design, the creation of one master mind, harmoniously carried out from one end of the building to the other. The name of the architect of Pisa is handed down to us as Busketus or Buschetto, and he must have been a man worthy to rank beside Iktinos and Anthemios, beside the designer of Spilato and the designer of Durham. His work shows that he had thoughtfully studied all the forms of architecture which had arisen in his age. His work was the trophy of victory in a land which Normans as well as Saracens were striving to free from the yoke of the misbeliever; it was the work of a city which rivalled Venice in its commercial intercourse with the East. Is it too much to think that the designer of the great church of Pisa drew ideas from each of so many enemies, rivals, and allies? The apse and the west front, if they stood at Lucca, would simply be remarked as the greatest among many kindred works. But the ground plan and the design of the interior introduce us to something which, in its fulness, has no parallel at Lucca, at Ravenna, or any other city. We see plainly the influence of the basilica, but we see no less plainly the influence of the domical churches of Constantinople and Venice; we see also, we venture to think, the influence of the mosques of Palermo, and of the churches, if not of Northern Europe, at least of Northern Italy. From the East came the central cupola, from the North we cannot but think came the spreading transepts; and these two features Buschetto strove to work into harmony with the central body, whose general design was to be that of the most gigantic of basilicas, but not without touches which must have come from a Northern source. St. Sophia, St. Vital, and St. Mark had no long-drawn nave; the basilicas had no central cupola; the church of Pisa was to have both. The attempt was not wholly successful. Nothing can be more glorious than the Pisan interior lying directly east and west; the long ranges of mighty columns, the double aisles, all leading on to the vast mosaic which looks down from over the high altar. The general effect is that of a basilica, the noblest of basilicas. But to this effect the cupola and the transepts are sacrificed; they are denied their proper prominence, while they have prominence enough to disturb in some degree the perfect basilican ideal. The architect was evidently afraid to break in on the direct eastern and western range by giving the cupola its proper support constructive and æsthetical. We miss the four great lantern arches which should form a main feature in any church which has a central cupola or tower of any form. The cupola is, as it were, thrust in so as to interrupt the direct view as little as may be; its supports are thrown into the background; its scale is insignificant, and instead of the round resting on the square, its form is that of an awkward ellipse. For the same reason, not to interrupt the direct range, perhaps also with some memory of the tribunes of St. Mark, the arcades are carried, though with some change of designs, across the openings of the transepts. The transepts are thus cut off from the main body of the building in a way which is most unusual, but which appears again, where we should not have looked for any special likeness to Pisa, in the two great churches of Strasburg.

The Duomo then has some manifest faults; the architect had several conflicting ideas in his head, which it was hard to work into an harmonious whole. But the merits of the building far outweigh its defects. The arcades are the very glory of the basilican idea. And they carry, what is not to be seen at Ravenna or Lucca, a real triforium. The form of a Northern triforium is here skilfully translated into Italian language, more skilfully than in those examples at Modena and Pavia which come actually nearer to the thing itself. The Northern triforium is here made flat, there is no recessing; ornament is sought for, in the Italian fashion, by alternation of colours. The arcades and triforium are worked well together; but the architect was less successful with his clerestory, which still remains disjointed, with a gap between itself and the triforium, just as we see over the arcades of the basilicas from which the triforium is absent. The double aisles, as ever, help to heighten the feeling of vastness and infinity. And, moreover, to bring their arches to the level of the main arcades, they are given the pointed form. Let no one think that this is a sign of approaching Gothic. The pointed form is here the tribute of the vanquished Saracen, as in the triforium and the transepts we have the contribution of the Norman ally.

Such is the great church of Pisa, the glory of Italian Romanesque. Strange to say, some of its faults are avoided in a smaller church essentially of the same type on the other side of the Arno. But the few moments that we have left we must give to the satellites which surround the Duomo. The lower stage of the baptistery is admirable work of the twelfth century; but the upper portion, which was not finished till late in the next age, suffers a good deal from the introduction of pseudo-Gothic detail. The campanile is far more satisfactory. It is perhaps more famous for the accident which has thrown it out of the perpendicular than from its own merits. Yet the tower of Pisa may claim to be the noblest tower of the Southern Romanesque. The round form doubtless comes from Ravenna; but the Pisan tower is a Ravenna tower glorified. At Ravenna, as in East-Anglia, the round form may have been adopted in order to avoid quoins in a building of brick or flint. At Pisa, as in Ireland, the form was chosen out of deliberate preference. And the preference was a wise one. The square form could hardly have borne the endless ranges of arcade upon arcade which perfectly suit the shape of the Pisan campanile, and which make it one of the noblest works of human skill.

The Campo Santo, the cloister which seems to have supplanted an earlier one attached to the church itself, alone remains. As a specimen of the Italian Gothic we need hardly dwell upon it; nor do its painted decorations belong to our subject. But nowhere else in the Ghibelline city does the student of Imperial history find himself more thoroughly at home. In one walk is the statue which loyal Pisa reared in honour of the first Frederick, a witness, we must confess, which says more for their loyalty than for their artistic skill. The sculpture of the Imperial effigy at Pisa hardly ranks above that in which his enemies at Milan have recorded their triumphs over him. We turn to another walk, and there, a perfect contrast in its noble workmanship, is the effigy of the last Cæsar who found a resting-place in Italian soil. Moved from its earlier place in the cathedral, the tomb of Henry the Seventh now fills a place in which the inquirer has to search carefully for the Imperial monument among the records of the meaner dead. Our thoughts fly back to the last Imperial tomb on which we have gazed. The gap between Honorius and Henry of Lützelburg seems to us a wide one. In the eyes of Dante there was no gap, no break, between two lawful possessors of the throne of the world. Our thoughts may perhaps flit away from both to the true Imperial King of Italy, to the Karling Lewis, who sleeps at Milan. The gap is hardly filled up by an intermediate stage so unlike either. But it is in truth in contrasts of this kind that we best learn the strength of the abiding Imperial idea. The difference between Honorius, Lewis, and Henry seemed as nothing in the eyes of those who believed that the Roman Cæsar, in whatever form, was God's temporal Vicar upon earth. And to those who fail thoroughly to understand the full force and depth of that belief, how men were ready to spend and be spent for what seems to us the most shadowy of chimeras, mediæval history must ever remain an utter blank.

ULTRAMONTANIST ALMANACS.

IT is not to be expected that the Ultramontane clergy in Germany will submit very passively to the law which prohibits them from delivering political sermons. Not only in Germany, but in Switzerland and Belgium, one sees in every bookshop the signs that religion, according to its latest Ultramontane expositions, is fast becoming politics, and little but politics. Bishop Goss of Liverpool has lately declared Ultramontanism to be the only perfect realization of Conservatism. In our "Mug-house Clubs" of the time of George I.—to cite no later instances—we have had proof in England that obstructives as well as destructives can cast themselves at the feet of King Mob and invoke his brutal protection. The Roman clergy abroad, having learned from the Jesuits that it is vain to put trust in princes, autocratical or constitutional, already throw out here and there a threat of turning themselves into demagogues. It is among the possibilities of the future that the kiss of peace may be exchanged between the leaders of the two anti-national forces in Europe—that Universal Republic which is to embrace every man it leaves unmurdered, and that Universal Roman Church which is to embrace every Christian it leaves unexcommunicated. Dr. Manning and Mr. Odger will walk arm-in-arm.

The wonder is—and to no men can it have been a greater wonder than to the Ultramontane clergy themselves—that the States of Europe have tolerated the provocation and insult of these anti-national teachers so long. The Jesuits must have foreseen that the abuse of the pulpits of national churches to the purpose of exciting national disaffection must come to an end sooner or later. They have for some time been prepared for this end, and have arranged new workshops for their political business. The Berlin Correspondent of the Daily News lately told us that the clergy "now confine themselves in the pulpit to reading a written sermon which may bear the scrutiny of the law; and they invite their flock to meet them at some private place in the evening, where they will address them in their capacity as citizens. Special societies are formed for this purpose, one in every parish; and in larger places a little newspaper of their way of thinking is added." This may be the case in some districts of Germany; but it can scarcely be the rule in every Catholic parish, nor does it extend to Catholic Switzerland or to Belgium. The appeal to "the people" in these countries is made in what seems at first sight a most unobtrusive manner. The clergy, to borrow a favourite phrase of the religious world in our own country, "get hold" of popular literature. They desire to edit, or to direct "the radiation" of, the newspapers which circulate amongst the peasantry. They adopt, with a difference, the saying of Dr. Arnold, that he did not so much want religious books as secular books with a religious purpose. They publish a sort of literature which resembles, with some qualifications, the semi-secular branch of the business of the Religious Tract Society and the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge.

There is one kind of book which seems to be a necessary of life to all Continental peoples—a calendar, almanac, or year-book, filled with pictures, stories, and weather predictions. Every province, every canton, every town of moderate size has at least one calendar of its own. Some of these are of respectable character, and some of considerable age, as, for instance, the widely-circulated Lahrer Hinkenden Boter, which is in 1872 in its "72 Jahrgang," and is sold both in Baden and German Switzerland. The earliest almanacs were not published for commercial men, but for clerics and husbandmen, and the foreign almanacs to this day retain the original features of their earliest predecessors in the prominence they give to the Church Calendar and the Bauernregeln. The year-books of the Protestant German Cantons of Switzerland, such as the Vetter Jakob of Zurich, and Der Pilger of Schaffhausen, retain these features as rigidly as the two Calendars of monastic Einsiedeln, or the Ultramontane Christliche Hauskalender of Luzern.

Since the promulgation of the two new articles of the faith—the Immaculate Conception and the Infallibility of the Pope—the Ultramontanists have extended the term "rationalistic" until it embraces every species of popular literature which does not contain an implied or expressed acknowledgment of these dogmas. At the same time they have extended the political phrase "atheistic socialism" until it covers all political activity which has not as its open or secret end the maintenance of the Pope upon his temporal throne. A Jesuit in Cologne handed us one of their own pictorial annuals as "a counteraction to the rationalistic people's literature of the age." The only rationalistic annuals or calendars we have come across in the German language are the very few which do not print any Bauernregeln, those quaint and generally ancient weather predictions which indicate the character of the coming season from the character of some preceding Church holiday. Our only wonder is that the Jesuits have not discovered a treasonable and rationalistic appeal to history in these Bauernregeln themselves. For it is notorious—and it is perhaps some indication of their antiquity—that they all start their prognostications from the days of Saints canonized before the Reformation and the Council of Trent, even from such forgotten Saints as Urbanus, Procerus, Martinianus, and Vincentius; while none of them take their cue for the weather from the days of such approved and oft-quoted Saints as Alphonsus Liguori, Rosa of Lima, or Ignatius Loyola. "Maria Himmelfahrt," which is mediæval, sets many a farmer on the watch; but "Maria Empfängnis," which is so peculiarly modern and Papal, gives him no anxiety about his corn or wine in the coming year.

We have now before us a pile of these popular counteractions to rationalism in German, Flemish, and French, collected at the towns in Germany, Switzerland, and Belgium in which they are published. The Belgian—both French and Flemish—are on the whole inferior to the German and German-Swiss; they are smaller in size, poorer in their woodcuts, worse in their paper, and they make little or no attempt at the comic element, literary and pictorial, which seems to be a necessary part of the German and Swiss year-book. A very short glance at the pages of these counteractive almanacs will go some way in explaining the anti-clerical excitement of the towns, and some of the pro-clerical and pro-Papal excitement of the country, in the nations for which they are published. The chief duty of a good man in 1872, according to the articles, stories, poems, and anecdotes which fill these year-books, is to be religious. Religion consists in honouring the Pope, believing the two new dogmas, opposing the Liberals, and respecting the Jesuits. The Véritable Almanach populaire Liégeois actually makes the martyrdom of the late Archbishop of Paris redound to the honour of Jesuitism:—"Les bandits de la révolution," out of their hatred to religion—that is, to the Pope—have murdered "l'archevêque et des pères Jésuites." Switzerland has suffered so much from the Jesuits that, although it is in many respects the most advanced and liberal of all Germanic nations, it will not allow a Jesuit as such to live within its limits. The old German Cantons have suffered the most severely; but although a Jesuit may not minister in the Stifts-Kirche at Luzern, or in the beautiful St. Oswald's in Zug, or in the historical abbey of Einsiedeln in Schwyz, it is plain enough that every belief and hope of Jesuitism can get into the houses of the peasantry under the covers of the Christliche Hauskalender of Luzern, of the Zuger Kalender, and of the two almanacs of Einsiedeln. Every Swiss who understands the splendid traditions and present noble position of his own nation, and who loves the Republic as well as his own Canton, whether he be Catholic or Protestant, sympathizes with Italy in the Italianizing of Rome. But this event is described at length for the Luzerners in their Hauskalender as the "Berufung der Italiener wider Rom"; and for the countless German-speaking pilgrims of Switzerland, Elsass, and all Germany who visit the black image in Einsiedeln, and buy the old calendar, it is related as "Der grosse Kirchenraub in Italien im September 1870." The New Einsiedler Kalender has no special article upon the Italian occupation; but in its summarised "Geschichtskalender" it marks September 20 with the sufficient hint, "Einzug der Bonapartisten in Rom." The poor ill-clad women whom one sees packed so thickly on the steamboats on the Lake of Zurich, with their meagre bundles of clothing and food in their hands, on their way to Richterswil, are taught to look upon the sufferings of "the Prisoner of the Vatican" as a subject for their own tears and prayers.

The Luzerner Kalender contains little else than glorifications of the Pope. Its longest articles are upon his "Unfehlbarkeit," his Ordinations of 1869, his dogma upon the Conception of the Virgin, and his sufferings as prisoner of the Vatican. There is an article upon the war between France and Germany; no almanac in the German tongue would be complete without such an article; but is given, as "der Kalendermacher" admits, like a fable, for the sake of its moral, and the moral is that France was beaten because it preferred Liberalism to the Pope. The Jesuits in the war of the Sonderbund have once stirred up the Luzerners against their Protestant fellow-Cantons. In the light of this recollection many a Swiss must read the "4th Hint" the Ultramontane calendar-maker gives to his readers:—

Warum kehrt sich die Wuth der Gottlosen alle Male gegen die katholische Religion und Kirche? Während die Synagogen der Juden und die Kirchen der verschiedenen Sekten unbehelligt bleiben, mussten die katholischen Tempel Plünderung und Schändung erfahren. Weiss etwa die Revolution, wissen etwa die Sozialisten zwischen Freund und Feind zu unterscheiden?

The same moral is presented in another form to the French-speaking almanac purchasers in Liège. Marshal Randon, as an eminent 'vert, has a biography given him both in the new Einsiedler and the Liège almanac. In the former he stands as one amongst fourteen deceased celebrities; the editor, perhaps with some care for the deserved scientific and literary reputation of the Kloster of Einsiedeln, gives the Marshal as his companions such men as Gervinus and Sir John Herschel. The Liège biography of Randon is of greater length; it is made up of gushing anecdotal recollections from the private letter of a person who was present in Geneva at the Marshal's death. The Pope, it seems, took much pleasure in thinking of Randon, and had a great desire to obtain his portrait. When he at last obtained one he wrote with his own hand underneath it, "Dominus det tibi gratiam ut sis mecum in eadem caritate." The autograph was sent to the Marshal, who for five years would never allow the treasure to be separated from him. "He carried it everywhere with him," says the narrator, "and when he had rendered up his beautiful soul to God, I saw it upon his funeral couch. The prayer of the Prisoner of the Vatican had been answered." We must give two of the anecdotes of this "beautiful soul" in the original. The first runs thus:—

Voici une particularité encore. En 1864 on me communiquait une lettre au maréchal au cardinal Antonelli. On m'a appelé cléricale, moi, protestant. Je ne connais pas de termes plus bête dans la langue française. Moi, cléricale, parce que j'ai dit que, si j'ai le droit de garder ma vigne de la Côte-d'Or, le Pape a aussi bien que moi le droit de garder son pouvoir temporel.

The second is better:—

En 1866, après Sedan, il voulait la guerre contre la Prusse. Napoléon lui dit: "Attendez quelques années."

— Randon: "Sire, dans six mois ce sera trop tard."

— Napoléon III: "Je veux laisser se former une grande nation protestante pour intimider tous les cléricaux qui me donnent la tabatière. . . ."

Et Sedan a été la vengeance de Dieu.

The same doctrine about the fall of the Napoleonic dynasty is preached in Switzerland as in Belgium. One of the Einsiedler calendar-makers is a kind of Zedkiel; like our English prophet, he prints a list of his "fulfilled predictions." In 1867 Napoleon III. presented to the Mother of God in Einsiedeln a magnificent set of candlesticks, and with his gift he sent the following expression of his wishes:—"I desire that I and my children may be placed under the protection of the Holy Virgin." The prophet of the Einsiedler calendar declared at that time, "The French Caesar will remain under the Virgin's protection so long as the Holy Father Pius IX. remains under his protection." This prophecy, like so many of Zedkiel's, is now fulfilled. "This man," triumphantly says the writer to the peasants, "withdrew his hand from the support of the Pope, and at the same moment an invisible hand was withdrawn from the Emperor of the French. It is now with him, as it was earlier with his uncle and his model, the First Napoleon, who, from the moment of his ill-treatment (Mishandlung) of the Seventh Pius, was himself doomed to captivity." A man's success in this world, the Swiss and Belgian peasantry are asked to believe, depends upon his devotion to the Pope. This will be hard for the busy Catholic Swiss to believe, who have daily before their eyes the contrast between Zurich and Zug, Lucerne and Basel, Schaffhausen and Solothurn.

The Allemans Grief, an almanac of some hundred and forty pages, is published at Yverbois, in the province of Antwerp, and has a large circulation amongst the Flemish-speaking people. This almanac is interesting simply as a piece of popular literature in the popular tongue. Excepting the notices at the railway stations, the rapid English traveller on his way through Belgium to the Rhine or Switzerland meets with none of the local language of the people he sees in the streets and the fields. The man of business who sits next him in the train sees nothing but newspapers, or speaking in French to one another. Yet in Flanders, as thoroughly as in Elsass, little more than the superficial of social life is French. In the cities of both countries, not only in Strasbourg but in Bruges, one has but to stand still in the streets, and listen to the talk of the workmen, or of the children pouring forth from the schools, to realize that the substance and foundation of society is German. A Nottingham artisan who heard a mechanic in Bruges call out to his father "Oude man!" would think that he was listening to his native English. An Englishman who has some knowledge of German will not find it difficult to hold a simple conversation with the poorer class in Ostend or Bruges. The Low Countries are in fact the natural bridge between England and Germany. Both the German and the Englishman will see something brotherly and homely in this rude little year-book for Flemish folk. We should like to quote, if it were not far too long, a dialogue headed "Zoo zijn er," on the danger of delaying use of the Sacraments until the hour of death, which begins thus:—"Ej. Goeden morgen, buurvrouw; is het waar wat ik gehoord heb? Ej. Helaas! maar al te waar." But we will give, as a shorter specimen, the tale of the Englishman and his wife:—

Tijdens een hevige gerevult tussen de Franschen en Pruisen wandelde een Engelsman met zijne vrouw op een gevaarlijke plaats. "Harry," riep de vrouw angstig, toen zij de kogels al snorrende voorbij zag vliegen, "lieve man, hier is het toch gevaarlijk." "In't geheel niet," hernam de man koelgelyk, "dat zijn kogels van Franschen en Pruisen: die kunnen ons geen kwaad, dat gaat ons immers niet aan, wij behooren en onzijdig land."

The compiler of the Allemans Grief deserves great praise for his pains. Nevertheless, although its tongue is so agreeably and wholesomely national, its tone is throughout as anti-national and Ultramontane as the other year-books we have noticed. There is a special article on "alang," about "De Jesuiten." New names are found for the months, and these names show a peculiarly Jesuitical view of the year's course. Thus March is not only "Maart" and "Lente-maand," but "St. Josephmaand," and the 19th, St. Joseph's Day, is marked with letters in size and shape granted to none of the Apostles' days. May is not only "Mei" and "Bloesmaand," but "Mariasmaand"; July is "St. Anna-maand"; August, "St. Joachimsmaand"; October, "Roos-kransmaand." As some indication that these new names should be used in preference to the general or the popular names, they are printed in larger letters, and placed as titles to each month's page, while the old worldly names are placed below them in smaller type. Extremes meet once more; and to a Quaker calendar, a Red Republican calendar, and a Positivist calendar, we may soon have to add a Jesuit and Ultramontane calendar.

NAPOLEON III. ON FRENCH AND GERMAN MILITARY ORGANIZATION.

IMITATING the example of his uncle, Napoleon III. occupied his enforced leisure during captivity in writing a book to account for the fact that he was a captive. The frankness and honesty of the Note sur l'Organisation militaire contrasts favourably, it must be admitted, with the unblinking but ingenious falsehoods of the famous Mémoires de St.-Hilaire. The uncle was in the habit of attributing his misfortunes to fate, to treachery, to the incapacity of his subordinates—in short, to everything and everybody but himself. The nephew, unblinded by arrogance and accepting his reverses with more dignity, accuses nobody, save perhaps incidentally the Chamber of Deputies, but justly lays the blame on a defective organisation unsuited to modern requirements, and on a system which had become an anachronism. The first part of his book, which is devoted to a detailed account of the Prussian military system, contains nothing that is not already perfectly familiar to the military student. The eighth chapter, however, is so remarkable an essay on the comparative merits of French and Prussian military organisation, that, coming as it does from such a pen, we are astonished that it has met in the English press with little more than a bare notification of its existence. The Emperor sums up the principles upon which the Prussian system is founded in the following words:—"L'égalité des charges et l'avancement par l'instruction." In theory, it is admitted by every one that the most sacred duty of a citizen is to serve his country. Among the ancient Romans this theory was strictly carried into practice. As the Emperor observes, wealth and birth had their responsibilities as well as their privileges, and the rich patrician was expected to set an example of civic and warlike virtues. In the palmy days of Rome no one could become a candidate for high office until he had taken part in ten campaigns. As in modern Prussia, so in ancient Rome, military service was viewed as an honour and a privilege, not as a misfortune or a personal tax. As long as these patriotic and noble ideas lasted Rome was invincible; as soon, however, as her chief citizens began to depute the defence of the State to slaves and foreign mercenaries decadence set in. Like the citizens of decaying Rome, those of all modern States, save North Germany, corrupted by luxury, corrupted by a selfish love of gain or ease, have come to look upon military service as a hardship, and have shrank from all patriotism which involves individual sacrifice. The result is that Prussia has become the most powerful military nation in the world.

France has already suffered severely from her want of genuine patriotism; who can tell when similar faults elsewhere may not meet with a similar punishment? One of the greatest elements of Prussian military superiority is to be found in an admirable Staff. Prussia repudiates both the Chinese system of competition which has found so much favour in England, but which never can discover those qualities whose presence it is above all desirable to ascertain, and the French system of educating officers from the beginning for a Staff Corps. Knowing well that theory and practice are the complements of each other, Staff officers are not taken from amongst the most book-learned, but from the most capable men in the army who have from time to time intervals of regimental duty. Though the War Academy affords an opportunity of proving absolute fitness for the Staff, the graduates have no claim to employment, which indeed is often given to ordinary regimental officers. France, on the contrary, up to 1869—since which date some improvements have been introduced—formed its Staff entirely from members of the Staff Corps. This Staff Corps was practically almost exclusively composed of the best pupils from the Polytechnique and St.-Cyr. The consequence is, that French Staff officers are, as a rule, little more than mere theorists, and have no sympathy with, or practical knowledge of, the feelings and wants of the rest of the army.

As regards military organization proper, though every consideration is paid in North Germany to private interests, the Head of the Confederation (the Emperor wrote before the Confederation had merged in the new German Empire) can in case of necessity avail himself of the services of every man in the country. The soldier passes only three years with the colours and five with the reserve, but even after that time the State still profits by his military training; whereas in France, when a soldier quits the active army, he ceases to be of any value to the country, and his years of training are altogether thrown away. Unfortunately for France there has long existed a great prejudice against trained and organized reserves, a prejudice encouraged by a no less eminent authority than Marshal Soult. The Marshal declared that the best reserve was constituted by a large number of young men left at their homes, and subjected in time of peace to no military training. The Emperor points out that this system might have answered formerly when other nations possessed no better organization than did the French, when railways did not exist, and when plenty of time for preparation was available; but that in the face of present circumstances it is full of perils. We are fond of likening our Militia to the Landwehr, and the French, by some inexplicable mental process, found something analogous to that corps of veterans in the Garde Mobile; but the latter existed only on paper, and did not receive even a nominal training. It is a mere truism, but it is a truism which we scarcely even recognize, and spin not acknowledging which the French have suffered severely, that to form an army it is not sufficient to order a certain number of regiments in garrison to assemble at a certain place on an appointed day. The Emperor combats this error, which requires, but certainly does not merit, refutation. He shows that to pass from a state of peace to one of war is a most delicate and difficult operation. The difficulty has been, as we know, most successfully solved by the Prussians, and their success has been chiefly due to the system of decentralization which they have established. The Minister of War simply sends to each of the thirteen commanders of corps the order "Mobilise," and by these thirteen commanders the mobilisation is entirely executed. Every one knows what he has to do; no fresh instructions are required, and the corps commander merely circulates the Minister's order among his subordinates. Each corps d'armée, division, brigade, and regiment is permanently quartered in the district whence its reserves, recruits, Landwehr, stores, train, &c., are to be drawn. The lists of reserves, recruits, and Landwehr are kept corrected up to date. All clothing, arms, and material of war are ready stored in the magazines of the different regiments or in the general magazines of the district. A permanent Committee at once provides the horses required. Every one knows his place and his work; the civil and military authorities work harmoniously together, and without the slightest jar or check the allotted task is performed, and the entire army corps, permanently organized, takes the field as one homogeneous body. At the same time depôts are formed, a fresh local Staff is appointed, and the fortresses are placed in a state to undergo a siege.

The contrast between this forethought, careful organization, and skilful division of labour, and the hurry, confusion, and delay which occur in France on the outbreak of a war, is very striking. The army once formed, only cadres and recruits remain at the depôts, while the fortresses are left without garrisons. In France, when war is decided on, not only general instructions, but also the minutest orders, are sent from Paris. In fact the Minister of War undertakes alone to accomplish that which in North Germany is the task of thirteen men. The process of bringing up regiments to their full strength is effected as follows:—The Minister of War sends orders to the commandants of the eighty-nine recruiting depôts to call in all men on leave or belonging to the reserve. The commandants send to the 36,000 mayors the names of the men summoned, accompanied by orders for the latter to join their depôts, which are scattered all over France. Forthwith all the roads and railways in the country are crowded with men proceeding to their depôts, which they subsequently quit in order to join their regiments. It is only when war is actually on the point of being declared that an attempt is made to organize an active army. The regiments to be assigned to the different brigades, divisions, and corps d'armées are then for the first time designated. Then only are the artillery, engineers, and train distributed through the army, and then only are the general and Staff officers nominated. At the same time that all roads, railways, and diligences are crowded with officers and men hastening from all parts of the country to join their corps, the necessity arises for collecting, transporting, and distributing an enormous number of horses and a large quantity of material of war. The latter, instead of being stored in the different military districts, is kept in a few central magazines, and generally in Paris. Even what is actually at hand in the provinces cannot be issued without authority from Paris—such is the baneful system of centralization which prevails. The want of method in transporting camp equipage, other stores, and provisions is so great that it reminds one of the Bal-clava muddle. These stores are sent off by fractions, instead of by entire units, and the contents of each package not being marked on the outside, great accumulation and confusion take place at the railway stations. At Metz, we are told, there were "mountains" of bales which had to be opened in order to ascertain their contents. The waggons of the train are massed in immense magazines and kept dismounted from their wheels. Consequently much time is lost in preparing them for the road. Then the large number of additional horses required are sent to remount depôts without any reference to the number of men present at each to take charge of and use them. The result is that at some depôts there are plenty of men and few horses, at others an abundance of horses and scarcely any men. It may be imagined what confusion, labour, mistakes, and loss of time arise from such a system, or rather want of system. The Emperor happily likened the military administration of France to a machine of which all the parts, skilfully constructed, are kept separately in the workshops. When it is required to set the machine in motion, it is necessary to remount it entirely, from the simplest screw to the most complicated piece. In Germany, on the contrary, he says, the machine is all ready, and to put it in motion it is only necessary to bring water and coal and to light the fire.

Can we not draw a profitable moral from this comparison? Is our machine of war put together, mounted, and requiring only water, fuel, and fire to set it in motion? Does it, in short, resemble the German or the French machine? We fear that the only possible answer to these questions is one which is anything but reassuring, or creditable to our administrative capacity. We possess no means of rapidly and efficiently expanding our regiments. Our small army reserves are scattered all over the country without reference to the quarters of the corps which they would be called upon to join. Our Militia and Volunteers are raw levies instead of veteran troops like the Landwehr. Permanent brigades, divisions, and corps d'armées do not exist. The Staff and general officers would have to be nominated in a hurry. No provision has been made for the efficient garrisoning of our fortresses in the absence of the active army, or for filling up the gaps in the latter which are inevitable in a campaign. No arrangements exist for procuring and distributing the additional horses which would be required. Our military waggons are little more than a sample. Stores, ammunition, arms, clothing, are all collected in one or two central arsenals. Worst of all, in England, as in France, scarcely a step could be taken which was not authorised by a Minister of War who labours under a disadvantage from which in France they are free, that he is a civilian, and necessarily ignorant of everything which he is officially bound to manage, control, and direct. It has been urged against the Emperor Napoleon that he ought to have published his views on military organization a little earlier. Had he done so, however, it is doubtful whether his subjects would have profited by his teaching. We have not only the advantage of learning the views of an able and perfectly competent writer on the subject, but have been warned by the sad experience of our French neighbours. We have had now more than a year to digest the lesson taught us by the late war, but as yet we have positively not taken one step towards converting an aggregate of tactical atoms into an organized army. Purchase, ensigns, and cornets have been abolished, but no single endeavour has been made to render us more fit for sudden war than we were twelve months ago.

THE OLD MASTERS AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

III.

THE present Exhibition raises the important but not very difficult question of the responsibility incurred by the public display of spurious works. It is evident that responsibility must lie somewhere, but, in order to shift the burden to other shoulders, the following notice is prefixed to the Catalogue of the present year:—

The names of the painters and the titles of the pictures are inserted by their owners. The members of the Royal Academy, while they consider themselves without authority to alter these descriptions, cannot be in any way responsible for their authenticity.

This doctrine of non-responsibility is untenable and pernicious; partly because a false picture, after it has been exhibited in the Academy, gains a fictitious value—it would even sell for more in an auction-room—also because the exhibition of a spurious work is an injury to art and a perversion of truth; the public, instead of being guided aright, are misled. The paragraph we have quoted implies either an indifference to truth or an incapacity to detect error; it reminds one of the common announcement that Railway Companies are not responsible for neglect of duty. That it is the duty of the Academy to issue a judgment on the genuineness of pictures offered to it for exhibition there can be no doubt, and certainly Academicians are not backward in the performance of invidious duties when it becomes a question of rejecting two or three thousand contributions from "outsiders." It would appear that it is only in dealing with the dead that any delicacy or difficulty is felt. The notification now made for the first time may have been necessitated by the flagrant blunder of last year—the spurious Turner. Mr. Ruskin, without fear of the clamour of collectors or picture-dealers, was more outspoken than the Academy; the "Italy," he declared, was not by Turner, nor even by an imitator of Turner acquainted with the essential qualities of the master. What renders the non-responsibility doctrine now announced still less intelligible and acceptable is that the Academy assigned to this spurious Turner the best place in the room. This year likewise fictitious pictures are well hung. We would suggest that the printed notice in the catalogue should contain the additional words:—"Visitors will find copies, inferior replicas, and forgeries in central places near the eye; the Academy is not responsible, the public must judge for themselves."

We will begin our notices of the English school with Hogarth, its reputed father. "Captain Coram" (37), was just the figure for Hogarth; the shrewd, good-natured old captain, seated at a table with papers and the globe of a navigator beside him, demanded vigour rather than refinement, resolute character rather than flowing line or easy grace. The rare merit of the picture is that here we see old Coram seated to the very life; no one can pass him by, so pointedly does he arrest attention. A more retiring, a less obtrusive or fussy man, would not have been so much in Hogarth's way; his sitters always seem restless and fidgety; they have none of the eternal repose, the imperturbable contemplation, pertaining to the ideal school. How Hogarth could lose himself and sink his subject is painfully seen in the notorious "March of the Guards to Finchley" (45). This satire on the military manoeuvres against the Pretender violently displeased the King. George II., in broken English, asked, "Who is this Hogarth?" "A painter, my liege." "Bainter! I hate bainting and bostry too. Neither the one nor the other ever did any good. Does the yellow mean to laugh at my guards? What! a bainter burlesque a soldier! Take his trumpery out of my sight." We forgive the King whenever we see the picture. This drunken saturnalia would be better suited to the descriptive pen than to the realistic pencil; the incidents are too coarse and revolting to be brought before the eye, neither is the work commended by the fine technical qualities found in many of the painter's compositions, even when wit, merriment, or tragic incident might excuse the absence of supreme art. Hogarth, in the telling of a story, never failed of point, sequence, and completeness; his narratives are so clear that he who runs may read; and some portraits which we recall, such as that of Miss Rich, can scarcely be surpassed for delicate and transparent, facile and felicitous touch.

Hogarth had his studio on one side of Leicester Fields, Reynolds on the other, and the styles of the two painters were equally opposite. Reynolds had pretty playfulness, quiet humour, was always void of offence, and never transgressed the limits of kindly feeling and good taste, as may be judged from "Infancy" (62), "A Girl Learning on Her Hand" (85), and the "Infant Academy" (47). Reynolds, moreover, professed principles directly the reverse of those proclaimed by Hogarth; instead of decrying the old masters, he adopted them as his models. Hogarth had the advantage in originality, invention, and dramatic action. Reynolds, in fact, put out his power in portraits, of which we have here some of the choicest, selected apparently to illustrate the President's supreme felicity in the delineation of women and children. We miss his masculine, vigorous heads—such as those of Johnson, Baretti, Charles James Fox, Lord Thurlow, and Lord Mansfield. Instead, we are invited to admire the witching ways of "Nelly O'Brien" (81), the fresh beauty of the "Young Lady Painted for Mr. Edmund Burke" (105), the grace and balanced line of the "Jessamy Bride" (109), the brilliant blue and pearly white of the "Lady in a Blue Dress" (50), the glorious colour, Rubens-like, golden as autumn, of the "Portrait of Miss Theophila Palmer reading Clarissa" (60). It is grievous to see what swift ruin has overtaken several of these priceless pictures; around them hang portraits by Holbein, Rembrandt, Rubens, and Vandyck, older by one or two hundred years, yet comparatively intact. One reason why many of our English works have so speedily perished is to be found in the reckless use of asphaltum, a tempting but untrustworthy pigment, save perhaps when firmly fixed in its place by some varnish medium. Pictures in this collection by Newton, Wilkie, and Reynolds, together with a grand composition by Hilton in the National Gallery, are cracked and rotten, especially in the shadows, where asphaltum has been loaded on to gain transparent depth and rich broad union. Reynolds's once lovely picture of "A Girl Learning on Her Hand" (85) is worth examination as a sad example of the destruction inevitable from the adoption of unscrupulous processes. The background is not so much like a picture canvas as like the pitched plank of an old boat. The shadows of the face, too, are terribly broken by cracks; and yet, out from the wreckage and ruin, peer the sunny features of this arch and effusive child, the lights shimmering in contrast with the shadows, pure and translucent as when the paint first left the palette. Happily the gaze of these Reynoldses, "Nelly O'Brien" (81), has suffered less. The complexion on face and neck may have somewhat faded, and the infant on the lustrous satin petticoat may be a little faded, yet enough remains to show that this has been, and still is, one of the most brilliant and artistic portraits that ever left the easel.

That Gainsborough and Romney were the rivals of Reynolds is easily accounted for by the works here collected. In Gallery V. are five portraits which prove that Gainsborough was unsurpassed in precise drawing of the human face, in fine impasto in flesh, in sketchy freedom and suggestiveness in accessories. Yet even when at his best, as in the portraits of "Lady Boulby" (254), and the "Duchess of Montague" (263), the artist was apt to be scratchy in execution and chalky in colour. Romney, on the other hand, erred in opposite directions; his masses are broad to excess, his colours ruddy, his complexions are suspicious of rouge, his attitudes bespeak the stage. But an artist is deservedly popular who can produce a portrait so lovely, a picture so fascinating, as that of "Miss Linley, Sister of Mrs. R. B. Sheridan" (135).

Turner's several periods are represented, excepting the last, when his art fell into delirium. We should assign a date between 1800 and 1805 to the sober-minded, solidly painted "View on the Maes" (6). Then it was that Turner emulated Vanderwilde, and resolved to become a great marine painter—which in fact he was, if not the very greatest. "Summer Evening" (22), full twenty years later, painted in 1827, shows wholly different aims; instead of a crisp literal touch, the hand has become vacillating and tentative, even botchy; the artist strove after more than he could achieve by paint and brush; the outlines of the trees against the sunlit sky and the refulgent river are dissipated in thin air; the pictorial effect belongs to the artist's atmospheric period. In any review we might have to take of Turner's successive styles we could not follow precisely the dogmatic divisions of Mr. Ruskin, who, however, is the man above all others entitled to speak on the subject. The several manners of the painter are not invariably successive as to time; on the contrary, the distinctive styles overlap and intermingle. "Mercury and Hæra" (131) is as early as 1811, when the spell of mythology was upon the painter. This grand composition is so close upon the ideal and symmetric manner of the Italians, that on first entering the room we were tempted to exclaim, "What a magnificent Claude!" We soon found, however, that the work went far beyond the comparatively circumscribed limits of the artist of Lorraine. One use of this stupendous scene seems to be to teach our living artists the omnipotence of "composition"; art is inferior to nature, save in the supreme power of composition, which in its highest manifestations becomes creative. The habit of modern painters and critics is to ignore and decry the origination faculty which carried Turner far—possibly too far—from the circuit of commonplace. How perilous was the path on which he entered is but too well known. "Paestrina; Composition" (11), though exhibited not later than 1830, verges on extravagance. Any one acquainted with the actual site must be shocked at this flagrant falsification of topography. Perhaps the greatest mistake Mr. Ruskin ever made was to proclaim Turner the most truthful of painters. It is obvious that "Paestrina" was but a theme which the artist chose in order to play his variations in line, his fantasies in colour. Turner, who was not master of metre, grammar, or spelling, ushered the composition into the Academy with these not quite comprehensible lines from the fictitious "Fallacies of Hope":—

Or from yon mural rock, high-crown'd Pronoste,
Where, mistleiming of his strength, the Carthaginian stood,
And marked, with eagle eye, Rome as his victim.

Three painters here seen to advantage—Constable, Crome, and Cotman—are closely akin. They were natives of the Eastern Counties, and, like the soil of their birth, their pictures are of a flat, open, or copse-grown country; to them a mountain is unknown. They severally went to nature without a theory or a prejudice; accordingly their works are as unmannered as nature; while living they were comparatively decried, and now that they are dead they are superlatively extolled. Turner passed through their lowly stage of development, but, as we have seen, went beyond it; while Danby and Martin, soaring at once into the heavens, spurned the common ground which Constable, Crome, and Cotman so humbly trod. The most important landscape by Constable is "Passing the Lock" (80); each touch is crisp and sparkling as when it left the brush; we have seldom seen a picture in better condition. On the contrary, an equally characteristic work, the "White Horse" (118), has been so rubbed, smoothed, and otherwise bedeviled by dealers and cleaners, that little of Constable is left, save in the region immediately round the white horse. "Old Crome" was even less sophisticated than Constable; nothing can be more simple, honest, and plainspoken than "Minding Sheep on Mousehold Heath" (33). This art could have no great reach; yet a picture which was sold for a few shillings in the marketplace of Norwich has been known to fetch more than a hundred pounds. By Cotman, also a Norfolk man, are two charming examples on "The Yare" (35, 261), the river which of all rivers the painter was likely to know the best. In direct opposition to this art, which had its habitat in the fens on the coast of the Wash, are Danby's ideal landscapes, so remote from earth that they might almost have been painted in the moon. Yet "Olympo" (137) is very lovely. Sunsets thus sustained, yet subdued, have gone out of fashion; landscapes thus reduced to unity of poetic conception are anachronisms in these naturalistic times.

This year the Academy has lit upon the happy and obvious thought of giving prominence to its deceased members. Accordingly, in addition to the Academicians already mentioned, appear Watts, James Ward, Stothard, Newton, Hilton, Eley, Mulready, and others, making a total of twenty-two. It is impossible within the space at our command to afford to the many interesting works collected the notices they invite. Wilkie, Newton, and Mulready, the founders of what may be termed our Anglo-Dutch school, combine the manipulative perfection of the Dutch with the pictorial proprieties approved by the English. Of eight examples, comprising Sir David's changeful methods—his last high art failures excepted—the chief are the "Letter of Introduction" (date 1813), "Blind Man's Buff" (date 1812), and the "Penny Wedding" (date 1818); the two last are from Buckingham Palace. Wilkie, especially in "Blind Man's Buff," managed his compositions according to the artful method of Ostade. In looking at these living, speaking studies of character we see the peculiar force of the proverb, within the sphere of art, "The child is father to the man." Wilkie "could paint before he could spell," and while yet a youth in the Academy at Edinburgh he "surpassed all his companions in comprehending the character of whatever he was set to draw." In character these pictures are inimitable.

Hilton and Etty have somewhat in common; each took colour as the centre of art creation. Imagination and passion, too, they held as ruling powers. Hilton's "Ganymede" (36), suggested no doubt by Titian, we have always accepted as a grand conception; how boldly the figure floats, how duringly it flies, fearing no fall! Etty, audacious in colour, careless of form, is exalted by three master works—"Pluto and Proserpine" (42), "Nymph and Satyr" (30), and the "Triumph of Cleopatra" (23). Like others in our English school, Etty fails only when brought into invidious comparison with Titian, Veronese, and the great original masters of Italy. Stothard's "Canterbury Pilgrims" (174), one of three replicas of that most popular picture at Leigh Court, had, it is said, but a single defect—the want of age; yet, though a modern work, it possesses a primitive simplicity, an untutored grace, which belong to all time. This and other works which we have noticed of deceased British painters do honour to the Academy. Over a period of one hundred years artists of distinguished talent have followed on in unbroken succession; as one generation passes away, another, no less worthy, comes. This Exhibition shows that, though styles may change, art cannot die. The Academy has been indeed fortunate, for down to the present hour it can still boast of artists who carry on the good work of their fathers.

REVIEWS.

ZINCKE'S EGYPT OF THE PHARAOHS AND OF THE KEDIVÉ.*

MR. BARIHAM ZINCKE'S records and impressions of a tour in Egypt during the early months of last year are marked by freshness and originality of view rather than by depth of research or ripeness of critical knowledge. With a keen eye to the facts of nature and the salient features of life and manners, he unites an over-quickness of generalization, and his summary way of overleaping difficulties as often betrays him into error as it helps him to the discernment of truth. Whenever he sees simply with his own eyes, and limits his judgment to the sphere of direct and personal experience, he speaks like a man of rare powers of perception, with an intense love of nature in her various moods, and an intellectual sympathy broad and deep as the truth itself. The culture of a scholar underlying the instincts of a philosophic inquirer suggests at every step points of analogy and relationship between the present and the past, and gives the charm of classical refinement to the workings of a robust and masculine intellect. It is in the special preparation needed for the task he has undertaken that he shows himself lacking. The cleverness which makes vivid and truthful pictures of the Egypt of the Khedivé is far removed from the lore which is needed to revive the Egypt of the Pharaohs. Egyptology, whether as a phase of science or of history, is not to be mastered offhand in the space of a few months' flitting between the banks of the Nile. As he started for Egypt at a few hours' notice, it did not occur to Mr. Zincke to take any books with him. Nor does he seem to us to have bestowed upon the subject, either beforehand or since, anything like the patient and critical study which was needed to verify his crude suggestions, or to give weight to theories engendered upon the spot. It is not by the mere light of nature that problems which for centuries have exercised the most critically trained intellects are to be disposed of. Nor are the enigmas of the Sphinx or the Great Pyramid in reality any easier to read in the glare of the Egyptian sun than by the subdued light of a library. We have no manner of faith in the reputed virtue of inspiration on the spot, where the difficulty is as old as the literature of the world itself. Mr. Zincke came and saw and conquered, so he feels confident, the battle-field of ages. Who were the Egyptians? Is one of the standing puzzles of ethnologists. "What were their origin and affinities? To what race or races of mankind did they belong? At what time, whence, and by what route did they enter Egypt?" It is comparatively easy to set aside as inconclusive or inadequate more than one answer which bars the way to Mr.

Zincke's own hypothesis. The Egyptian, though African by situation, had very little that could be regarded as African affinities. We cannot call him a child of the soil. He is at first sight more akin to the inhabitants of the neighbouring Arabian peninsula. But here too the resemblances are not great. Even that of language is far from conclusive. The complexions of the races differ. So far from there being any suspicion or tradition of kindred, there was always deep antipathy between them. The religion of the Egyptian was totally unlike that of his neighbours; nay, it was thought by the Greeks identical with their own. *Egyptian civilization neither descended the Nile from Ethiopia, nor did it ascend the river from the coast of the Delta." Still it is not to be conceived indigenous. Can its origin have been Semitic? Here again no decisive affinities of language can be made out. Colour is rather adverse to the Semitic theory, the Egyptian being hot so swarthy as the Arab, though darker than the Jew. As far as sculptures and paintings go, he seems to Mr. Zincke a cross between the Caucasian and the Ethiopian or modern Nubian. His organization by castes was totally opposed to Semitic freedom and equality, and his intensely ordered state rule to that of the family and the tribe. To the strict monotheism of the Semite the wide Pantheon of Egypt was an abomination. In their ideas of law no less contrariety existed. But if the Egyptians were neither African nor Semitic, what were they? There are not many alternatives to choose from in Mr. Zincke's view:—"The process soon arrives at a complete exhaustion. They must have been—there is no other possible race left—mainly Aryan; that is, of the same race as ourselves." If ever Mr. Zincke has heard of the Mexican affinities so dear to rival ethnologists of a fancy kind, he sweeps them contemptuously away, with all Lord Kingsborough's gorgeous volumes to boot. The great Turanian theory, based upon the building capacity and taste of old Egypt, finds no greater mercy with him. Semitic or Aryan? is the only question. If not one, therefore the other. There is no more antecedent improbability, he goes on to urge, in an Aryan wave having reached the Nile than in other waves having reached the Ganges or the Thames. That the Egyptians themselves had not the faintest trace either of a tradition or suspicion of the fact is no more than might have been expected from the analogous ignorance of denizens of the Thames or Ganges. "This only shows—which will explain much—that the migration took place at so remote a period, so long before the invention of letters, that we feel as if it might have resulted from some displacement or variation of the axis of our earth in the glacial epoch." Of the precise weight of this negative portion of Mr. Zincke's argument we do not attempt to judge. Nor as regards the more positive points which seem to him most plausible can we say that our judgment goes very closely with his own. It would never have occurred to us that there was any close resemblance in point of complexion between the Egyptian of the monuments and the Hindoo of our day. Again, in speaking of the Hindoo as "indubitably Aryan," Mr. Zincke boldly sets aside or ignores those ethnological distinctions on which the whole system of castes in Hindostan depends for its origin. If all Hindoos are to be lumped together as Aryan, what becomes of that conquest of a more primitive race by a more civilized Northern stock which forms part of his argument elsewhere? In the matter of caste, indeed, he discerns a parallelism between Egypt and Hindostan which is not only far from being borne out by what we know of the nature of the institution in the two countries, but which is strangely adverse to the date he assigns for the Aryan immigration into Africa. This immigration he is disposed to carry back to some thirty thousand or so years ago—a fragment of a condition of things which bequeathed to Europe such enigmas as the Etruscans, the Finns, the Laps, and the Basques. A later wave resulted in the formation of the Hindoo; as well as, by a westward outflow, of the Greeks, Romans, and Tontons. Are we to conceive the Aryans of this early date bringing with them the principle of caste, when "the May Flowers of that old, old world were hauled up upon the beach, and the stout hearts that had crossed in them the Indian Ocean," not having as yet, we presume, the caste horror of their descendants for the black water, "prepared for their inland march across the desert hills to the great valley?"

We like Mr. Zincke when discoursing upon the Egypt of the Khedivé much better than when straining at paradoxes touching the Egypt of the Pharaohs. The impressions made upon his mind by the physical features, the climate, and the resulting singularity in social and mental traits of this exceptional country are vivid and just, though we do not see that they add much to what has been set down, to go no further than the present generation, by Lord Lindsay and Miss Martineau. In the chapter, "How in Egypt Nature affected Man," the broad and permanent elements of influence, the desert, the river, and the ever-present sun, are treated with great acumen and vigour of thought. The growth, as well of individual character as of social and political organization, is shown to be the direct result of the peculiarities of the country. Guarded on either hand by the desert, the land had in the great river a fertiliser whose beneficent flood gave it two rich crops a year, and a highway for commerce whose course from south to north gave it the command of provinces varied as the manifold climes through which it passed. Nature offering no high lands or strong places, there was no scope for turbulent or factious movement against the governing power. Revelations were therefore unknown. The absence of mountains suggested indeed and made possible the construction of pyramids, which would have been but pigmy structures beside nature's monuments. Man thus entered into rivalry with nature, and outdid nature. But the work was that of multitudinous, not individual, force. "Under such circumstances the individual was nothing. There could be no Homeric chieftains, no tribunes of the people, no eccentricities of genius. The community was an organism, of which every member had his special functions and purpose; a well-ordered machine, which did much work and did it smoothly." In his chapter upon the mode in which Egypt owes its creation to the action of the Nile in planting down its bed during a long series of geological ages, depositing its alluvium, and widening the valley as it readily shifted its channel to the right or left, for which theory he considers Professor Owen under obligation to him, Mr. Zincke seems oblivious of such claim to originality as might attach to the researches and measurements of Mr. Horner thirty years ago, not to speak of later investigators of the geology of the Nile Valley, with especial reference to the breaking down of earlier cataclysms and the consequent lowering of the river bed. The analogy of the Platte, Niagara, and Colorado rivers need hardly have been brought in from his observation of the New World, as suggesting a totally new solution for a familiar phenomenon of the Old. In his answer to the inquiry, "Why labour was squandered on Pyramids?" Mr. Zincke seems to us far more original and shrewd of judgment. There was, he shows, absolutely no outlet for that surplus or bottled-up labour which is the capital of a country. Taxation paid in kind for want of a coinage flowed in superabundance into the royal exchequer, whither what little there was of the precious metals and stones likewise found its way. There was no direct enjoyment of any kind to be got from all this. Yet the selfishness of man forbade leaving it all to future generations, while as yet the idea of great works of irrigation, reclamation of the desert, foreign invasion, or domestic defence, had not presented itself to the mind of a Pharaoh. What better than to build a monument to himself? "What treasure he had might as well be sunk in stones as bottled up barrenly. He would have the satisfaction of providing a safe and magnificent abode for his own mummy." Mr. Zincke's strong sense prevents him from giving more than a passing mention to the Great Pyramid craze of Mr. Henry Taylor and Professor Piazza Smyth, though, in identifying that peculiar structure with an improved and scientifically constructed funeral cairn, he fortifies himself with what is new to us as a point conceded by scholars. "At all events, we know that the word pyramid means the mountain, perhaps the cairn, the heap of stones." Mr. Zincke should have given us the word he had in his mind. We are aware that an origin for the word pyramid has been sought for in the Coptic p-our-em-hau, "the royal sepulchre," and that such words, although not combined, exist in hieroglyphics, as pa-ur, the "great" or "chief," and maha, a "tomb." But we know no other word for pyramidal tomb (which we have not the means of expressing in hieroglyphics) than abmar. We should further like to ask for the proof that the Egyptians of old had a familiar knowledge of the rotundity of the earth. In accounting for the worship of the beetle, Mr. Zincke relies upon the fact that the insect, in depositing its eggs upon the river bank, works up the moist clay around the mass into a perfect sphere, which it rolls back to the edge of the desert, often a long way off. "Who could be so dull," he asks, "as not to see in this sphere, full of the seeds of life, a perfect symbol of this terrestrial globe, framed by creative wisdom and energy of instinct, with all the germs of manifold being? And so the beetle became the symbol of the Creator." There is scarcely less strain upon the fancy in the ingenious logic by which our author draws out of the habits of the beetle in burying itself, and subsequently emerging from the chrysalis state into a new mode of being, the Egyptian usage of mummy interment, together with the belief in a future state.

Perhaps, however, the most original and characteristic portion of Mr. Zincke's book is that in which he deals with the history and nature of this tenet as part of the Egyptian creed, passing on to the still more momentous question why the Hebrew Scriptures, down to a certain period, apparently ignore the doctrine of a future life. With the Egyptian the thought of the soul after death was more present than the thought of life itself. Why, then, is it so difficult to find definite traces of it in the Mosaic Law, the historical books, and even in some later portions of the Hebrew Scriptures? We entirely sympathize with Mr. Zincke in his repudiation, even in his schoolboy days, of Warburton's hard and arbitrary method of doing away with this difficulty. And we hence feel the greater interest in following his alternative train of thought, which is at least remarkable for subtlety, if not for thorough consistency with facts. It is not enough, we agree with him, to dwell upon the necessity of breaking totally off with Egypt and all things Egyptian, looking to the actual retention of such points as circumcision, the division of the lunar month into weeks, &c. But yet we ask, can much stress be laid upon the fear of Moses that the priestly caste, by means of the lever supplied by the tenet of a future state, should attain a mastery like that which they wielded in Egypt? The first object with the lawgiver our author holds to have been to form a people; to reveal a religion was, he contends, but a means to that end, the religious part of the question being limited to the consideration of what form of religion would best make the disorganized multitude before him into a nation. One indispensable requisite was that it should be one which should never take them back in thought or action to Egypt.

Heaven would be no place of happiness for them, peopled as it already was by Egyptians. Moses gave his people a paradise, but it was a paradise at the beginning, not at the end, of things. It was also an earthly paradise. In the very Ten Commandments he implied a protest against the forty-two Commandments of the Egyptian code. Yet even with all this Mr. Zincke feels the need of a further solution of the problem. That which "occurred to him at Jerusalem" was to look at it in the light in which it presented itself to, and was met by, the "Divine Master." Hitherto the people had been living under a law, and that a divine law, which God himself executed here in this life. Henceforth God would be the source in men's hearts of the law or principle of right. They must also put in practice these principles as a code of social polity and conduct. But this world admits neither machinery nor scope for perfectly adjusted compensations and retributions. For this, consequently, a future life was necessary. Such is in brief Mr. Zincke's argument. We are afraid of doing it injustice, not only on account of the brevity or baldness of statement to which we find ourselves reduced for want of space, but owing to the difficulty we feel in grasping the connexion of his ideas. We will quote the words in which he states his argument summarily:—

The object of Moses had been to form a people in the ordinary sense of the words; a people, that is to say, who would be well-ordered at home, and able to hold their own among their neighbours. For this purpose a code was the first necessity, and, indeed, it might effect all that was required. The code he delivered was, necessarily, from God. But a code requires that its violations should be punished visibly and at once. This, therefore, implied God's punishing in this world and in this life.

"A necessary preliminary to bringing these the Saviour addressed to believe in the rewards and punishments of a future life must be the undoing the work of Moses in a certain sense and to a certain extent." But is this what was in the mind of Moses when evolving or enunciating a code which rested on sanctions having no reference to the future life? Is it enough to say that "the Mosaic dispensation promulgated municipal law which required immediate rewards and punishments, and this under the circumstances excluded the doctrine of a future life; while the Christian dispensation promulgated natural universal law, and so required the doctrine of a future life?" On the whole we cannot say that Mr. Zincke's argument, however able and coherent within certain limits, appears to us to offer an exhaustive solution of the problem with which he deals.

GEORGE GASCOIGNE.*

THE enthusiasm for Elizabethan literature in the mass that prevailed some forty years ago has subsided into a calmer and more just estimation of its deserts. Introduced by the Shakespeare commentators of the last century, it was propelled by the able, but sometimes extravagant, praises of Lamb, Hazlitt, Leigh Hunt, and Coleridge. They naturally extolled the richness of a field in which they were the most distinguished, though not the earliest, reapers. It was partly a generous tribute to some unjustly forgotten English worthies, and partly a protest against the opinions of a time which, under the powerful sorcery of Marmion and Childe Harold, proclaimed Scott and Byron to be not merely the heralds of a new era in literature, which they were, but superior to nearly every one of their predecessors, which they were not. Elizabethan and Carolinian writers, in verse or prose, have found their proper level again. They are respected, though we fancy little read; but they are not now the objects of indiscriminate panegyric. The great lights of the literary firmament still hold their state. Time writes no wrinkles on the brow of Chaucer or Spenser, of Hooker or Bacon, of Shakespeare or Milton. Yet few now, we suspect, care to read, except through the doubtful medium of extracts, many pages of Halcigh's History of the World, of Sir John Davies's or Lord Brooke's poems, or generally of the old dramatists or old divines. The humour of setting up the works of a past age, remote from us in the character of its interests and feelings no less than in time, as models and "stedfast stars" for the present time, was not a new one. Such a humour, partly genuine, partly affected, irritated Horace; possessed, among other strange fancies, the eccentric Emperor Hadrian, who preferred Cato to Cicero, Ennius to Virgil, and one Antimachus to Homer; and it moved the spleen of the usually calm Pliny the Younger against people who kept their praises for dead, and withheld them from living, authors.

Commemoration of benefactors is a pious and laudable practice observed by Hall and Colleges. Even a special portion of Holy Writ is selected for the purpose, and reprinting old writers who have done literature good service in their day is also a praiseworthy office. For many reasons the works of George Gascoigne merited this attention. He was one of our earliest satirists, lyrical poets, and dramatic writers; he throws no little light on his own times, and considering the state of our language when he wrote it—that is, during the first nineteen years of Elizabeth's reign—he was no mean contributor to the melody of English verse. In Mr. Hazlitt Gascoigne has met with a loyal and laborious editor. We have to regret indeed that his biography of the poet, for which his own writings offered good materials, is not more complete; but as these volumes, forming a portion of the Roxburghe Library, are livres de luxe, and so intended for the few, the laws of the Society may have regulated the space and contents of "Preface" and "Memoir."

A wide interval severs the poetry and prose of the earlier from those of the later years of Elizabeth's reign. Prose indeed had been seriously damaged by theological heat in the days of her two immediate predecessors, as any reader may discover who will take the pains to compare the writings of Sir Thomas More with those of Jewell or Ridley and Cranmer. Verse, too, had in harmony and perspicuity fallen below the standard of Surrey and Wyatt. Pens dipped in gall, and held in the hands of ready but angry writers, cannot be expected to produce smooth or deliberate work. For several years Elizabeth sat far from securely on her throne; her title to it had not ceased to be questioned; the Established Church was assailed by many and various opponents—some complaining that the rage of the old Babylon were not quite rent away from her; others demanding that her former decent or gorgeous apparel should be restored. It was in this stormy period that Gascoigne wrote; and it should be remembered that, dying in 1577, he composed his poems and plays before Shakespeare had written a verse, or Hooker shown what organ tones might be drawn forth from his native speech. Among dramatic authors he perhaps scarcely deserves to be ranked, because both his plays—the comedy of the Supposes, and the tragedy of Jocasta—are translations from Ariosto in the one case, and from Euripides and Seneca in the other. The dialogue of his Supposes, for its easy and colloquial tone, might have been composed, and yet not appeared singular, at least half a century later. "Gascoigne," as Warton observes, "was the first who exhibited on our stage a story from Euripides in metre, and the first that produced a comedy in prose." That comedy perhaps attracted the notice of Shakespeare—though it is by no means certain that he could not read at least enough French and Italian for his purposes—since either from Gascoigne's play or the Suppositi he seems to have borrowed the name of Petruchio, and at least one scene of the fourth act of the English version. The blank and rhymed verse in his Jocasta is very inferior to the smooth flow of his comic dialogue. If not as stilted and extravagant as the metre of Marlowe's Tamburlaine, it is as stiff and monotonous in cadence as Gorboduc. The Jocasta, indeed, is more a paraphrase than a translation of the Euripidean play, and for the first and fourth acts Gascoigne is not responsible, they being written by his friend Francis Kinwelmarsh. The indispensable chorus of the Greek original is represented in the English play by lyrical odes which do not discredit their authors; and in the absence of scenery, the device of dumb show is resorted to at the beginning of each act. Pope's couplet on the fashion of crying up nearly forgotten writers—will not apply either to the comedy or the tragedy of Gascoigne, since they have always been read as curiosities, not as pleasures, of literature. Yet his two plays have their value, inasmuch as they furnish one more proof of the gigantic impulse given by Shakespeare to the English drama. Within twenty years after Gascoigne's death were represented tragedy, history, and comedy that would have been without rivals had they not been surpassed, at a later date, by the mighty magician himself.

Authors, like coins, grow dear as they grow old;
It is the rust we value, not the gold—

Gascoigne had in his veins good blood, but, as is not unfrequently the case with well-born persons, wild blood also. He came of an ancient Yorkshire family; his father, Sir John, a younger son, being descended from that Sir William Gascoigne who has the credit—although in these searching and sceptical days the fact is questioned—of sending Henry Prince of Wales to prison for brawling in court. George, on his mother's side, was connected with the Frobisher family, one of whom—Martin—is chronicled among naval explorers and heroes, and who, after escaping many perils by land and sea, died at last by the visitation of a blundering surgeon. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, then newly established, but there is no record of his having graduated. Next he is found a student of Gray's Inn, where, if he were twenty-three years old, as he would be if born in 1545, he was old enough to know better than to be sentenced to "temporary durance on a charge of dicing and other disreputable practices." There can be little doubt that he wasted his substance in riotous living; for which, after getting to the end of paternal patience, he is said to have been cast off by his father. There is indeed good—that is to say, his own—testimony that he acted "the younker and the prodigal" until he was nearly forty years of age. For in some verses he wrote for Alexander Neville he confesses to much irregularity of conduct, but ascribes also, among the causes of his ruin, his poverty to the costliness of living in or about Court. Nor was his a solitary case. To keep at all in the Queen's graces, a courtier or a suitor needed good private means; him on whom she smiled she expected to wear the rental of one farm at least on his back, and to expend that of another on giving her Christmas-boxes and Easter-offerings.

For want of the peace to the wars I must go;
Oh! had I but money, it would not be so, sings the impecunious student encountered by Don Quixote on the highway. Similar emptiness of purse drove Gascoigne to the war in the Low Countries, which to gentlemen in difficulties was then much what the cure of Adulman had been in King David's time. A few years later Ben Jonson was to be seen there trailing a pike, and acquitting himself like a stalwart gentleman. Right valiantly also does George Gascoigne seem to have borne himself. But his project for improving his condition by taking some Spanish captain or colonel, and getting certain cruces for his ransom, failed entirely, since, like Jack Johnson, he was "taken himself instead of taking Widdin." Had he not possessed some influence—what we are not told—he ran a fair chance of spending some time, if not of dying, in a Spanish prison. Helped out of this scrape, he came home as poor as he left it, but perchance a wiser man. He certainly made a better use of his abilities than formerly; for he really set to work, and developed extraordinary fertility of brain, as will be seen in these portly Roxburghe volumes.

Even at home, when he returned in 1573, trouble awaited him. Through the indiscretion or ignorance of two brothers in the poetic craft some of his verses had scandalized the clergy, who, though not objecting to amorous ditties, like Beza's "Juvenilia," in good Latin, regarded such themes as unseemly in English. To clear himself of this rock of offence, Gascoigne in 1575 reprinted, improved, and added to his fugitive pieces, but his editor thinks did not do much towards expurgating them. If it were really so, we cannot see why there was any clamour at all, clerical or lay, unless wit is a moral offence, or several hundreds of verses, quite witless, are an aggravation of it. In his satiric verses the reader may now and then be reminded of Swift, oftener of "Prior's easy jingle." In 1578, a year after his decease, Gabriel Harvey enumerates among books "fit for the library of a Maid of Honour, the works of Gascoigne, Chaucer, and Surrey, with some medical books," from which it appears that the maid's shelves were stocked much in the same manner as the widow's who teased Sir Roger de Coverley. A criticism of Gascoigne in Hake's edition of his works, 1588, will perhaps express a modern reader's opinion of their character:—"Among the lesser late poets his works may be endured." As Mr. Hazlitt's is the first complete collection of Gascoigne's writings, and as there are some, though not very important, additions to them made by the present editor, the poet has one more chance of obtaining a hearing, though he may not find favour with Maids of Honour, who, we greatly fear, would, if they read him at all, hold him far below Tennyson or Browning—nay perhaps even below Martin Tupper.

AMERICAN LUNATIC ASYLUMS FROM WITHIN.*

IT has but rarely befallen us to undertake a literary office so painful as the study and review of this book—a description of American lunatic asylums by a lady who has endured a long experience of life "behind the bars." Some newspaper readers complain occasionally of the needless intrusion of painful or disgusting topics upon their notice; and when these are taken up wantonly in order to gratify a prurient curiosity, or furnish an exciting article, the strongest censure can hardly be too strong. But the effect of such censures is destroyed when they are applied to writers who deal with subjects which, however disagreeable in themselves, are matters of public concern calling for social or legislative action, and who treat them honestly, no matter how plainly, with a view to practical measures. Newspapers are not written only for women, or for men who, living in lettered leisure, or immersed in private business, concern themselves almost as little as women with the interests of the public. They address also politicians and philanthropists; the men who control the government of the State or of great social institutions; they are called upon to warn the community against abuses in either; and such abuses are nowhere so likely to flourish as under the shelter of that aversion which ordinary men feel to subjects at once difficult and disagreeable. English experiences have shown how grievously helpless people may suffer from the privacy which, for many good and some natural reasons, is allowed to conceal the interior of asylums; and we heartily welcome a book which, most unpleasant as its revelations are, depicts American asylums as they appear to a patient sane enough to note things exactly, judge them temperately, and relate them truthfully. We believe that the kinds of abuses described are comparatively rare in England. Physical brutality on the part of attendants in the cheaper class of asylums, public and private, does occur; and the only remark we feel it possible to make on an evil so inevitable where helpless men and women are at the mercy of uneducated attendants, is that there seems a want of due supervision and an inadequate severity of investigation when outrages are committed. The less gross, but much more systematic, cruelties of the American system are, we hope, strange to our practice. But it is doubtless true that much mischief may arise from the kind of mystery and secrecy which attends cases of insanity in this country, through the desire of families to conceal their occurrence. The author of Behind the Bars misses the chief reason of this desire—the fact that the hereditary character which often marks the disease causes it to be regarded as a sort of physical stigma on the family, damaging the chances of its members in marriage, which it is only natural that they should wish to conceal. There is probably much less of this feeling in America, where privacy is less respected and less strictly maintained in this as in all other domestic concerns. Nevertheless it would seem that we secure more of the benefits of publicity than our Transatlantic cousins. There, private asylums are controlled only by non-professional trustees, who are necessarily at the mercy of the medical staff; here, they are inspected by an authority in which the profession is admirably represented, and to which the physician of the asylum is compelled to defer. The securities against the imprisonment of sane persons which exist in England, inadequate as they are, appear to be neglected in America; and relatives seem to be able to immure an apparently unsound person without the sanction of any public authority or independent medical certificate.

The first great characteristic of the American system appears to be that it is a system; that, instead of adapting treatment to the patient's condition, all patients are compelled to conform to a rigid scheme of regulations resembling those of a prison rather than of a hospital, and in some important respects more merciless than those of American prisons, severe as these are. This prison character pervades all the arrangements of the asylum; bolts and bars everywhere meet the eye, and the one dominant thought in the mind of the medical men and attendants is obviously the prevention of escape. Detention, according to the writer, is needlessly and cruelly prolonged. An amount of physical restraint is employed which would not be allowed by our Lunacy Commissioners in any ordinary cases; and it is applied with an indiscriminate recklessness which, unless greatly exaggerated, we must call simply atrocious. Here, as elsewhere, we must allow the author to speak for herself, feeling that her own words are more forcible than our rendering of them, and that much of the effect of her book depends upon the internal evidence of truthfulness:—

Let us look at this "very insane woman." Tell us her history. "Depressed or excited?" Strangely "depressed"—a mistress of a happy home—a mother of a family, but fallen into sadness, wearied, aggrieved, dependant, "run down," yet gentle, harmless, tractable as a child. There are so many of such cases! So many worn-out wives and mothers, over whom depression draws itself suddenly like a veil, like a cloud that obscures the sun for a season! And what is the treatment for such? To-night, if not to-day, that lady will be bound; chert, arms, hands, will become pressed, tied into a sleeved corset, as it seems, only it is rough, like tow-cloth, and she will be told to go to sleep. This new garment, this unusual style of habilliment, this of itself is sufficient to "murder sleep."

She does not sleep, and must pay the penalty. She is watched if she turns, if she struggles to get free, if she strives to rise, if she weeps. She is reported upon, and morning comes with its accusing record written in a "Watch-Book" for the physician's eye of "no sleep;" and through grief, wakefulness, waiting, watching, homesickness, bewilderment, the poor woman is made more frantic with torture and opposition to nature. She is locked into this building. Yesterday at home, with the world to choose from, cherished, indulged, tended with love, with liberty—to-day she is ordered, tortured, harassed, locked up, tied down; to-night perhaps worse befalls, and to make all safe and sure she is tied to a bed!

Another prison regulation, of all others the most unfit for an asylum, where sleep is of such vital moment and so difficult to secure, among nervous patients whom sleeplessness may throw into delirium, and who are peculiarly liable to be startled, is enforced at least in some asylums. The thing would be incredible if we could believe that the writer could have gratuitously invented it:—

A dependant or credulous patient will fasten on himself accusing thoughts of settled disease, without hope, from the absolute inability to sleep; but one sufficiently strong to hold his own opinion will refute all such vagaries, knowing that not the whole medical faculty itself could withstand the ordeal of watch-attendants; which amounts to this, that a person does not sleep because he is awakened.

These watch-attendants carry lanterns, and this is the delightful use for which they employ them. A patient is put to bed at nine o'clock—the regular hour for retiring—and woe to that patient who is found lagging behind the rule. Out goes the light, and ladies or gentlemen who at home act their own pleasure and direct their servants are here ordered off like children to bed in the dark, and find themselves changing places with servants. Indeed the manners of some of these Yankee attendants are hardly on a footing with those of the higher Irish servants. There is a certain courtesy and a suavity among these last which are not always found in New England, and the courtesy of Erin is lost sight of in the coarseness of Vermont manners. The patient may have just fallen off into a doze, or he may be "doing well" in the achievement of sleep, and by a simple and natural let-alone process he might remain thus the entire night. But presently his ear catches the sound, not yet the sight, of the lantern, clink clink, rattle rattle, as it swings from the attendant's hand, through the long gallery, at the door of every patient, until it stops at his own; then the shadow throws its length upon the wall or ceiling, and then it dangles in his very face; the murky light pries boldly into his eyeballs, which are reared from their sockets in a moment; he looks at watcher and lantern in silence and bewilderment, and the vision, having satisfied itself that he is awake, vanishes for another hour. Thus, you see, reader, they wake the patient up to see if he is asleep.

In one way after another the patients are, if the writer may be believed, needlessly and cruelly thwarted and annoyed. Any friendships among them are strictly forbidden and repressed, and if even "rational" patients of the same sex show any preference for each other's company, they are at once separated as effectually as possible, and forbidden even to speak if they meet. All conversation too lively for the understanding of part American housemaids or dull male attendants is rebuked as "crazy talk," and treated as a proof of increased insanity; and this among patients many of whom would not be consigned to an asylum in any country but America. Tears and depression, most natural among women separated from their families and confined behind bolts and bars, are treated either as a crime or as proof of madness, according to the temper of attendant or physician. The author tells one pitiful story of this kind, which she describes as one instance among hundreds:—

I remember one instance connected with this nature which is worthy of a record, since it illustrates in a most striking form the rigidity of the system. One of the patients occupied a very high room, from the window of which she could look down upon the avenue leading to the house, and from which she saw the visitors who came into the front entrance. One day she saw her husband pass from the house, and proceed to untie his horse, which she also recognised, that stood at the door. What would have been the act of any reasonable human being at such a moment under such circumstances? What impulse stronger than reason, what touchstone of the emotions would have kindled revolution? The same that governed this insane woman, who, from behind the bars of her prison beheld, for the first time for two years, the living portrait of her husband.

She threw up the window and called to him loudly, but it was of no avail; and, besides, what man would stop to listen to the cry or shout from the walls of an insane asylum? But this woman paid the penalty of her anguish; for, as if the doom of not being satisfied were not enough, she was presently ordered from her room, by an attendant who had witnessed the act, and for the rest of that day she was turned out and locked out of her room, and moreover, threatened with a dark room below stairs, if she did not cease to express her tribulation. Yet she did not faint or scream, or behave violently, as an insane woman might have been expected to do, or as a woman of the world would most likely do. She only shed a few natural tears, and these told their own story.

One whole chapter is devoted to an account of the food given to the patients. These, be it remembered, are people mostly in delicate health, with fastidious appetites; and they pay at a rate which ought to secure them at least as much of comfort and indulgence in this respect as they enjoyed at home, where of course every care was taken to find something they could eat and like. But we are told that their fare at the asylum from which the writer's facts are gathered is such as only ploughboys could eat, and as even ploughboys or paupers would not eat save under compulsion. Bread marked with black streaks, rancid butter, tea and coffee viler than those of our worst railway buffets, form the staple of breakfast and supper, and the dinner is no better. If the patient shrinks from this nauseous rubbish, and eats less than satisfies the attendant's standard of appetite, he is tied down and fed with liquids of a similar quality, by a process which we spare the reader. We need not proceed with this description of what the author calls a hell on earth. The only questions to be asked are, first, how such things are possible; and next, how far they are common to the generality of American private asylums?

The same facts furnish a reply to both questions. We learn that it is a universal rule that communication with friends is utterly forbidden in private, though not in State, asylums. This is not an exceptional restriction, applied with extreme reluctance in a few instances, but a part of the horrible "system" which the author describes. That it is wholly needless and inexcusable the contrary practice of the public asylums proves, and our own ablest and most respected medical men would be the first to proclaim. Indeed, we write partly in the hope that the attention of such men as Dr. Forbes Winslow may be called to this work, and that some utterance of their opinion may awaken the profession and the public in America to a sense of the barbarity and folly of the antiquated practice still tolerated among them. Wherever visits from friends are discouraged, and writing to them forbidden, as a rule of the asylum, it is right to suspect abuse. There can be no honest reason for such a rule. Frequent visits might in many cases be undesirable; letters might be wild and extravagant; but the friends of a lunatic understand his condition, and are but too ready to accept the doctor's explanations and assurances. They ought to insist on visiting the sufferer at pleasure and without notice. Nothing else can prevent abuse; nothing else can operate so effectively in keeping the machinery of the asylum up to the mark, or ought to be so frankly welcomed by a conscientious physician, who knows that anything in his practice which he dare not avow to the friends of a patient must be wrong, and who must desire to have the assistance of their visits in keeping his subordinates to their duty. Lastly, nothing else will prevent dishonest principals from keeping a cured patient in prison—for such the asylum is to a convalescent—for the sake of his fees; and dishonest men are to be found in all professions. Moreover, it is the natural tendency of medical men conversant with insanity, as our criminal courts are constantly proving, to exaggerate the symptoms of mental unsoundness, and to find them in men quite able to conduct themselves rationally in everyday life; and this tendency operates as strongly in the case of convalescent lunatics as of persons for the first time suspected of lunacy. Our last extract shall contain one of the writer's shrewdest observations on this tendency:—

Indeed, the patients of an insane asylum find it a very nice and difficult thing to guard their spirits and emotions, and evenly balance their deportment, where every word is weighed and tested, so as to keep within the befitting moral precincts of pretty stiff opinion and judgment on the part of doctors and attendants. Between these two comprehensive latitudes of "excited" and "depressed" it seems almost impossible to escape calumny. From the many minor forms of detraction currently waiting upon the patient's condition, those given below are familiar terms, and it is a very common thing for the attendants to stand at a window from the gallery looking upon the yard, while the patients are taking their airing, and comment with an official, semi-professional tone upon the quality and vent of the patient's madness on that particular day. The east winds are proverbially nipping and eager in the sweet localities of some of our best asylums, and the poor inmate who must take them, for he is driven out whether he will or no, is glad to walk as fast as possible to try to catch a glow that this wind does not easily kindle; indeed, were he not a madman and sane enough to know better he might run—that is, if he were out in the world, where he would not appear singular—and the erraticism might find charity. As it is he is branded as follows, as the case may be:—If a patient walks pretty fast, "So-and-so is very excited to-day—see how fast he goes." If a slow one appears, he is "depressed;" if a talkative one, "somewhat exhilarated;" if quiet and apart from company, "in one of their moods." Why not use a lazier phrase, being in a condition of lunacy, and call it one of their moods? If a patient be downcast, morbid is a good word for him. If tears show themselves, "emotional" is only too expressive. If a decided dejection is visible, "very suicidal" cannot be served upon him too quickly. Indeed, is it not rather hard upon the patient to brand him with that criminal seer, suicide, because he is a helpless wretch in the last condition of factious hopelessness, for the reason that he cannot get into the world, not out of it? We do not mean to express a doubt that there are private asylums in America much better than those described by the author. But we may be sure that, while the only supervision exercised is that of local non-professional trustees making visits at fixed times or after notice given, there will be many as bad as she paints them; and that the prohibition of the visits of friends and of correspondence with the patient is strong prima facie ground for believing that any given asylum belongs to the latter class.

DARBOUR'S BRUCE.*

THE Preface, Notes, and Glossarial Index promised in the title-page are kept back till Mr. Skeat gives us the remainder of the text of Barbour. We will therefore not say a word about either the author or his editor from any philological point of view, but simply make a few remarks suggested by the history, or rather mythology, of this remarkable poem. A great part of the matter of Barbour must be familiar to many who never read a word of his own text, because so many of his stories have found their way into Sir Walter Scott's Tales of a Grandfather. We remember the tales well many years ago, before we had begun to think whence they came or how far they were to be believed. Scott, we now think, treated his grandson rather unfairly in the matter. He did not tell Barbour's story throughout as Barbour gives it. Scottish patriotism itself could not venture to fly in the face of undoubted truth in quite so daring a way as that. A grandfather, of all men, talking to his grandson, could not venture on the daring confusion of the relation between grandfather and grandson on which Barbour's whole story hangs. In Barbour's legend, King Robert distinctly appears in the character of his own grandfather. The victor of Bannockburn is made out to be one and the same person with the original competitor for the Scottish Crown. When a writer starts with such a daring falsehood as this, we at once know what value to attach to the details of his story. They may be true, as this or that thing in the Iliad or the Nibelungen may be true, but we have no more certainty that they are true than if they were found in the Iliad or the Nibelungen. In a certain way we put less trust in Barbour than we put in the Iliad or the Nibelungen, for the wide difference between myth and conscious falsehood must not be forgotten, and it is quite impossible not to discern conscious falsehood, if not in the Archdeacon of Aberdeen himself, at any rate in some informant whom he trusted. Neither in the Greek nor the Teutonic poem do we ever suspect that any facts have been altered to suit a political purpose. But it certainly is staggering when we come to such daring misrepresentations as those which we find in Barbour, in a writer who might easily have spoken to men who were actors in the scenes in which he speaks. A man who wrote in 1375 cannot be acquitted, if not of conscious falsehood, at least of crassa ignorantia, of following the wrong story when he must have had means of knowing the right, when he confounded the two Roberts, grandfather and grandson, and ascribed to the compound monster thus formed words and deeds which were certainly never said or done by either of them. In itself the confusion is perhaps not greater than when Mr. Croker—we think it was Mr. Croker, it certainly was some one of whom Lord Macaulay made sport—confounded Sir William Wyndham of the days of Walpole with the William Windham of the days of the younger Pitt. But there is no reason to believe that the confusion between the two Wyndhams was due to any political motive, while the motive for confounding the two Bruces is obvious enough. Now here comes our complaint against Scott. He had knowledge enough and honesty enough not to follow Barbour in making King Robert out to have been his own grandfather; but he did not scruple to fill his book with tales which, as they rest on the authority of Barbour, must by the critical historian be pronounced to rest on no authority at all. After such a beginning as Barbour makes, his unsupported assertion goes for nothing; his stories may be true, but we cannot accept them as true, or even as likely to be true, unless they have some further confirmation in the shape either of external or internal evidence. When Barbour deals with the known facts of history we can of course test him by comparing him with authentic writers. In a large part of his story, especially when he gives us the details of the hairbreadth escapes of his hero, we have no such means of testing him, and we are driven to the test of internal evidence. Sometimes, just as in the case of the Iliad, we can get hold of such internal evidence. The mere fact that the lawful Scottish King, the assenter of Scottish national rights, the darling hero of the Scottish people, is set before us by his own poet as being constantly in danger of death at the hands of Scottish enemies, is in itself worth something. Barbour of course tells these stories to enhance the glory of Robert, and to heighten the wickedness of the black traitors who opposed him. To us they suggest a somewhat different thought; it would almost seem as if Robert Bruce was always in danger the moment he set foot anywhere near the borders of what was really Scotland. In fact, may there not be some ground for the statement which we once heard a daring man make—namely that, in the wars of Edward the

First, the Scots were ever faithful to their father and lord against the Norman and English rebels under Robert Earl of Comyn?

The Archdeacon begins with a magnificent panegyric on historical truth, coupled with his own purpose of strictly adhering to it. Presently he tells us how, after the death of Alexander the Third,

The land vi ser, and mayr gar fay
Lay desolat eftir hys day.

It is only then, after the six years, that the Barons come together to choose a King. In authentic history somewhat more than three years passed between the death of Alexander in Lent 1286 and the coronation of John of Balliol on St. Andrew's day, 1292. And it was a busy time enough, between the nominal reign of the Maid of Norway, the assertion of the claims of the endless competitors, the long pleadings in the Court of the Lord Superior, the final decision of a most fairly constituted tribunal in favour of the lawful heir. The point in dispute between the houses of Balliol and Bruce is altogether misstated by Barbour. Bruce is daringly affirmed to have been the representative of the male line, and the question is made to be one between male and female succession. Every one knows that the real question lay between John of Balliol, the grandson of the eldest sister, and Robert of Bruce, the son of the second. Then, by a daring contempt of chronology, King Edward, in 1290, is asked to come back from the Holy Land, which he had left in 1272, and, by a further self-contradiction, the Scots are told that they ought to have been aware of Edward's love of rule, as shown by his dealings with Wales and Ireland. When he is come from Palestine, Edward is made to offer the crown to Robert of Bruce, and Robert—the loyal Englishman, who so willingly admitted King Edward as his sovereign lord and Emperor—refuses it unless he can hold it freely; but, as John of Balliol is ready to hold it on such terms as the King of England pleases, it is adjudged to him. More shameless falsehood was never put on paper; the only question is whether the Archdeacon or some one to whom he listened was the conscious liar. It is inconceivable that any one who had taken the smallest pains to find out the truth could have really believed that Robert Bruce the competitor was the same person as Robert Bruce the King. It is equally inconceivable that such a one could have really believed in a misrepresentation of Edward's conduct so glaring in every point.

In the like spirit we get this description of the forfeiture or resignation of John of Balliol:—

He was King bot A liill quhill;
And through gret subtilte and ghyll,
For liill oncheone or nane,
He was arrestyt syne and tane,
And degradyt syne was he
Off honour and off dignite.

Who would see in this account the appeals brought against John by his own subjects, his treacherous dealings with France, his renunciation of his allegiance, his invasion of England, the battle of Dunbar, the march to Perth, the final abdication?

Of William Wallace there is not a word. Two suns could not be endured in the same heaven nor two lions on the same shield. Then comes the legend about Bruce, Comyn, the indenture, the escape from London, all which it should be remembered is, as Dr. Lingard pointed out long ago with grim humour, made yet more romantic in Hume than it is in Barbour. It is allowed that the slaying of Comyn was a sin, but rather, it would seem, on account of the sacrilege than on account of the murder. Nothing is said of the murder of Robert Comyn by Bruce's satellite, Christopher Seton; but when Christopher was afterwards executed for the murder, we have a great lamentation over "so worthy persons as he," and a legend of one Maknab who betrayed him. Another daring falsehood is that Robert Bruce's wife was put in prison:—

And put the lady in prison,
Sum in-till castle, sum in dangrene.

Instead of this she was sent with an honourable attendance to one of her husband's English manors. Edward is also made to order the hanging the Kildrummie prisoners on his death-bed, whereas they had been hanged more than a year before.

This is perhaps enough to show what the value of Barbour is as an historical document. But it suggests a good many thoughts. A large part of the adventures ascribed to Robert Bruce is doubtless honest legend; much of it may really have happened; at any rate it is the kind of thing which is likely to have happened, and the particular stories are such as are sure to grow up in such a case. But the kind of thing of which we have hitherto been speaking is not honest legend, but deliberate falsehood, not necessarily on the part of Barbour, but either of Barbour or of some person unknown. We might wonder that falsehoods which could be so easily exposed should have been ventured on so soon. But the history of our own times shows how easily either wilful falsehood or mere confusion gets accepted instead of truth. Many people honestly believe that Louis Napoleon put down the Reds in July 1848. They not only believe it, but they look on those who think otherwise as very ignorant. To be made to believe that Robert Bruce was his own grandfather is a trifle by the side of this. In these days perhaps no one would put such a statement in a book; we have seen odd statements in books about very recent affairs, but none perhaps quite equal to this. Yet the enormous number of the Times about Prussia being admitted into the Zollverein did not fall very far short of it. That Scottish men should stupidly; but, whether a misstatement taken from honest stupidity or from wilful invention, the phenomenon of people being got to believe it is exactly the same in either case. And let no one draw the hasty moral that history is a mass of lies. Such a conclusion is pre-eminently a hasty one; it is the belief of a man who has not studied history long enough or thoroughly enough to get the critical test which distinguishes truth from falsehood. The philosophical value of Barbour we leave for the present to Mr. Skeat; his historical value, as an authority for facts, is as low as value can be; but his story is really precious as a contribution to the study of the human mind, as showing what wild fables men can be brought to believe very soon after the time when the alleged facts are said to have happened.

WILFRID CUMBERMEDE.*

DR. MACDONALD'S latest novel might be reviewed on four separate counts; as a religious essay; as a romance partly mystic, partly mysterious; as a study of character and conduct of men and women of the present day; or as a work of art. Any one of these might be assumed as the object for which the story was constructed; but this complexity does not strengthen the interest of the book. On the contrary, the very uncertainty of the ground-plan gives a shifty and insecure character to the tale; while vagueness of plot, a rambling style of narration, long drifts of mystical maundering and hysterical piety, and a singular effeminacy of tone of thought, brings each its own special source of weakness to attenuate still further the work of a writer whose sins have never lain on the side of robustness, though his virtues have always been those of grace and purity. The most undesirable source of weakness among them all is the fatal habit of breaking up the narrative by long pages of religious discussion, and by minute descriptions of certain allegorical dreams, which are meant to have either a deep spiritual significance or to be prophetic of future events, but which are simply blots on the work as a work of art, and obstructions to the story as an interesting tale. But as there are certain discrepancies of statement which seem to denote haste or carelessness of workmanship, perhaps these lengthy parentheses, which flow so glibly, are only padding to gain time, and save the trouble of closer construction and better balanced composition. They are easy writing, if they produce the traditional effect of hard reading.

The first volume of Wilfrid Cumbermede is a strange thing to come from the hands of a man. A large part of it is taken up by the vague memories, the dreamy fancies, and the scientific ignorance of a very young child; and it closes with the dreams and fancies of a school-boy of fourteen. We are used to this kind of thing from lady writers; but we confess that it strikes us as scarcely in harmony with the dignified character of a learned doctor to bestow so much time and pains on what is substantially of so little value either as a psychological study or a matter of art. In early life it seems that the autobiographer, Wilfrid Cumbermede, has a profound awe and love for trees, and a deep conviction that they make the wind; indeed he believes that he himself by shaking his hair can also make the wind; and we have a great many paragraphs devoted to this view of natural flatulency. About this time—we conjecture the youthful experimenter to have been some three years old—he finds a pendulum which had been made by a scientific ancestor, and which has a catch and a groan in its inside, not well understood. By setting this pendulum going, the child imagines that he and the trees together can make a dreadful quantity of wind; and as a fearful storm arises immediately on his doing so, he is fully convinced that he and the pendulum have found out the secret of tempests, and that he can arouse, if not allay them, at pleasure. During the height of the storm there comes to the house a man who never seems to grow any older all through the book; and of whom the autobiographer gives, from his childish recollections, the accurate description of a trained physiologist, even to the shape and position of his ears and the conformation of his thumb. Him he imagines to be the Prince of the Powers of the Air come to carry him off to make his skin into bagpipes. In point of fact he is only a sharp local attorney, anxious to induce Wilfrid's uncle and guardian to take up a long dormant claim, and to regain certain old family lands and possessions which had wrongfully passed into another branch. And what of plot or story Wilfrid Cumbermede contains belongs to this right, and its gradual development.

The child has also a mysterious attraction for an old sword, which plays a prominent, if not important, part in the narrative; and he is once taken up a flight of stairs into the presence of another and a living mystery—his grandma, or rather his great grandmother—who is more important than prominent, and to whom much in the story is, characteristically, owing. For Wilfrid Cumbermede is quite in harmony with himself when he dwells on the life and sayings of a dotting old grandma, as matters of supreme importance. The strange accident which befalls this second Excalibur, this mystic sword with which so much of the story seems somehow to be connected, belongs to the romantic and mysterious aspect of the tale. When Wilfrid has grown old enough to leave off shaking his hair to make the wind, and even to have doubts as to the power of the pendulum, he is sent to school; and one day, while rambling with the rest of the boys in the woods belonging to Moldwarp Hall, a certain rosy-cheeked apple falls at his feet. The other boys have all gallantly resisted the temptation of stealing this apple, but Wilfrid cannot. Accordingly, he picks it up and bites it; but his teeth have no sooner met in the juicy flesh than he feels all the torments of Adam's guilt, and rushes off to the Hall to entreat Sir Giles Brotherton, the owner, "to box his ears." It gives a strangely clear insight into the quality of Dr. MacDonald's own mind that when, very many years afterwards, Wilfrid finds out that he is the rightful owner of Moldwarp Hall, his first thought is that the apple he appropriated as a child was in reality his own. To a critic who can read indications, this one instance of morbid conscientiousness, of sickly introspection, and the very puerility of remorse, gives the keynote to the whole. By his desire to have his ears boxed Wilfrid Cumbermede gets invited to Moldwarp Hall, where the housekeeper behaves oddly to him when she hears who he is. And here he loses Excalibur. For, on a future visit, when he is asked to sleep there—and when he has taken this huge sword with him, which was such a very likely thing for a small schoolboy to have done—in the middle of the night he is sent into a fainting fit by the moving of a certain piece of newer Gobelins let into some old tapestry, the protrusion of a mailed hand and arm through the gap there made, then the entrance of a figure armed cap à pie, and then a long arm stretched out towards the bed. In the morning the sword has vanished. It turns up again, however, in future pages, in the Moldwarp armoury, duly labelled and described as belonging to the family collection. The possession of this sword, an old MS. volume, the fact that at the Mont, Wilfrid's home, a piece of old tapestry exactly fits the place where the newer Gobelins has been inserted into the old tapestry at Moldwarp Hall, and an entry in a parish register, clumsily covered by a forgery, are among the most conclusive proofs that Wilfrid Cumbermede is the rightful possessor of Moldwarp Hall. But as, by the time he has made his case clear, the girl he loves, Mary Osborne, has married the man he hates, Geoffrey Brotherton, the present possessor of the estate, he lets his claim lie in abeyance until Geoffrey obligingly dies, when he hopes to gain both Mary and his suit.

His love affair with Mary Osborne belongs also in some measure to the mystical part of the story. We know little of her save that she is the sister of Charley, Wilfrid's bosom friend, and the sickliest, least satisfactory young man we have met for a long time. Wilfrid, sleeping again at Moldwarp Hall when, a grown man, he has volunteered to arrange and catalogue the library under conditions which no man who respected himself or knew the world, as an Oxonian must have done, would have accepted, occupies again the chamber where, as a child, his sword had been taken from him. Here he has a dream of a lovely maiden whom he calls Athanasia, who penetrates his soul, has something to do with death, and causes him mingled ecstasy and anguish. When he wakes he finds his Athanasia, as Mary Osborne, fast asleep by his side, and the naked sword on the counterpane between them; on which he escapes in his shirt, and dresses à fresco on the leads by the chimney-stack, making his washing-basin of a little pool of rain-water he finds in a depression of the leads. We do not hear what he uses as a towel, or how he manages for soap and tooth-brush. We do hear, however, that he leaves one of his shoes behind him in the bedroom, and that Mary drops there her ring; and that he is seen crowding the leads with the sword, which he carries off to his own home, and which consequently he has to restore as a theft, and suffer the imputation of being a thief. So that the whole episode is a muddle, and as ineffectual as it is both silly and inartistic.

As an allegory the character of Charley Osborne may have its uses, possibly its merits; as the portrait of an average English gentleman, we have seldom seen anything more unpleasant or less lifelike. Effeminate and unreal as is Wilfrid, he is a hero by the side of a miserable creature who, as a boy, nearly goes into a fit because everything looks blue and ghastly in an ice cavern; as a man, sinks into the worst form of craven despair when he has been seduced by Brotherton into carnal sin; as a thinking being, takes up with reckless atheism because his father is a narrow Christian; and finally commits suicide because he misapprehends a scene between his lover and his friend. Yet on this miserable creature Dr. MacDonald, as Wilfrid, has lavished a more than womanish tenderness, and his passionate apostrophes to "My Charley, oh, my Charley!" with his dreams of angelic Charlies standing on heavenly roses, and the like, will cause some of his male readers amusement and others disgust, as temperament may direct. But as Dr. MacDonald writes professedly for women, seeing that he always speaks of the reader as "she," perhaps he will be indifferent to the verdict of the coarser masculine world; and, provided his female admirers remain steady to their worship, will willingly brave the contempt which all manly-minded men must feel for the false sentimentality, the misty vagueness, and want of grip which are his besetting sins as a novelist. They are characteristic, however, which please a certain style of women; and even Wilfrid Cumbermede will find its admirers.

Among the very few tangible opinions given in this work, we may count as about the most distinct the belief that every living thing has an immortal soul, and that, so far from the future of man being a great negation, the future of dogs, and birds, and horses—we suppose also of midges and infusoria; for where can the line be drawn?—is as real and eternal as man's. This doctrine is repeated with fuller force in the matter of Lilith, a white horse of some importance and wonderful intelligence; and the man's dictum that Lilith has not gone to the worms clinches the boy's argument, which was to the effect that, though Charley had once killed a little bird, he could still "beg its pardon" for having shot it, seeing that the bird lived in the spirit world, and that its death was not its destruction. If this doctrine is true, we trust we are not profane in hoping that the souls of beasts may undergo a considerable amount of purification, and that from our parent ascidians, through extinct races of pre-historic monsters and microscopic diatoms, up to lions and tigers on the one hand and fleas and bugs on the other, we shall find a well-behaved spiritual museum, where spiders' webs will not catch flies, and boas will refrain from bolting rabbits.

We cannot say that Wilfred Cumbermede is in any way an advance on Dr. MacDonald's former work. As art, it is scratchy, vague, confused, and without central interest or sustained effort; as philosophy, it is weak, fanciful, and muddle-headed; as a story of modern life, it is simply farcical; and its portraiture can scarcely be dealt with seriously. For indeed it is difficult to determine whether the characters are meant as mere emblems or as possible men and women. If the former, they are outside the pale, if the latter, they are below the dignity, of grave or careful life criticism. Such beings as Wilfred Cumbermede and Charley Osborne are not according to any type of sane living Englishmen known to us; while the two girls, Clara and Mary, are as unreal as the men. Dr. MacDonald has a fine fancy, keen sensibility, subtle thought, and undeniable grace, but he wants backbone and manliness. David Elginbrod was his best book, because his simplest and most natural; but since then he has been gradually and steadily deteriorating, till he has sunk at last into a state of hysterical sentimentality to which no living author of any note affords a parallel, and which has its parallel only in the bygone Rosa Matilda school of gush and moonshine.

CHEAP SCHOOL BOOKS.*

THE dawn of a cheaper education is breaking. One of the economic puzzles of parents alive to the value of a liberal education has hitherto been how to keep in check the half-yearly book bill, which is an unwelcome supplement to professedly inclusive terms. In our own early youth, when William IV. was King, we distinctly recollect a form of boys between twelve and thirteen years of age being supplied with Bloomfield's Greek Testament, a couple of thick octavos, the main portion of the contents of which was learned and voluminous annotation quite beyond the comprehension of tiros not long out of Greek Delectus. And still, after nearly two score years have passed, we witness the same want of consideration for the interests of parents and pupils as regards this matter, even at the best of our public schools. Though it can scarcely be supposed that in the present day the low motive of discount and percentages has ought to do with this phenomenon, it is not the less true that schoolboys bring home a single volume of Grote (in the octavo shape), or an instalment of the Bibliotheca Classica, the expense of which has been inflicted upon unwitting parents simply for the sake of the pupil's reading three or four chapters of the one, and perhaps a play or a book of the other. In such cases the pupil sets no store by books which, being but parts of a set, represent no addition to a library; and hence, when the next term comes, he either lays them by in neglect, or haply disposes of them for a mere song to swell the catalogues of second-hand booksellers. Excepting to the studious few in a sixth form, or to candidates for honours at the Universities, it may be confidently said that costly and elaborate school books are useless, and it is a matter of fact that at the end of a term the rank and file of schoolboys are as innocent of the contents of an editor's notes and commentary as they are of his name and pretensions. It is enough for them if they can construe the text, and any annotatory light upon it comes to them, if it comes at all, from an exceptionally inquiring schoolfellow.

Such being the case, it is cruelty to books of real merit, cruelty to boys of ordinary type, and cruelty, moreover, to parents' pockets, to give out expensive editions of the classics for school use. There is much to be said in favour of thorough lexicons, dictionaries of antiquities, mythology and biography, atlases, and such-like books of reference. These to a working student may remain a crux sic ac when school and college days are over, and if idlers fail to use them at firsthand, they may descend to younger brothers, or even come in useful for the home library. But we have long felt that a reform was needed as regards the character and cost of text-books. The interests of all concerned require that handy and well prepared selections from the authors usually read in schools should be the rule, and not the exception, of a boy's literary outfit. As it is well put in the prospectus of the series now lying before us:—

School books are seldom preserved for any length of time. They are exposed to many accidents, and if they survive these in a presentable form, they often become obsolete before they reach the hands of another generation. At the same time they often contain much more than, as a matter of fact, can be made use of. Small books, sold at a low price, which would serve for a term or a half-year, and would be read from beginning to end, would, it is thought, be found by parents to effect an economy in what is often a heavy expense.

All honour to the publishers who, having such clear and unselfish views, adventure upon the path of cheap and yet sound and solid school literature with a simple trust in a ready response to their disinterestedness. To produce Latin and English selections from the classic of both tongues, so well and exquisitely printed, so strongly bound, so sensibly annotated, as the four samples that lie before us, involves a very considerable expense, and we should be sorry to attempt an exact calculation of the number of copies of each which must be sold before the scheme can pay, or a profit be realized. It will be of more service to the promoters of the series to assist in giving publicity to the volumes of it which have already appeared, and which strike us as presenting a more uniform excellence than any of the cheaper series of classics likely to come into competition with them. We have not a word to say against the "Oxford Pocket Classics," which are mostly supplemented with short notes; and there are a good many volumes in what is known as Weale's Series which supply a wonderful mass of condensed information in notes and commentary. Messrs. Seeley's "Cheap School Books" do not clash with these, inasmuch as they profess to be selections. In portability, and in beauty of typography, they certainly bear off the palm; and it is no little matter to furnish the schoolboy with a really pocket volume, which may accompany his walks, and of which the print and paper may, by their perfection, charm him into close and familiar acquaintance.

It is fair to give precedence to Mr. Church's "Ovid," because he has the credit of having suggested the series. His co-editor in the History, and Germany, and Agricola of Tacitus, and in the Epistles of Pliny, for which well edited editions we had a word of commendation as they severally appeared, is the editor of a volume of selections from Horace's Odes, with which it would be very hard to find a fault. And Mr. Butler's selections from Cæsar have the signal merit of reproducing for the perusal of English boys that particular part of Cæsar's Commentaries which ought to command their interest as a very early page of British history. But, without being invidious, we set most value on the selections from Ovid, as well because they are excellently chosen with an eye to memorabilia of the poet himself and of the early annals and legends of his country, as because Ovid's elegiac poetry cannot be too much studied and learned by rote by young Latinists, with a view to proficiency in verse-writing. And yet it would never do to let a schoolboy loose upon the Amores and the Ars Amandi. He must be limited to selections, and the purveyor of selections which shall be at the same time choice and inoffensive confers a great boon on young students of Ovid. No choice could be happier than that of Mr. Church. His first extract should be committed to heart as an elegant and succinct account of Ovid himself and his literary contemporaries. The better and less known poets of the Augustan period are passed one by one in review, the name of each being cleverly coupled with the works that made it famous. The same kind of grouping is adopted, in the case of Greek and Roman poets in the second extract, an apology from the Amores for the devotion to poetry which some take for indolence. Homer, Hesiod, Callimachus, Sophocles, Aratus, are criticized in a single couplet each. The Roman Gallus is associated with his Lycoris, and the lasting fame of Virgil is prophesied in a couple of lines, which are pregnant with compliment to the poet and the Empire:—

Roma triumphati dum caput orbis erit.

It would have been well if Mr. Church had given a note about Gallus, and connected him with the tenth eclogue of Virgil for the information of young readers, but we suppose that he of set purpose withholds such information as may be easily got by access to a classical dictionary. Certainly he is never wanting in the best sort of assistance where there is a legitimate difficulty. Thus in the lament over Tibullus (Amores, iii. 9), p. 18, vv. 55-6, where, after his wont, Ovid has pictured the other poets he has known, in Elysium, he adds:—

His comes umbra tua est. Signa est modo corporis umbra, Auxisti numeros, culte Tibulle, pios.

Here a schoolboy might doubt, if he thought about the matter, what was the exact sense of "numeros." Mr. Church translates the word "companies," and in another rather difficult couplet of the poem about the death of Corinna's parrot applies the same rendering (alternatively) to the same word. Ovid wrote thus:—

Optima prima fere manibus rapiuntur avaris.
Implentur numeros deteriora suis.

And it is probable that in both instances he meant the same thing, and that a military term. An apt parallel is furnished to the former passage by Mr. Church's comparison of Lygdamus, 178-9:—

There entertain him all the ætials above
In solemn troops, and sweet societies.

Generally, throughout his brief notes, the editor strikes us as a "full man" judiciously giving out of his abundance just such needful help to the pupil as will be easily carried away, and at the same time set him thinking and inquiring. The distinction between "agere" and "ferre" in plauding (vi. 61), the information about the form and shape and essential of a Roman book when properly turned out by the bibliopole (viii. 7-12), are instances of this, and on the whole we prefer this direct mode of enlightenment to that which we observe Mr. Butler makes use of in his notes to Cæsar—the interrogative mode, as we may call it. The latter, upon c. 2, "Ad eum legati veniunt, qui polliceantur obsides dare atque imperio populi Romani obtemperare," gives the following note:—

Qui polliceantur. Not "who promise," but "to promise." Why? Dare. The more usual construction would be—what?

We fancy schoolboys will think there is a time and place for all things, and that questions should be asked in class; information in notes categorically given. A map of the theatre of operations would be an improvement to the selections from Cæsar.

We would fain hope that the Milton of this series is the forerunner of other equally well chosen selections from other British classics, to the end that English schoolboys may be freed from the stigma of knowing more about Latin and Greek poets than about those of their own land. Mr. Huckin's prefatory notice of our great epic poet is singularly neat and pointed. Such data as the Swedish envoy's mot, "There is but one man in England who can write Latin, and he is blind," as the story that his most brilliant passages were composed by night, and as Dryden's comparison of Milton with Homer and Dante are just the points to lay hold of a boy's imagination, and to form pegs on which to hang the essentials of the poet's biography. And the poems given—namely, Comus, Lycidas, L'Allegro, Il Penseroso, and ten picked sonnets—are calculated to inspire a lad of any taste or culture with a desire to acquaint himself with the other and more famous works of our English epic poet; especially since the way is smoothed, and the study of these selected poems made alike easy and agreeable, by interesting and attractive notes on the rhythm and the language of their author. The committal to memory of parts of Comus and the whole of Lycidas will be less irksome when it is made clear to the learner that such a line as Comus, 474, is an Alexandrine, admissible because "the thought and sound accord," and when he is taught in a brief note how to scan Lycidas, v. 85:—

O fountain Arethuse, and thou honour'd flood.

If, too, such a learner will lay to heart the notes on such words as "coy," "weanling," "foil," "swart-star," "rathe" (we take a few instances from Lycidas), he will have acquired in the least task-like fashion no little insight into the sources and derivation of our "well of English undefiled." Take the note on "rathe" for an instance (Lycid. 142):—"Rathe is 'early.' Its comparative is 'rather,' and the superlative 'rathest' is found. Rather therefore is the same as sooner, and we find the word used as equivalent, in the phrase, 'I would sooner not do it,' or 'I would rather not.'" How few boys—ready with half-a-dozen Latin epithets for the violet or the primrose—would know, off-hand, the force of "rathe" in this connexion, or dream of the suitableness which it manifests when compared with its synonym.

Indeed, Mr. Huckin's task, if briefly, is lovingly done. Witness the note to L'Allegro, 132, on "Jonson's learned sock," into which he contrives to throw a brief but remarkable contrast between the far-fetchedness of "rare Ben Jonson's" thoughts and the native ease and simplicity of Shakespeare's. Or that in Il Penseroso, 156:—

But let my due feet never fail

where the annotator localizes the "cloisters" (th. claustris, to shut) as those of the poet's nursing-mother, St. Paul's, the "high embowed roof" and "antique pillars" of the context being those of the adjoining (old) cathedral. It is by this manner of imparting interest to a text that it is helped to cling to the memory.

We cannot too warmly hail this series. Let the editor and the publisher spare no pains upon it; let them jealously adhere to the characteristic feature of brevity which distinguishes the volumes they have put forth. Most surely, if all the schoolmasters in England would adopt this series, or the principle of it, they would have fewer occasions to complain of boys not having read their notes, and fewer grumbings on the part of patres-familias at the heavy items of the book-bill.

THE DEBATABLE LAND.

THIS book by Mr. Robert Dale Owen is a reprint from an American publication, and is worth a brief notice as illustrating the singular phenomenon known as Spiritualism. If Mr. Owen's statistics are trustworthy—but it must be added that this is a very large "if"—indeed—there are seven millions of Spiritualists in the United States. They are beginning to show some tendency to base a religion upon the alleged manifestations, and this is perhaps the most interesting side of the question. Mr. Owen is the interpreter of their creed, such as it is; and his book is intended, not merely to relate a number of strange stories, but to exhibit their bearing upon the future religious history of the world. Mr. Owen's creed may be briefly described as a kind of sentimental Unitarianism; he follows the example of Lord Russell and other reformers of the same class in holding—we need not ask with what justice—that a pure Christianity is to be distilled from the tenets of different sects by omitting all their characteristic dogmas. He devotes a great many pages to show that Protestantism failed to conquer the world because it adopted the repulsive doctrines of Calvinism; and he thinks that we are now in danger of either submitting ourselves to the infallible authority of Rome, or accepting the atheistic views which, as he tells us, prevail amongst men of science. Spiritualism offers the only mode of escape, by adopting scientific conclusions and yet demonstrating the immortality of the soul. The miracles which accompanied the birth of Christianity were not strictly speaking miracles, but manifestations of the same forces which we now include under the name of Spiritualism; and we are now, as we were nineteen centuries ago, on the eve of a new religious era, to be heralded by the occurrence of similar mysterious events. We will say a word or two upon this theory presently. Let us first glance at some of the facts upon which the theory is grounded.

Conyers Middleton was perhaps the first writer who drew attention to the argument against miraculous stories derived from the utterly uncritical state of mind of the relators and their opponents. If some centuries hence any future Middleton should find it necessary to attack Mr. Owen, he will have no trouble in showing that the Spiritualist of the nineteenth century is as incapable of appreciating evidence as any Father can have been in the fourth century. Some of the stories which we are about to mention have indeed, more or less, a show of evidence; but Mr. Owen has also raked together a heap of the most absurd narratives, and betrays the state of his critical faculty by the mode in which he conceives himself to have established them. No superstition is beneath him; he believes that witchcraft had some real foundation in the bad conduct of "spirits of low character," though he does not believe in the devil; and it is amusing to find him quoting as a weighty authority Sir Thomas Browne, "physician, philosopher, and scholar," in ignorance, as we must suppose, of the good Sir Thomas's love of half-exploded superstitions. He would have no difficulty in finding better authority on behalf of astrology. Mr. Owen, however, has an indiscriminating appetite for the marvellous of all kinds. He collects stories of the ordinary type, where a dying man appears to a friend at a distance. He tells a wonderful legend of Captain Marryat taking a shot at a ghost in an old country house, which it seems that the Captain's daughter declares to be an authentic narrative. Assuming that she related it as she heard it, we should say that it proves the not very surprising fact that the author of Peter Simple enjoyed a mystification or a practical joke. Then we have a story which Lady Morgan tells on the authority of Lord Erskine. Lord Erskine, so the story runs, as he related it to Lady Morgan many years after, once returned to Edinburgh after a long absence, and met the old family butler, looking very pale and ghastly; the butler asked him to obtain the payment of a certain sum due from the steward, and then took an opportunity of vanishing, and in fact turned out to be a ghost. Of course the ghost's story was correct, and Lord Erskine became a believer ever after. Mr. Owen glories over the sceptic at great length, putting a series of such dilemmas as this—either Lord Erskine one morning in Edinburgh met a ghost, or Lord Erskine lied. He thinks the last the less improbable of the two hypotheses, and it is gratifying to see that a Republican entertains so high an opinion of the personal honour of our aristocracy. But it is characteristic that Mr. Owen fails to see that his dilemma omits any number of other possible cases. For instance, Lady Morgan may have lied; or, not to be so uncivil, Lady Morgan may have made a mistake; or Lady Morgan may have heightened her narrative for dramatic effect; or Lord Erskine may have told the story about his grandfather, and Lady Morgan have transferred it to herself, and so on ad infinitum. If an old lord and a lively lady could not compose a good ghost story between them, we should be indeed badly off for family legends. This omission to notice the weaker links of a chain of proof appears in almost every story related. Mr. Owen has collected various cases in which bells have rung in houses without any visible causes, and for considerable periods. He assumes—we can't see why—that they were rung by spirits. And he observes, as an interesting fact, that in more cases than one the disturbances were in some way connected with the presence of some particular person in the house. This, he says, is intelligible enough now when we are accustomed to "mediums." We are disposed to agree with him, because, now as then, we attribute the results to human agency; but Mr. Owen evidently fails to see how naturally suspicion is raised by the very fact upon which he dwells.

We will proceed, however, to Mr. Owen's own experiences. He seems to have been originally converted by an experience at Naples in 1856. Several ladies were trying the experiment of "automatic writing"—that is to say, one lady wrote and said that her hand was moved independently of her will by a spirit. One lady asked, Who gave me these pins? Hereupon the pen traced out the reply, "The one that gives you a maid and cook." The donor of the pins had in fact sent the lady two servants from Florence. It is of course asserted that the lady who held the pen was in complete ignorance of the facts, and Mr. Owen therefore jumps to the conclusion that a spirit must have guided her hand. His notion of investigating the subject was to inquire from the lady to whom the answer was given whether she could throw any light upon it, but he does not appear to have taken the trouble of interrogating the lady who gave the answer. He was therefore naturally unable to obtain any explanation of the supposed mystery. Returning to the United States, he became acquainted with a great number of mediums, and gradually came to see various surprising results. His confidence in the honour of these persons is unbounded. One of his instructors was Mr. Foster, of whose feats of producing names written on his arm after his visitor had written them on folded pieces of paper we have heard something in England. The trick is described in the well-known recent article in the Quarterly Review, and is perhaps rather superior to that of the Davenport brothers. Mr. Owen regards the performance with an unquestioning faith which gives us some measure of the value of his confidence in other performers. Another touching instance of his teachable and trustful spirit occurs in his mention of Mr. Home. He says that a medium should never seek "worldly wealth and profit through spiritual revealings," and à propos of this he tells us that the "celebrated medium" just mentioned administered a serious reproof to a prince who wished to make some inquiry as to his prospects of succession to a throne. Mr. Owen did not think it necessary to ask whether Mr. Home always remembered his own warnings. We do not wonder, all things considered, that Mr. Owen has seen some very wonderful manifestations indeed. He has more than once seen spirits. One spirit manifested its presence by a luminous figure of circular form moving about, and then, after making "a slight guttural sound"—probably clearing its throat—succeeded in saying, "God bless you!" On another occasion, being in company with a lady much esteemed in Boston as a teacher of singing and dancing, and with several mediums, he saw a female figure draped in white and shining garments walk into a room and then walk back and disappear. Two of the mediums present did not remember seeing anything. Mr. Owen says that his "faith in the reality of this appearance is not at all shaken by reflecting that a Signor Blitz or Robert Houdin," with proper appliances, could have produced all that he witnessed. His reason is that the performance took place in a private house with some eminently respectable ladies who did not take money. As we are not acquainted with the ladies, and do not know what names are indicated by "Mrs. K." and "Mrs. D.," we cannot quite share his confidence. A still more surprising series of phenomena of this kind is recorded on the authority of two or three highly respectable people at New York. Certain persons, including one very well-known female medium, succeeded in frequently seeing a lady related to one of the visitors, who had been dead for some years, and afterwards were honoured by several visits from Dr. Franklin. Franklin had an uncomfortable way of only appearing in bits, and with a "deformed and disagreeable aspect" of face; but at times he came out so strong that the persons present were allowed to pull his clothes, and on one occasion he sat in a chair looking at them for more than an hour. He does not appear to have made any remarks which might have been interesting. What are we to say to such stories as these? That they prove ingenious imposture, or delusions approaching to those of insanity, or monstrous lying, or practical joking, or real appearances of some kind? Having no means of investigating the question, we cannot offer any opinion; but if matters go on at this rate, we may expect before long to meet ghosts walking about our streets as commonly as policemen.

We can only ask what light these phenomena are supposed by those who believe in them to cast upon religion? The miracles related do not remind us very vividly of those recorded in the New Testament. Somehow we find it difficult to imagine St. Paul shutting himself up in a dark room with Sergius Paulus, and converting him to Christianity by making a table stand on one leg and cut capers in the air. We fancy that, if he had relied upon such means, Elymas the sorcerer would have got the better of him. The doctrines preached by the spirits seem to be singularly vague; and indeed it is part of the theory that the spirits do not know much more about anything than we do ourselves. Mr. Owen prints a communication to which he attaches great importance, but which we cannot quote from fear of irreverence. It is enough to say that it deals with the mystery of the Incarnation; and that it strikes us much as if somebody had listened to a sermon upon that solemn subject, and to a lecture on popular science, and had managed to mix up the two in a strange and meaningless jargon. It is not a very edifying or consoling belief that after death the commonplace Yankee will be a commonplace Yankee still; or that there are beings moving about in this world, imperceptible to our senses, but resembling us in our most ridiculous sides. Believing as we do that the medium is a more or less clever impostor, we can easily understand why the revelations made should be as vulgar and prosaic as the minds of their originators; but, on the opposite theory, it is certainly strange that people should come from the dead and yet should be able to bring us no inspiring news, to preach no new doctrine, but, at the utmost, only to sit in a chair in substantial clothes, and look steadily at us with a deformed and disagreeable aspect. We are not surprised to find that a church resting on such a basis has already developed heresies, and that some of the spirits preach Christian and others "radical" doctrines. In all probability they will talk as much nonsense as is already in the minds of their believers. But we certainly admit that the existence of such superstitions is very curious, and may possess a significance upon which we cannot now speculate.

FAIR TO SEE.*

NEXT to the masterpieces that are apparently things of the past, we like the clever novel that grows upon one. We do not refer now to the work of the practised veteran, who, knowing that sensation must fall however well it is sustained, has back at the start, and holds himself hard throughout, that he may bring his readers with a rush at the finish. We speak of the man who visibly warms as he goes, moves more freely as he feels his strength, and raises the ideal of his conceptions as he interests himself in his own creations. His feelings enlist themselves in aid of his brain, and, without ceasing to be lively, in spite of himself he becomes more earnest and less superficial. In society you meet "a good fellow" who makes himself excessively agreeable, and you pass a pleasant half-hour in his company. If these half-hours are often repeated, and he always meets you much as he was at first, he very speedily begins to bore you. But if you feel yourself drawn to him by glimpses of something better and more sterling beneath the mere sparkle of the surface, then the acquaintance ripens into esteem and friendship under the genial influence of his amiable qualities. You are drawn to him the more that he agreeably disappoints you. This is very much our experience with Fair to See. It begins very well indeed with a chapter of after-luncheon "palaver" in a mess smoking-room. The interchange of chat and chaff is much what we might expect in the circumstances, and the tone of the dialogue is not much more highly pitched than an intelligent reader has a right to ask of a clever writer. But we know, or fancy we know, what it is meant to lead on to. Melancholy experience makes us distrust any author's power to entertain us or do himself justice through three volumes of the regulation regimental novel. In these piping times of peace we cannot hope for the rollicking excitement that carried beaucoup sabre like Charles O'Malley through campaigning picnics which were all the merrier because danger and hardship were standing guests, and death might drop in at any moment. Barrack life is as vivid as the heeltaps left in last night's champagne-glasses, and Homer himself could strike no fire if he sung the commonplace garrison flirtations. We half surmise that Major Lockhart at first intended his hero to fritter away his little hour on the stage as a gentlemanly, good-natured fellow, who was capital company in his way but did very little credit to his belongings, and that he simply meant him to amuse us from page to page with little ulterior purpose. In one of the very first chapters Bertrand Cameron lends himself to ridicule, and, in plain English, makes an idiot of himself. If that was not Major Lockhart's idea, he is rather hard on Mr. Cameron; but if it was, as we believe it was, he forthwith repents. Repenting, he turns the blemish to advantage, by showing how easily he can overcome the prejudice it inevitably creates. We are almost made to forget how Mr. Cameron in his sober senses chose to induce himself in a dress kilt for the first time in broad daylight, and swagger in it for the entertainment of a mixed steamboat-load of critical Scotchmen. We feel a conviction that, although once strangely left to himself for some inexplicable reason, he is never likely to sin again in the same way. Not that he does not commit follies in abundance; indeed, on his crowning folly, turns the interest of the book, and it comes near to marring his existence. But his follies are the follies that spring naturally from the generous, impulsive nature of which Major Lockhart makes a vigorous and life-like study, and they work themselves happily into an ingenious and well-weighed plot. Major Lockhart can plead high precedents for reconsidering his hero. Our greatest authors have done the same thing in the very best of their books. We know how the crack-brained squire of La Mancha, self-knighted, cudgelled and mocked by clowns when he first rides out on adventure, grows under Cervantes' pen into the high-souled hidalgo, monomaniac on a single point; how the absurd founder of the Pickwick Club, who had been wheeled in a drunken sleep to the village pound to be pelted by the village rabble, withdrew to end his days at Dulwich, followed by the respectful attachment of countless readers. And we hold that there can be few better signs of a promising writer than his following Cervantes and Dickens is an inconsistency that comes of a vigorous grasp of his characters, and a capacity for identifying himself with them. The plot of Fair to See undoubtedly shows a great deal of constructive power, but what is more, it exhibits the artistic instinct—a higher and much rarer quality. A good strong serviceable plot may be hammered with patience and perseverance out of a very ordinary brain, and the constructive faculty develops like the muscles with practice. But the artistic sense is the gift of nature; the dramatic artist, like the poet, is born, not made. We do not refer merely to the judicious use of contrast, especially in the contact of conflicting characters, although there Major Lockhart excels. But he specially shows power in the numberless little touches that lighten love scenes and descriptions; in slight liftings of the corner of the veil that hides the future from us; in delicious ways of putting things, and in an adroit suggestion of the immense does that stimulate curiosity.

As a rule, we prefer, in reviewing a novel, to avoid anything more than incidental references to its story. To risk betraying the dénouement is a double injustice to the author and his reader. But it is difficult to indicate the special merits of Fair to See without telling something of the plot, and our doing so is of the less consequence in this case that the chief merits and interest of the tale lie in the way it is worked out. Bertrand Cameron and his friend Pigot, lieutenant and captain respectively in a line regiment quartered in the South of England, read and answer a tempting advertisement offering a couple of guns and a month's shooting and the attraction of a charming family club somewhere in the Western Highlands. The arrangement is made, and they find themselves domesticated with the McKillops. Mr. McKillop has retired upon a large fortune made in Australia. In an era hour for himself he has espoused a certain Mrs. Grant, widow of a captain of that name. Mrs. McKillop is coarse-minded and vulgar to a fault—to a fault in the book, indeed. Husband and wife have each a fair daughter, the fruits of their former marriages, both delightful girls to all appearance, but the lustre of Eila McKillop's grace and beauty eclipses the quieter charms of Morna Grant. Bertrand Cameron is exceedingly impressionable, his friend Captain Pigot very much the reverse. Bertrand is highly eligible moreover, for he is nephew and presumptive heir to Sir Rowland Cameron, who is in possession of the family estates and has amassed an ample fortune in the course of a long career as administrator in the colonies. Bertrand is drifting into love with Morna Grant, and quietly making his way, as we are led to suspect, en pays conquis, when the brilliant Eila flashes on the scene. The passion-stricken youth sees his fate and henceforth only lives for the new comer. She, on her side, is quite disposed to live for him, provided she can play no more profitable game; in other words, she is the most calculating of girls. Bertrand's succession to the unentailed family property is absolutely contingent upon his uncle's pleasure. The uncle of course refuses his consent to the marriage, and Bertrand is straightway jilted. Blinded by love and implicit faith, he has hitherto let himself be humbugged to any extent by that ingenuous young woman, but in giving him his formal dismissal she is sufficiently left to herself to write a lie which she cannot subsequently explain away. Her father contrives to exercise pressure on Sir Roland, and compels his consent. Bertrand, who has been brought to death's door by a fearful illness, and whose eyes have been thoroughly opened, declines to avail himself of his uncle's tardy permission. He has already proved his disinterestedness by courting disinheritance for Eila's sake, and now he demonstrates it again by positively refusing to marry her, although she is richly dowered by her father, and comes to him as the assurance of his family inheritance. Of course he has nothing to regret in the end; he escapes himself with the sterling Morna, and the pair live rich and very happy; while retributive justice is wrought upon those who had so nearly wrecked his peace and ruined his prospects.

The interest of the plot turns on certain awkward antecedents in the career of the wealthy Mr. McKillop, and on the mysterious hold he has established upon the distinguished Sir Roland. Expectation is worked up by the exercise of that artistic gift we spoke of, although, when the explanation comes at last, the machinery that solves the mystery is perhaps somewhat too commonplace to satisfy our anticipations. But it is excellently adjusted to its purpose of bringing out Eila and her by-play. The way in which we are permitted to mark and follow her evident game, while we can still sympathize with the sensible victim of her illusions, is very cleverly managed, and her love letters as pieces of mystification show real talent. Yet Morna Grant, while more unpretending, and necessarily withdrawing herself into the background while her brilliant rival makes play in the front, is perhaps, take her all in all, the more effective character of the two. Eila shows an unnatural absence of heart; it is not that Cameron does not touch it, but there is not one particle of latent sentiment about all her pretty person. Accordingly, when she pays the penalty of her faults in the end, we have no more sympathy for her than every man must necessarily feel for a lovely woman in anguish. If Morna had ended unhappily, we should have been slow to console ourselves. She is one of those fresh, honest girls whom one cannot help liking; quite pretty enough, yet captivating and holding you more by her candour, kindness, and native dignity of disposition than by her pleasant looks; frank by nature, yet reserved on occasions; almost blunt and over-outspoken, yet altogether womanly and ladylike. Major Lockhart, like Mr. Trollope, can identify himself wonderfully with girls and their ways of thought; there is an indescribable something about the manner of their talk, about the neat little turns he gives to their expressions, that makes one realize the scenes he describes, and understand how it came about that the flirtation should pass into love-making. This makes it the less explicable how he should have drawn Mrs. McKillop, Morna's mother, in such harsh and improbable outline, unless we suppose that he is paying the penalty of his original sin and false start, when she becomes something of a blot in his book. Although he had half-committed Bertrand Cameron, he could retrieve him; but Mrs. McKillop had been coloured too violently to be easily toned down. Yet, had she been less staring, she would have been far more telling, because she would have been more of a foil to her quiet daughter Morna. As it is, the incompatibility of the pair calls us back from the world of illusion to the hard realities of criticism, and we are reminded that Morna is mythical when we are asked to believe her the child of her mother. Talking of foils and the art of contrast, the generous, impulsive, warm-hearted hero is well set off by his Ascham Pigot, who prides himself, with reason, on his imperturbability, although his cynicism will not stand the test of another's adversity, and Bertrand's dangerous illness converts him into the most attentive and unselfish of sick nurses. Pigot is, to outward appearance, the most unsentimental of men, and as he neither marries nor falls in love in the course of the story, we presume he is really as little inflammable as he seems. It is his duty fate to have his sympathetic beam overflooded by the transports of his friend's passion, and the talk of the two, with the way in which the victim mounts the rill imposed upon him, is often capital. The dialogue indeed is generally very good, except when Mrs. McKillop enters into it with her infamous French, her Celtic pedigree, the mythical exploits of her barbarous ancestors, and her vulgar posturings generally. Major Lockhart has a strong sense of humour, and if we had space we could gather illustrations of it in abundance from his pages. He describes well enough and laying his scenes far the most part in the grandest districts of the Scottish Highlands, he finds ample openings for description. But he rattles his story along so merrily that we are seldom in the vein to pause and commune quietly with nature; just as pictures, originated for the admiration of the sublime and beautiful, generally utterly fail in that respect if they chance to turn out pleasantly. In short, while thus recognising the dramatic vivacity of Far to See, we can warmly recommend it to those who like something better than a lively story. In our opinion it makes an advance upon the author's former work as on its own earliest chapters; and we are disposed to think that it contains good promise of still greater success in the future.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

FEW sorts of books promise so much and perform so little as the personal recollections of celebrated men by their intimate friends. From the reader's point of view, this species of literature may be compared to a lottery in which the rare prizes—the Boswells and the Rickermanes—are of inestimable value, but in which blanks are the rule. In nine cases out of ten one is compelled to ask, "And is this all you have to tell us?" We do not complain of Baron von Friesen* for being no exception to the general rule, though it certainly is hard to comprehend how any one should have known Ludwig Tieck for seventeen years without being able to record seventeen particulars of interest concerning him. But we do think it unjustifiable to publish two stout volumes purporting to contain the author's recollections of an illustrious man, but which, in fact, only contain his opinions respecting that personage. Baron von Friesen is a man of culture, and his views respecting Tieck's activity as author and dramatic manager are not wholly unworthy of attention, only they should have been published under their proper designation, and not offered to the public as a contribution to biographical literature. Judged by the standard prescribed by the author himself, we must pronounce this book a lamentable failure; it is utterly destitute of biographical interest, and it would be waste of time to spend another word upon its pretensions in that respect. The character of the criticisms is respectable mediocrity; but the essay on Tieck's novels has at least the merit of recalling attention to a series of delightful and unjustly neglected compositions.

The late Arthur Schopenhauer† must be admitted by those most opposed to his philosophical views to have rendered one eminent service to metaphysics, in demonstrating the feasibility of uniting depth of research to lucidity of style, and applying abstract principles to the treatment of practical topics. His merits in these particulars could not be more strikingly exhibited than by the two goodly volumes of excerpts which his literary executor, Herr Julius Frauenstädt, has been enabled to select from his published writings. There is scarcely a line of them that is not perfectly comprehensible by a reader of average culture; the terse and masculine style is always easy, and frequently brilliant; and the subjects, rather ethical than metaphysical, are in general such as recommend themselves to the attention of a thoughtful man of the world. It is needless to observe that they are coloured throughout by the author's characteristic pessimism, which is itself the product of the arrogance, envy, and mortified pride which gave the tone to his views of men and things in general. We scarcely know a more signal instance of tragic irony than the spectacle of this great, forlorn, solitary thinker disdainfully and dogmatically condemning the entire scheme of existence, divine and human, animate and inanimate, on the strength of its appearance in the tinted glasses through which he surveyed it, and which he had systematically discoloured himself. The collection, however, abounds with truth as well as paradox, and its paradox is frequently suggestive of still deeper truth.

(The design of Dr. F. A. Arnstedt's essay on Rabelais‡ is to exhibit the great humorist in the light of an educational reformer, the precursor of Montaigne, Locke, and Rousseau, most of whose suggestions are shown to have been anticipated and exemplified in the education of Gargantua, as conducted by the judicious Poncecrates. At bottom, indeed, the method of Rabelais in pedagogy seems to be very nearly that of Bacon in philosophy, involving one main principle—the substitution of common sense for reliance on traditional dogma—which being once admitted, the rest follows almost of itself. Rabelais's unsystematic spirit, and the burlesque buffoonery in which his ideas are disguised, have deprived him of much of the credit to which he is entitled as a thinker. The work, which is written with great ability, contains a short biography of Rabelais, an account of his forerunners and imitators, a specimen of the extremely curious old German version by Fischart, and other interesting supplementary matter.)

The French, who played so lamentable a part on the actual scene of conflict, seem likely to obtain some poor amends by carrying off the literary honours of the late campaign. Most of their contributions to the history of the struggle are excellent, while, with the exception of some essays from the tactical point of view, and the personal observations of a few newspaper correspondents, German books on the topic are dull and commonplace, and palpably the manufacture of professional bookmakers. On the other hand, their name is legion. It must suffice to indicate the handsome and copiously illustrated history by Dr. Fechner*, the plain useful compendium by Georg Hesekiel†, and Dr. Winterfeld's‡ volume, typical of the whole class. The latter contains a facsimile of the famous draft of a secret treaty in Count Benedetti's handwriting.

The domestic organization of Prussia§ is now the subject of attentive study in all civilized countries. All necessary information about it will be found in the admirable work of Max von Oesfeld, which embodies a complete account of the political organization of the country, a digest of its jurisprudence, and a treatise on its agriculture and natural resources.

The result of Dr. H. Brunner's|| elaborate researches into the origin of trial by jury is that it is not an English, but a French institution, introduced into England by the Normans, but derived by them from the Frankish jurisprudence which they found existing on their settlement in France.

Dr. von Stein's treatise on financial science¶ is a very full, lucid, and interesting discussion of the subject in all its branches, especially the theory of taxation. The main idea of the work is that of a parallel between the financial systems of the three leading European nations—England, France, and Germany—the two former of which Dr. von Stein regards as embodying opposite principles of administration, while Germany occupies an intermediate place. He appears to consider that the German system will ultimately incline more to the English, especially in the matters of direct and local taxation. As regards import duties, he is a moderate protectionist, and his political economy is not even sufficiently advanced to condemn the taxation of articles of primary necessity.

We are unable to penetrate the design of the well-known "Arkolay's" disquisition on the conflict of races in the Austrian Empire.** That it is meant to intensify the animosity already unhappily subsisting among the various nationalities is indeed clear enough, but we fail to discover the writer's ultimate object. If he looked forward to the absorption of Austria by the German Empire, the rationale of his work would be obvious; but he apparently desires the perpetuation of her national existence, and how this is compatible with the entire confiscation of the political rights of every nationality except the German, he would probably be as little able to explain as we to understand. It would be fifty times more tolerable for the non-German races to be subjects of Russia than of such an Austria as "Arkolay" desires to see. The virulence of his language against the Hungarians, in particular, almost exceeds belief; "bestial," "cannibal," are quite ordinary amenities of speech with him.

Dr. von Plener, late Austrian Minister of Finance††, has performed a task which should hardly have been left to a foreigner. It is perhaps characteristic of our countrymen to be more intent on enacting useful legislation than on registering their performances; certain, at all events, it is that, while England is the only country that has systematically regulated the period of labour by statute, and endeavoured to ensure the health and comfort of the artisan as far as his occupation permits, nothing approaching to a survey of the subject exists in our literature. Dr. von Plener appears to have filled the void so ably that nothing is now left but to translate his book. He gives the history of the various agitations on the matter, analyses the investigations of the Commissions on whose reports legislation has mainly been founded, and describes the main features of the legislation itself. As a whole, this department of jurisprudence commands his warm admiration, and he attributes the mitigated character of English strikes in great measure to its influence. On the Continent, it would appear, legislative interference with the hours of labour is decried not so much from commercial considerations as from its being supposed to concede the theory of Socialism. Dr. von Plener maintains that, however the case may stand in the region of abstract theory, the practical result is the very reverse.

Otto Ule's‡‡ essays treat a number of scientific, and some psychological, subjects in an agreeable but superficial manner.

Congresses, except on subjects where the pocket is intimately concerned, usually subserve one or both of two ends—the ventilation of crotchets, and the delivery of commonplaces. The ecclesiastical conference at Berlin last October* seems to have been principally devoted to the latter purpose, the uniform insipidity of the proceedings being only ruffled by a slight breeze when the comparative merits of Lutherans and Calvinists came up incidentally as a subject of discussion. Towards the close of the proceedings, however, Professor Wagner, of Berlin, delivered a really valuable discourse on the progress of the International Society and other forms of Socialism, in which he plainly told the assembled divines that the complaints of the German artisans were to a considerable extent well founded, and pointed out the inequitable nature of the existing system of taxation, with suggestions for its amendment which seem to have been received with favour.

Professor Bernhard Weiss's minute and prolix, but very thorough, scrutiny of every word in the Gospel of Mark† brings him to the conclusion that it is the most ancient of the Gospels in their present form, but is at the same time based upon a still earlier and really apostolical document—the Logia attributed to Matthew by Papias—which the other Synoptics, especially the first, occasionally reproduce with stricter verbal fidelity. In the main, however, Mark is, he considers, to be regarded as the source of the other Synoptic narratives, and by no means as a mere abridgment of Matthew. He thinks that the quasi-apostolical character of the Gospel originated the legend of Mark having acted as the amanuensis of Peter. In matters of textual criticism Dr. Weiss assigns the highest value to the Vatican MS.

Great strides are now being taken towards the utilization of those mounds of Chaldee literature comprised under the general names of Talmud and Midrash, which till a short time ago were so scornfully looked down upon. In laying before his readers a first instalment of an intended Hebrew translation of the New Testament‡, Professor Delitzsch pays a just and almost enthusiastic tribute to the value of those Rabbinical writings. Not merely are many technical terms of a philosophical nature used by St. Paul only to be understood by being retranslated, as it were, into the original terminology of the school of Gamaliel and the other masters of the period, but the very dialectic formulas used in his reasonings only find their true explanation by a reference to their prototypes. Well did the Reuchlins, Buxtorfs, Lightfoots, and others, theoretically and practically, pave the way for such knowledge; but darkness supervened again, and their labours were almost forgotten by theologians. Professor Delitzsch, after a brief introduction, treats of previous attempts at Hebrew versions of the Gospel, and devotes a special chapter to the efforts of the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews. This is followed by a criticism of the last revised version, due chiefly to Mr. Margoliouth. The castigations inflicted upon that gentleman's labours, both as to linguistic knowledge and accentuation, fill about nine closely printed pages. We cannot but hail this instalment as a work of genuine value.

The first part of Teuffel's history of Roman literature§ extends to the fall of the Republic, and treats the subject with true Roman brevity and simplicity, in a dry, business-like way. The work makes no pretensions to the charms of style, but is a model of condensed abundance of matter.

A collection of Jacob Grimm's minor writings|| is less interesting for the actual importance of the contents than as an illustration of the robust and dignified character of the author. His autobiographical reminiscences, his impressions of a visit to Rome, and his essay on old age deserve especial notice in this respect. Hermann Grimm's collected essays¶ on art are very agreeable reading. They include valuable notices of the great German artists, Dürer, Cornelius, Schinkel, and Carstens.

It is gradually coming to be recognized that the languages and the national character of the great civilized nations of antiquity are liable to be misconceived when surveyed exclusively from the point of view of their classical writers. The Latin of Pompeii was evidently not quite the same thing as the Latin of the Roman Senate, and Petronius reveals phases of society which we should not have discovered from the ostentatious declamations of metrical satirists. This observation is less applicable to Hellenic than to Roman literature and manners, the former being less artificial, and the latter more closely approximating to a uniform type. There are not wanting, however, indications of a rustic and popular element of Greek life and thought, obscured awhile by the splendour of civilization, but reappearing when this is withdrawn. The interesting inquiry, how far the modern Greeks have preserved ancestral traditions which are but obscurely to be traced in classical writers, is the subject of an excellent work by Herr Bernhard Schmidt.** The present volume is chiefly devoted to an examination of the numerous traces of the ancient religion in present religious beliefs and observances, and to an account of popular superstitions with reference to the intimations of their existence in ancient times which may be gleaned from the classical authors. These, though but scanty, afford sufficient evidence of a nether stratum of feeling and opinion of which we know but little. The tendency of such researches is, on the one hand, to attenuate the line of demarcation between the ancient Hellenic and other Aryan races; and, on the other, to approximate it more closely to its modern representatives. Herr Schmidt is very decided on the question of the substantial Hellenism of the latter, pointing out that the Slavonic influence supposed by some to have profoundly affected their ethnological relations could not have extended to the islands, and that the perfect correspondence of the islanders with the inhabitants of the mainland is a sufficient proof that the latter are as truly Hellenic as the former. The second volume is to contain a collection of Romic tales, traditions, and popular songs and ballads.

F. Pecht and A. von Ramberg's "Gallery of Goethe's Characters" is to consist of fifty ideal portraits designed by them for artists, with an illustrative text by the former. So far as the work has yet gone, the conceptions of the designers appear adequate, the letterpress displays intelligence and critical acumen, and the work promises to be an elegant companion to the collection of Goethe's writings.

If Paul Konewka, the restorer of the neglected art of silhouette illustration, has not succeeded quite so well with Falstaff as with Faust, the fault does not rest with the artist, but with the limitations of his peculiar department of art. We certainly cannot consider his portraits of the Falstaff group equally successful with his previous performances. The reason may be their association with the critical essay of Herr Kurz, to which no exception can be taken in itself, but which imparts an air of over-seriousness to what is only acceptable as a jeu d'esprit.

"Faded Leaves," and a little volume of novelettes by Marie von Olfers, belong to a higher class than ordinary works of fiction. The former is a record of emotion, a striking though sketchy picture of a sensitive mind ill at ease with itself. The form is that of a diary; some of the details have the appearance of being derived from actual experience. The subjects of Fraulein von Olfers's stories are taken from domestic life, with just the tinge of idealism which distinguishes the lively representation of reality from the mere mechanical transcript of it. They are distinguished by remarkable buoyancy of style and vivacity of dialogue, associated with real insight into human nature, and deep, though not obtrusive, feeling. "Sara" is a respectable circulating-library novel.

Three of the best productions of Robert Hamerling, brought together in a volume, constitute one of the most acceptable examples of recent German poetry. The author's imagery may be too dazzling, and the ear is soon satiated with the too uniform sweetness of his versification, but these defects are mainly the exaggeration of unquestionable poetical endowments. Hermann Lingg's deficiencies as a dramatist are analogous to Hamerling's; his diction is too exuberant, and his whole cast of mind too dreamy for so austere a walk of art as tragedy. Regarded as a dramatic poem, his "Violante" is not unsuccessful; it is replete with elegance, fancy, and tenderness. The subject is the fate of Manfred, King of Naples, in the thirteenth century; but the figure of the hero, betrayed by treacherous nobles, while, as the representative of intellectual freedom, he battles strenuously against the whole power of the Church, is less adapted to Herr Lingg's genius than the pathos of the female personages. A faithful and generally satisfactory version of the first series of Tennyson's Idylls of the King, by Dr. Feldmann, is chiefly noticeable as an illustration of the influence which the study of English models may exercise on German versification. The translator has successfully reproduced the cadences of his original, and has shown that the general poverty of German blank verse is rather owing to the negligence of the poets than to the deficiencies of the language itself.

The strong point of Albert Moser's poems is their correctness in point of form. Platen is evidently his model, but the scholar, though not unworthy of the master, does not, like the latter, carry his power over language to the extent of investing mere commonplace with an air of grandeur, though he is fully competent to embellish and adorn them.

The conductor of "Alemannia," a new journal of "the language, literature, and popular tradition of Alsace," seems unable to find anything to his purpose later than the fifteenth century. The first part of his publication, at least, contains hardly anything but old poems and legends of saints of somewhere about that date, of purely grammatical and antiquarian interest. A severer sarcasm on the recent annexation could hardly be conceived, unless the circumstance may be accounted for by supposing that the miscellany too faithfully reflects the individual tastes of the compiler.

FRENCH FINANCE.

THE Assembly asserted an unwonted degree of independence in adopting M. FÉRAÏ's motion to the effect that a Commission should report whether the sum necessary to balance the Budget could not be procured without recourse to taxes on raw materials. But it is not in the nature of things that an Assembly should be able to do the work of a Government. It was immediately obliged to entreat and implore M. THIERS to retain office, and it did not hint at any change of Ministry. The consequence is that M. THIERS governs, and M. POUYER-QUERTIER represents his Government. The Assembly tries to maintain its right of deciding what amount shall be raised, and how it shall be raised; but it really cannot move except under the direction of M. THIERS and M. POUYER-QUERTIER. Its first tasks were indeed of a tolerably simple character, for it had merely to grant those taxes which had been proposed by the Government, and as to which there was really no contest. Sugar is to be taxed still more, a small impost is to be laid on all packages going into or out of the country through the Custom House, and a further tax is to be levied on matches. The history of the tax on matches is curiously illustrative of the mode in which taxes on commodities may be used to enhance greatly the price of an article to the consumer. Last summer a duty was imposed on lucifer-matches, which came to the fifth of a halfpenny on each halfpenny-box. The vendors immediately raised the price to a penny, thus getting through the new tax an extra profit four times as great as the amount of the tax. The Government thinks this too much of a good thing for the match-sellers, and proposes to tax each box four-fifths of a halfpenny, leaving one-fifth of a halfpenny to the sellers as compensation to them for having to advance the amount of the tax until they are recouped by the sale of their matches. If M. THIERS ever meditated on any facts that he did not like, he might profitably meditate on this illustration of the burdens cast on the consumer by the taxation of raw materials. He always in his numerous recent speeches left out of account, in calculating how far the tax he was advocating would burden the consumer, to add to the tax itself the additions which at each stage of manufacture are put on to the price, in order not only that the sum advanced for the tax may be recouped, but that, if possible, a profit may be made. It is not even as if the proposed taxes on raw materials were to be levied on a few articles so extensively used, and capable of being so enormously subdivided, like cotton and woollen products, as to make competition keep down the price to some extent, and to permit the distribution of the tax by small fractions of increased price. There are altogether 350 articles until now imported free on which, according to the tariff submitted for the approval of the Commission of the Assembly on raw materials, duties are to be imposed. The main reason for this is no doubt that, when once an article is to be taxed on its entrance into a country, there are so many other articles that must be taxed for the sake of fairness; just as, for example, chicory is taxed in England, simply because, if coffee is taxed, chicory must be. Probably it would be found, if the list of the said 350 articles was examined, that the French Government is necessarily led to propose that four-fifths of them are to be taxed because it has first made up its mind that one-fifth of them are to be taxed. But it is this indirect and accidental burden on the consumer which is one of the worst features of the reckless use of indirect taxation, and yet it is the inevitable result, as it seems likely to do, into adopting all the taxes suggested by the Government, it will be helpless before the facts which will tell it that a widespread system of indirect taxation is the inevitable consequence of the adoption of the proposed taxes.

M. THIERS has violently denounced the Treaty of Commerce with England, and all Treaties of Commerce. M. POUYER-QUERTIER has since characterized Treaties of Commerce as badges of national slavery. The Assembly has appointed a Commission to inquire whether the treaties are good things or not, and more especially whether the Treaty with England shall be kept on foot. The contest as to the composition of this Commission was very keen, and it finally appeared as the result of the voting that, out of fifteen members of the Commission, nine were against upholding the Treaty with England, and six for it. The majority of the Assembly may therefore be taken as sharing the opinion of the Government on the subject, and there is now every probability that notice will be given to England before the 4th of next month that France wishes that at the end of a year from that time the Treaty should be at an end. The majority of the Assembly is not, indeed, so far as can be judged, as positively hostile to Treaties of Commerce generally, or to the Treaty with England in particular, as M. THIERS and M. POUYER-QUERTIER. It hopes to get England to agree to a new Treaty of Commerce fashioned so as to suit France better. The present Treaty, it is said, will be in force for a year, and if discussion shows that more favourable terms can be got for France—by which it is simply meant that France may be allowed to tax her imports more highly—then a new Treaty can be made before the year expires. At the worst, if England will yield nothing, the present Treaty can be revived. The Government may add that there is a third result, and that is that France and England may cease to be bound by any Treaty of Commerce at all. It is probable that the English Government will show itself very indifferent to the existence of a treaty, and the conductors of the negotiation on the part of France are avowedly hostile to the whole principle of Treaties of Commerce. Under such circumstances the chances are that the Treaty will be not modified, but altogether abrogated, as the Assembly, which does not know its own mind, and which does not keep in the same mind two weeks together, cannot really control a Government the existence of which it has just pronounced to be indispensable to the welfare of the country. But in France the Treaty is looked upon as valuable or pernicious, not so much on its own merits, but chiefly as offering a symbol of Free-trade. Its existence is considered a victory for Free-traders; and even if it were modified so as to become a charter of Protectionist maxims, it would be still thought a sort of certificate that France was liberal and enlightened, and fond of Free-trade. The more advanced economists of France may therefore regard their flag as still flying, so long as there is a Treaty of Commerce at all; and this sentimental view may possibly have so much force in France and England that a Protectionist Treaty may be endured because it gives a ray of comfort to a party in France which has been most friendly to England, and is vigorous enough to make itself regarded by the French Government. Otherwise it may be concluded that the Treaty of Commerce is virtually at an end, the only question being now whether it shall be abrogated, or shall remain a name and shadow for the gratification of French Free-traders, who cannot bear to be so utterly defeated as to see it pass away entirely.

The Assembly proposed to consider all other possible taxes before it discussed taxes on raw materials, and so long as it busied itself with duties on sugar and matches it got on very comfortably. But it had to go through the proposed taxes in order, and the next tax it had to consider was one on merchant shipping. Here the Commission of the Budget had gone far ahead of the Government in the regions of Protection. The Government had only proposed a tax on the tonnage of merchant ships; but the Commission had added a duty on foreign ships, and on goods carried in foreign ships, for the avowed object of reviving the decaying state of the French mercantile navy. The Government had no objection in principle to this. It entirely approved of fostering French shipbuilding by Protection, and it coincides with the opinion that a mercantile marine must be stimulated, if necessary, artificially, in order to form a basis for the navy. The proposed tax was warmly opposed on two grounds. In the first place there exist Treaties of Commerce, and especially one with Austria, by which differential duties on foreign ships are prohibited. The Government quite acknowledged this. If the Assembly voted the tax, it could not be carried out except very partially. Nations not protected by treaties would of course be subjected to the tax at once; but nations with whom treaties forbidding differential duties exist must be exempted from the tax. But then the French Government could approach the Governments of these nations, and show them the decision at which the Assembly had arrived. It could press on them that France now openly declared what measures it would take for its own benefit if it were free to act, and it would then ask the Government it was addressing whether it was really inclined to subject France to the burden of a Treaty from which France in unparalleled circumstances of difficulty and distress wished to be relieved. This, as M. POUYER-QUERTIER pointed out, is the best and surest means of getting these obnoxious Treaties of Commerce set aside. If the Government merely makes this or that proposal, foreigners do not know what it is they are asked to do, and are not sure whether France cares about the concessions asked for being made. But if the Assembly has voted the imposition of a tax to levying which a Treaty of Commerce forms the sole obstacle, the foreign Government addressed will know exactly what is asked, and will be sure that it is France that is asking for it. In the second place, it was alleged that the duty on foreign ships would raise the price of imported goods in France. No one could contest this. The consumer would lose, but the French shipbuilders and freighters would gain. The merchant navy of France is decaying, as those who wish for adverse duties on the foreign flag allege; and even the opponents of these duties admit that it is not in a very flourishing condition. They assert, however, that its decay is caused by the introduction of steam, against which a merchant navy like that of France, mainly composed of wooden ships, cannot hold ground. To this the friends of Protection reply that Frenchmen cannot build steamships to compete with foreign ships, except with the assistance of differential duties. It is evident that the whole question of taxing raw materials is prejudged in the decision of this issue as to differential duties in favour of the French merchant navy; for if Treaties of Commerce are not to stand in the way of these duties, neither need they do so in the way of duties on raw materials; and if the consumer of imported goods is to be taxed in order that French shipbuilders may make money, so may the consumer of imported wool be taxed for the benefit of French sheep-growers. The general result of the vote on M. FÉRAY'S motion appears therefore to be that the Assembly, instead of, at the bidding of the Government, first voting the taxes on raw materials, and then abrogating the Treaties of Commerce, is, under the guidance of the Government, being led to combine the two operations, and to abrogate the treaties and tax raw materials by one process.

THE MANCHESTER ARBITRATION CONFERENCE.

A CONFERENCE and a public meeting were held a few days ago at Manchester in favour of International Arbitration. The difference between a public meeting and a Conference may perhaps be intelligible to professional managers of leagues and associations; and in this instance it seems to have consisted in the absence from the public meeting of two out of three members of Parliament who had attended the Conference. The loss may have been the more endurable because Mr. RYLANDS and Mr. JACOB BRIGHT are well known to be ready for any vent which may be opened for their restless activity. In the Conference they were chiefly anxious, after the manner of peace-mongers, to pick a quarrel with somebody. Mr. RYLANDS abused diplomats and ministers of religion in general; and Mr. BRIGHT rewarded the Bishop of MANCHESTER for his adhesion to the Arbitration movement by exhibiting his well-known antipathy to bishops. If the scheme is useful or practicable, it is unlucky that it should not be defended by advocates of higher intellectual pretensions. Mr. RICHARD indeed possesses some natural ability, though his long connexion with sects and factions can scarcely have been favourable to the formation of an impartial and comprehensive judgment. Mr. JACOB BRIGHT'S indefatigable pugnacity may possibly be sometimes useful; but universal discontent impairs the effect of an attack on any special grievance. Mr. RYLANDS'S political calibre may be sufficiently estimated by the examination of almost any sentence in his speech. "People," he said, "were beginning to feel that, in spite of the humbug of diplomacy, the filching of colonies from other countries was far from the best means of extending our commerce." It might as well be said that, in spite of the humbug of geology, the manufacture or exhumation of flint implements was not the best way of improving steam-engines. In a Select Committee which some time since wasted much time under his auspices, Mr. RYLANDS proposed large reductions of the diplomatic establishment on the ground that the information furnished to the Foreign Office was sometimes incorrect or incomplete, and that negotiations had been frequently unsuccessful. It had not then occurred to him to cross-examine the witnesses who attended the Committee on the efforts which Mr. RYLANDS supposes them to have made, for the benefit of commerce, to filch colonies from other countries. The capture of colonies in the wars of a hundred years or eighty years ago was effected not by diplomacy, but by arms; and modern statesmen are exempt from all suspicion of desiring to revive a policy which is wholly obsolete. Perhaps Mr. RYLANDS may refer to a recent arrangement with the Government of the Netherlands for a rectification of colonial boundaries on the West Coast of Africa; but as the transaction, whatever may be its merits, is entirely voluntary and friendly on both sides, it can scarcely be described as an attempt to filch a colony from a foreign country; and it has nothing whatever to do with any theory or project of arbitration. It is natural and proper that the House of Commons should be partially composed of members of ordinary abilities and of limited information; but it would be well if, like peers who possess similar qualifications, they would be content to leave active interference in public affairs to others.

Mr. HUGH MASON, who presided at the public meeting, complained that among 350 members of Parliament who had addressed their constituents during the recess, not five had touched on the great question of arbitration. In one sense Mr. MASON is mistaken, for a large majority of Liberal speakers have indulged in congratulatory platitudes on the imaginary triumph of the principle which was to be affirmed by the Manchester meeting. The opening of a new era of peace has been repeatedly dated from the signature of the Treaty of Washington, by which the animosity of the Americans to England was supposed to have been finally abated. One successful experiment is in political controversy worth whole volumes of argument and demonstration; and it was not surprising that an instance in which a serious quarrel between two great communities had been referred to a judicial tribunal should be thought almost decisive of the question whether arbitration could be substituted for war. It was indeed pointed out that there was seldom a difficulty in settling a dispute when one party was ready to make all the concessions which could be demanded by an opponent. A few months before both France and North Germany had summarily rejected Lord GRANVILLE'S proposal of a reference to arbitration, because neither Power was willing in any contingency to abandon the rights or pretensions in dispute. The English Government was of a different temper; and it may be admitted that its unbounded concessions were approved by the country at large, notwithstanding the protests of a few individual politicians. The price, though it was heavy, was deemed not too large to pay for the great object of establishing for the first time since the War of Independence a friendly feeling towards England on the part of the United States. The desired result seemed to have been obtained, as far as a judgment could be formed from the language of American journals and from official documents. If it is true that 350 addresses were delivered during the Recess, at least 200 must have contained a string of well-meant commonplace about the Treaty, the proposed arbitration, and the consequent millennium which was to come.

It is strange that Mr. RICHARD, as the 351st speaker, not to mention Mr. JACOB BRIGHT and Mr. RYLANDS, should wholly omit to notice the blessed innovation which commenced with the Treaty of Washington. Mr. RYLANDS may perhaps be prejudiced against all international agreements, as partaking of the humbug of diplomacy, though it is difficult to understand how two Governments are ever to come to an arrangement if they are precluded from employing authorized agents; but it might have been supposed that the supporters of arbitration in general would have referred to the most conspicuous illustration of the system. Their deliberate abstinence from the topics of the Treaty of Washington and the Tribunal of Geneva is equivalent to an acknowledgment that arbitration is no remedy for national rancour. If the counsel on either side in the TICHOSSON case were deliberately to pass over the evidence or argument by which his client are chiefly pressed, it would be justly inferred that the omitted facts or inferences could not be controverted or disputed. It would seem that Mr. RICHARD and his friends are similarly embarrassed by the wonderful claim which has been preferred by the counsel for the United States. It can scarcely be contended, even by the most fanatical advocates of peace, that a treaty would be expedient or justifiable which should result in a verdict against a neutral for a sum larger than the probable cost of participation in war. Mr. HUGH MASON states that, on the outbreak of the war of 1870, cotton and other property were depreciated to the value of a hundred millions; but in that case there was little or no real destruction of property; and to those who were able to hold on for a few weeks, the loss was imaginary or trifling. The American Government now demands a sum which may range from one hundred to five hundred millions, as a penalty for the alleged negligence of England in relation to half-a-dozen Confederate cruisers. It must be assumed that neither the President and his advisers nor the agents whom they employ would degrade themselves by advancing claims which they had no hope, however faint, of establishing. It must therefore be assumed, for the purpose of the general argument on arbitration, that its first result may possibly be the perpetration of a profligate and ruinous extortion. Mr. RICHARD and Mr. MASON had good reason for avoiding all mention of a proceeding which is almost fatal to their theory; but it was perhaps hardly worth while to hold a meeting and a Conference for the purpose of evading the most material point in the discussion. Until recently most persons would have agreed with Mr. RICHARD that the question was not so much whether arbitration was desirable as whether it was practicable. It had not been foreseen that a litigious adversary might make a judicial proceeding the basis of hostility and wrong; and that the pleadings in the cause would furnish ample opportunities for inflammatory declamation. The miscarriage in the present case is more remarkable because it was universally understood that the offensive claim was expressly excluded by the statement of the American Commissioners that, in the hope of an amicable settlement, they provisionally waived the claim for indirect damages. As soon as their demands had been eagerly complied with, and when the English Commissioners and their Government had concluded the Treaty on the assumption that it would be construed together with the previous declaration of the Commissioners, the American agents proposed the extravagant demands which, as they well know, would, if they had been previously advanced, have put an end to the negotiation. It is not too much to say that, unless securities can be provided against ill-will, sharp practice, and bad faith, international arbitration will henceforth be rarely attempted.

The promoters of the Manchester Conference may, if they are desirous of further knowledge, find an illustration of the subject in a still more recent proceeding of the American Government. A journal which enjoys the confidence of the President, and which was the first to publish an abstract of the scandalous claim against England, announces, apparently on official authority, that the citizens of the United States resent the protests of Spain against their natural sympathy with Cuba, and that six ironclads have been ordered to put to sea for the purpose of protecting American interests against Spanish pretensions; and although the statement has been doubted or contradicted by other papers, it has not been withdrawn. If there is any ground of quarrel, there would be no difficulty in referring it to arbitration; but there is no room for the intervention of an umpire between the wolf and the lamb. The suspicious Spaniards may perhaps fear that there may be some intention of effecting the object which Mr. RYLANDS describes as "kicking a colony." It is more probable that decisive measures will be deferred until the Tribunal at Geneva has concluded its sitting. In the meantime, though ironclads are not the instruments which Manchester philanthropists recommend for the settlement of national differences, they are likely to be more effective than arbitrations conducted in the manner adopted by the American Government.

IRISH DISAFFECTION.

THE contest in the county of Kerry is conducted with all the violence and factious excitement which are peculiar to Irish patriots, whether they advocate Home Rule or any other form of disaffection. To assault the hostile candidate and his supporters and to intimidate peaceful electors has always been considered in Ireland the most appropriate kind of protest against English usurpation. The Roman Catholic clergy are not without good reason alarmed at the progress of an agitation which is for many reasons distasteful to them; but they also are unable to discontinue the use of the incendiary language in which they have so long indulged. Cardinal CULLINAN boasted at his recent meeting that he was supported by the only two Roman Catholic peers "whom the penal laws have left us." As any penal law which could have effected the passage or its religious opinions has ceased for nearly a century to exist, it might have been thought that a prelate anxious to secure the concurrence of Parliament in his policy would have preferred conciliatory language, or abstinence from an irrelevant topic, to the wanton utterance of sectarian spite; but at Dublin, as at Manchester, religious antipathy transgresses the laws which in modern times regulate merely political contests. Twenty or thirty years ago it was commonly asserted that Ireland offered insuperable difficulties to one of the two great Parliamentary parties. The embarrassment has in no degree diminished; but it now affects all Governments almost equally. Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues have indeed made large concessions to popular interests or wishes; but the turbulent classes in Ireland are only encouraged by partial success to prefer additional demands. The Home Rule agitation follows the Church Bill and the Land Bill, as the Repeal agitation ensued on Catholic Emancipation. Of the Education controversy it is enough to say that Mr. GLADSTONE's most zealous adherents in England declare themselves irreconcilably opposed to the measures which are required by his professed friends in Ireland. He had hastily pledged himself before his accession to office to remove a grievance; and he is probably at present unable to ascertain either the exact nature of the grievance or the remedy. In dealing with Home Rule the Government has a simpler but not less arduous task. Mr. GLADSTONE announced at Aberdeen his firm resolution to maintain the unity of the Empire, and he may undoubtedly count on the support of an overwhelming majority in Parliament; but the open avowal by large Irish constituencies of hostility to the present Constitution cannot be regarded with indifference. It may be hoped that no attempt will be made to convert Irish difficulties into party weapons.

Only a moderate effort of imagination was required to suggest the assertion that Mr. BRIGHT approved the project of Home Rule. In former times he often indulged in rash and intemperate declamation with respect to Ireland, and his denunciations of English shortcomings were easily twisted into a recommendation that there should be an Irish Parliament. Mr. BRIGHT has now thought it right to contradict a report which attributed to him concurrence in the professed object of Mr. BURR's agitation. He says that, on the contrary, he considers that a second Parliament within the United Kingdom would be a mischievous institution; and there can be no doubt that he has always held the same opinion. It was perhaps not his business to inquire into the real purpose of the Home Rule movement, which, except in the speeches, and perhaps in the thoughts of Mr. BURR, has nothing to do with federation or with the maintenance in any form of the connexion between England and Ireland. Mr. BURR himself has never attempted seriously to grapple with the conclusive arguments against the simple repeal of the Union, and the revival of the Irish Parliament. He is well aware that it would be impossible to provide an Irish House of Lords which would not be unanimously opposed to the experiment. The popular Assembly, which would exercise supreme authority, would at once disregard the constitutional restraints which would nominally be imposed on its activity. It is, indeed, unnecessary to discuss the merits of an organization which has no genuine advocates. The mobs which applaud Mr. BLENKINSOP and molest his opponent have never thought of accepting a subordinate Irish Parliament supposed to act in concert with an Imperial Legislature. To them Home Rule means separation, though they have probably not troubled themselves to consider the future relations in which they would stand to England. It may be conjectured that they are still more earnestly bent on getting rid of their own landlords, whose property after a successful rebellion would not be worth six months' purchase. Some sanguine minds may also hope for the expropriation of barons, though the Fenian section of the party has learned to be comparatively indifferent to religious questions. Mr. BRIGHT, though he once asserted that the landlords would be exterminated if Ireland were floated out into the middle of the Atlantic Ocean, would object even more strongly to the practical working of Home Rule than to the ostensible proposals of Mr. BUTT.

The bishops and priests who are bent on securing to themselves the control of education are contemptuously told by the Home Rule agitators that, if they want Ireland to be a Catholic community, they had better in the first instance ally themselves with those who propose to overthrow an alien Protestant Government. If the promise of sacerdotal supremacy in the future Republic inspired confidence, there can be no doubt that the offered alliance would be accepted. In some parts of Europe, and especially in Belgium and Germany, the Roman Catholic clergy is engaged in the desperate experiment of trying to attain its ends by the aid of the democracy. The Irish priests possess more political experience, and they know that they have little hold on the Fenians who form the majority of the supporters of Home Rule. Any prelate who ventures to disapprove of the popular clamour is denounced as plainly and as contemptuously as if he were a Protestant landlord. Mr. BUTT has often spoken of the concession of the claims of Cardinal CULLEN and his associates, as if it would be the inevitable result of the convocation of an Irish Parliament; but it is highly probable that a revolutionary Assembly would repudiate clerical pretensions to influence. It is on the whole more prudent to attempt to hold the balance between the English Government and the promoters of secession. Lord DERBY was probably justified in his assertion that it was impossible to govern the Irish people through the Roman Catholic clergy, and that their influence had been greatly exaggerated; but hitherto they have exercised an extensive control over elections, and they have little reason to complain of neglect from successive Governments. It was their own fault, or their own choice, that, in compliance with the terms of their alliance with the English Dissenters, they missed the opportunity of securing to their Church a portion of the coveted spoils of the Protestant Establishment. A year or two earlier Mr. DISRAELI's offer of considerable advantages was rendered abortive by the extravagant pretensions of the bishops, and by the consequent release of Lord MAYO from his imprudent pledges. Although Cardinal CULLEN protested on behalf of the Roman Catholic community against any further delay in the settlement of the education controversy, it is not for the interest of the clergy to precipitate the contest. The Government will not improbably announce that the state of public business renders the production of an Irish Education Bill impossible; and the House of Commons will perhaps think it prudent to abstain from prematurely binding itself by any abstract resolution.

It matters little whether Mr. BUTT thinks it for the advantage of his cause to provoke a discussion on the chimerical project of Home Rule. He may perhaps wish to compel hesitating and reluctant Irish members to declare themselves on one side or on the other; but the division would prove the numerical weakness of his party, and the debate would involve a conclusive exposure of the absurdity and unreality of his scheme. The dismemberment of the United Kingdom, as it could only be effected by force, is not a proper subject of Parliamentary debate; but it may be useful to demonstrate that the issue which Mr. BUTT affects to submit to Parliament is altogether imaginary and fallacious. It is impossible to believe that the House of Commons can at any future time voluntarily consent to abandon the natural allies and loyal subjects who would be exposed to ruin if Ireland were handed over to the absolute control of the revolutionary faction. Even if separation were inevitably to follow, an armed contest could scarcely be averted; for it would be impossible that England should remain neutral in the civil war which would immediately follow. Although Mr. GLADSTONE's two great measures have not produced either gratitude or tranquillity, the vast concessions which have been made would, if it became necessary to suppress an Irish insurrection, greatly strengthen the hands of Government and of Parliament. All parties would be able with a good conscience to concur in any measures which might be necessary for the maintenance of the unity of the Empire; nor is there any reason to doubt that the respectable classes in Ireland, although they might perhaps be intimidated into ostensible complicity with secession, would heartily approve of an exercise of power which would furnish the only security for property and order. Mr. BUTT has belonged to various parties in turn, and he has not hitherto succeeded in obtaining the confidence of any body of allied politicians. His present followers perhaps trust him because he has burnt his ships, but few of them think his nominal plan either practicable or desirable.

THE NONCONFORMIST CHANGE OF FRONT.

THE Nonconformist Conference at Manchester is the most important event that has yet occurred in the long controversy upon elementary education. Hitherto one great element of strength in the Denominational position has been the seemingly incurable divisions existing in the ranks of their adversaries. So long as the Dissenters insisted on unsectarian education, they were simply asking for an impossibility; but it was clear from the debates on the Education Bill that the great mass of them had not then realized this fact. The Secularists, who offered an intelligible and consistent opposition to the Government measure, were but a small minority. The majority of the Nonconformist Liberals appeared to be satisfied by the exclusion of Denominational formularies from the School Board schools—a concession which they too hastily interpreted as equivalent to a recognition of unsectarian Christianity as the universal creed of the English ratepayer. Under any circumstances the working of the Act in country districts would probably have disabused them of this notion, but in the meantime they have been led to abandon their favourite theory by a different and more rapid process. The unexpected advance which the principle of compulsory education has made in public estimation, and the impossibility of giving it effect under the Education Act without making use of Denominational schools, have opened their eyes to the fact that there is no middle term between Denominationalism and Secularism. Many among them perhaps hardly yet understand how great a step they have taken. At Manchester, on Tuesday, for example, one of the speakers at the preliminary meeting talked of keeping "entirely clear of the religious difficulty by prohibiting the "payment of public fees to Denominational schools," as though he still imagined that the simple repeal of the 25th clause of the Education Act was the sole change required. But the speeches of the leaders of the Conference showed that they have thoroughly made up their minds to accept Secularism as the only way of escape from Denominationalism. Mr. JACOB BRIGHT pointed out that the Nonconformists ought to start from an unassailable position, and that they could not have this unassailable position short of secular education. What was called unsectarian education might be, and probably was, as offensive to the Roman Catholic and the Jew as the teaching of the Catechism to the Dissenter. Dr. MELLOR insisted that matters on which there are no differences of opinion should be taught by the State, and matters on which opinion is divided by voluntary agency. At the first sitting of the Conference on Wednesday Mr. MIALL, according to the Daily News Correspondent, confessed that at the time of the discussions on the Education Bill the Dissenters had not made up their own minds. They had hesitated to restrict Government to the secular part of education, and had allowed it to assume a religious function. The revival of the religious difficulty was the result of this indecision, and it could only be finally disposed of by "the limitation of the Government to its "secular function in all education—elementary, secondary, "and University." Mr. ROGERS maintained that there is no such thing in the world as unsectarian education. It is a phantom which the Nonconformists must hunt after no longer. These declarations were the more significant because the Committee of the Education League had just before declared themselves in favour of secularism. They, too, have given up the impossible compromise of undenominational religious teaching, and the hypocritical compromise of Bible reading without note or comment. Their new programme excludes from recognition as public elementary schools, and, by consequence, from a share in the Parliamentary grant, all schools not under the control of an elected School Board. Existing voluntary schools may by consent be placed under the School Board, on condition of giving up the management of the secular instruction, though retaining the control of the school buildings out of school hours. In School Board schools, periods distinct from those devoted to secular instruction may be set apart for religious instruction—such instruction to be given at the cost of the several denominations, and by specially appointed teachers. Thus the difference between a voluntary school carried on under the School Board, and a School Board school, would be that in the former no religious instruction would be given except by the permission of the school managers, while in the latter the religious instruction might embody—in separate rooms or at distinct times—the doctrines of as many denominations as happened to be represented among the scholars, and chose to be at the trouble of hunting up their own children. With this unmistakably Secularist programme before it, the Conference made no attempt to isolate itself from the Education League. On the contrary, it welcomed every declaration in favour of secularism, and Mr. MIALL in particular declared, amidst “enthusiastic cheering,” that in the programme the League had just put forth he saw the basis of a fair settlement.

The only incident which could have raised a doubt as to the genuineness of the Nonconformist conversion was the discussion which took place upon the third Resolution moved on Wednesday evening. As the Resolution originally stood, it declared that “in any national system of education the School Board and the State should make provision solely for the secular instruction which all children may receive in common, and that the responsibility of the religious education of each district (which in every case should be given by teachers other than those employed in the ordinary work of public schools) should be thrown upon voluntary effort.” The words contained in the parenthesis appear to have been objected to by at least one delegate—we do not know on what grounds—as opposed to Nonconformist principles; and in the end they were withdrawn. The point involved in the insertion or omission of some such words as these is one of great moment. As the clause stood before the omission of the parenthesis, it described a system of purely secular education; as it stood after the omission of the parenthesis, it described a system which might easily be identical with that unsectarian education which the Conference had been denouncing just before. If all the Dissenters wish is that the State should not pay for religious teaching, that condition is already satisfied. The Parliamentary grant to Denominational schools does not cover the cost of the secular education; and the fee which is paid by some School Boards in the case of children attending Denominational schools is no larger than the fee it has to remit in the case of children attending its own schools. The Dissenting answer to this, so far as we can understand it, is that in a Denominational school the teacher is not paid separately for the religious instruction he gives. It is something which he throws in for nothing, because he has been appointed by a Denominational agency. Whoever pays, therefore, for his support as a secular teacher, does in effect pay for his support as a religious teacher. Now apply this reasoning to the case of a secular school, in which the religious teaching after school hours was given by the schoolmaster. If the School Board consisted mainly of Churchmen, they would probably appoint a Churchman as teacher. They would then, in their capacity of School Board, pay him a salary for giving secular instruction, and in their capacity of a Denominational agency arrange for his teaching the Catechism after school hours without extra pay. If the School Board, on the other hand, was composed of Dissenters, the process would probably be reversed. A Dissenter would be chosen as teacher, and an arrangement would be made for his giving “unsectarian religious instruction” in the reserved hour without additional salary. It is obviously impossible that either of these practices should be retained under a secular system. All the Denominationalism that can exist under a time-table conscience clause is comprised in the fact that the same teacher gives instruction in religious as well as secular subjects. But the inconsistency of establishing Secularism, while retaining at the same time the characteristic feature of the present system, was too patent to be left uncorrected. The apparent divergence from the programme of the Education League was only an oversight. On the following evening Mr. DALE put everything straight by carrying a resolution, with only three dissentients, that in no case should the secular schoolmaster be employed to give religious instruction. This part of the proceedings at Manchester has been dwelt on at what may seem disproportionate length. But if it had not been for Mr. DALE's promptness it might have been appealed to after the close of the Conference as a proof that the Dissenters have not adopted Secularism, and for that reason it was necessary to show that any hesitation they may have displayed on the subject was merely momentary. It is impossible at this moment fully to weigh the results of this change of policy on the part of the Nonconformists. It is enough on this occasion to point out that it involves the division of the country into two opposite camps, Denominationalists and Secularists. The large and gelatinous mass of religious sentiment which has shrunk from definite religious teaching in State schools on the one side, and from no religious teaching in State schools on the other side, will now have to make its choice between the two. The contest will lie for the future between, on the one hand, the Church of England, the Roman Catholics, and perhaps the Wesleyans—all agreeing in demanding State aid towards the maintenance of their separate schools; and, on the other, the Congregationalists, Baptists, and persons of no professed creed—all agreeing in opposing any appropriation of public money to this purpose. So great a change in the composition of the opposing hosts cannot fail to have an important influence upon the course of the battle.

M. THIERS AND THE ASSEMBLY.

M. THIERS has shown the Assembly that his often repeated threat of resignation was not quite so empty as it had come to be regarded. When it was finally made clear that the Deputies would not carry their obedience so far as to adopt his plan of taxing raw materials, the blow was at length suffered to fall, and for two or three hours France was without a Government. It is a curious commentary on the constitutional makeshift of last summer that the relations of the PRESIDENT towards the Assembly should still be such as to make this step a natural one. Not one of the objects which the majority proposed to themselves in making M. THIERS President of the Republic has been attained. The Deputies wanted something less costly than M. THIERS to sling stones at, and with this view they devised the scheme of making him into a constitutional Sovereign, and providing him with a Cabinet which they could turn out at pleasure. But the PRESIDENT of the Republic has proved to be only the Provisional Chief of the Executive writ large. In taking possession of his new dignity M. THIERS has surrendered none of his old privileges. He has taken the same part in debate, and identified himself quite as completely with a particular line of policy. Last Saturday the crowning inconsistency was achieved, and a functionary, supposed to represent the nation, and not any particular party in it, retired from power because his Finance Minister had failed to get the consent of the Legislature to a particular mode of raising money. The truth is, the Assembly, when it fell in with the “Proposition River,” was trying to compass an impossibility. A provisional state of things will not cease to be provisional by reason of a mere change of title. The position which M. THIERS holds in France is one altogether distinct from that held by any ordinary constitutional Sovereign. It is essential to the idea of such a Sovereign that he shall reign and not govern; it is essential to the purposes for which M. THIERS is required that he should govern and not merely reign. M. THIERS has been picked out as the one politician who can guide the country through a crisis of unexampled difficulty. His dexterity, his Parliamentary experience, his freedom from compromising antecedents, have combined to invest him with this character. To make him in reality a constitutional monarch would have been to render these qualifications useless. It is, of all others, the position which gives least scope for their exercise. France wants a statesman with a policy, and especially with a definite theory as to how and when the indemnity is to be paid off; a constitutional King is bound to accept the policy offered him by his Ministers. There is no identity, there is not even a resemblance, between the two. M. THIERS saw this, if the Assembly did not, and the consequence of his clearer vision has been that he has played the same part under two names. He has been called President, but he has in all respects acted as Prime Minister. On the occasion of the first defeat his Cabinet has sustained, he has not even affected to dissociate himself from it. He might have dismissed M. POUYER-QUERTIER, and made some show of calling another Ministry to his aid. He might have used his exceptional position to avoid pledging the Assembly to a decisive vote, or to smooth matters over when the decisive vote had actually been given. Instead of this, he accepted the defeat of the tax on raw materials as a special slight to himself, and resigned office as if he had been the most petulant and wilful of Prime Ministers. If M. THIERS's acts were really as much dictated by temper as they appear to be, he would have gained little by his long Parliamentary experience. But his is eminently a rage with method in it. In this instance he had marked out for himself the course to be followed after defeat by engrossing the largest share of the defeat to himself. In the long debate which preceded the final vote M. POUYER-QUERTIER was nowhere. It was M. THIERS who maneuvered, M. THIERS who spoke, M. THIERS who acted. The acceptance of the tax on raw materials could not perhaps have been ensured by any means at M. THIERS's disposal, but it rejection was probably made more certain by the irritation of the Assembly at seeing itself replaced in the position from which it had thought to extricate itself by making M. THIERS President of the Republic. That expedient had not been resorted to without much searching of heart. An Assembly which, while secretly longing for a Monarchy, finds itself living provisionally under Republican forms, is naturally unwilling to give those forms more open assent than it finds unavoidable. So far as it went the creation of a President of the Republic, where before there had only been a Chief of the Executive Power, did constitute such an assent, and the Monarchical party in the Assembly must have been hard put to it before they gave even this amount of sanction to institutions which they so profoundly dislike. It was from no feeling that a Republic was the Government best calculated to unite Frenchmen that they brought themselves to take the step. The motive that influenced them was the feeling that the situation had become intolerable, and that they must provide some means of giving expression to their views without running the risk, at every separate utterance of them, of overturning the Bordeaux compact and delivering up France to anarchy. The honourable shelving of M. THIERS was the expedient adopted, but they forgot to consider whether M. THIERS would consent to remain shelved. The event has shown that, in omitting this inquiry, they omitted the most important element in the calculation. M. THIERS was quite willing to accept such amount of external dignity as they chose to invest him with, so long as it did not involve any sacrifice of real power. When the Assembly met again after the recess, it soon became apparent that he had accepted his new position, not in substitution for his old one, but in addition to it. His conduct of the Budget debates has shown the finesse of a Prime Minister, not the reserve of a Sovereign; and the rejection of his favourite scheme was probably in part due to the determination of the majority to shut their eyes to the unwelcome fact that their master was no further off from them than before.

Their assertion of independence was promptly followed by the resignation of the PRESIDENT. M. THIERS had managed, within an hour or two of his defeat, to impress the Deputies with the conviction that this time his determination was irrevocable. He shed some natural tears over his defeat, but as soon as they were wiped away, he professed the utmost relief and pleasure at the prospect of laying down the burden of office and retiring to sweet communion with his bronzes and china. But the Assembly was scared by the catastrophe it had brought upon itself. The Right Centre, the Left Centre, the Left, all were agreed, from whatever motives, in regarding M. THIERS as indispensable to France. They could not avert the resignation; for, as soon as the Assembly met the next day, M. GUYOT read the expected letter conveying the assurance that M. THIERS could only "continue to watch over the safety of the State" during the necessary delay before his successor could be appointed. But by proper submission the resignation might be cancelled, and the veteran cherub who keeps watch over the life of France be reinstated in his high position. All parties at once devoted themselves to the preparation of a Resolution which should express their anxiety to retain M. THIERS on his own terms. The Assembly was made to declare that its vote of the day before was not to be regarded as an act of mistrust or hostility, or as implying the refusal of the support which the Assembly had always given to the Government; that it now made a fresh appeal to the patriotism of the PRESIDENT of the Republic, and that it refused to accept his resignation. M. THIERS was at once informed of the vote, and allowed himself to be persuaded to withdraw his resignation. Perhaps his object was answered in the opportunity this interview gave him of giving the deputation a warning. The Army Bill was coming on, and a fresh difference between him and the Assembly might arise upon the question of universal compulsory service. On this point he hinted that no compromise would be possible. If he was again constrained to resign, it would be a resignation that knew no repentance.

Neither of the parties to this singular trial of strength can be said to have come out of it with dignity. But, on the other hand, both parties were acting to some extent under the pressure of an inexorable necessity. M. THIERS's position—at all events his conception of his position—compelled him to show the Assembly that it cannot have him as President without taking his policy into bargain. If he had not made this clear on the first occurrence of a serious difference between them, the Deputies might have traded upon his forbearance, and rejected the projects of his Cabinet as freely as though the President of the French Republic were a mere roi fainéant like an Emperor of Austria or a King of the Belgians. And the Assembly, when once he had resigned, had really no choice but to get him back again on his own terms. There is no other man who can pilot the ship through the sunken rocks and conflicting currents and shifting sandbanks among which her course still lies. So long as M. THIERS remains indispensable, the Assembly must be ready to submit to him whenever submission is the sole means of retaining him.

SOCIALISM IN THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

THE ingenious projector who lately selected as his imaginary allies in a scheme of Socialist revolution some of the leaders of the Conservative party may fairly appeal to an article in the current number of the Quarterly Review in proof of his sagacity. The writer indeed affords no indication of his political connexions, nor is it impossible that he may be a professed Liberal; but he has succeeded in inducing the journal which is supposed to be the principal Conservative organ to publish his lucubrations. If the Quarterly Review really expresses the opinions of any important section of the party, it may be inferred that Lord DERBY's recent speech has not been unanimously approved by his political allies. The difference between the advocates of paternal government and the supporters of individual freedom is as wide as the schism in the Liberal party which was described by Lord DERBY. The Reviewer, indeed, devotes a portion of his essay to the proof that all the remedies for existing evils are within the reach of the working classes themselves; but he at the same time recommends that they should be aided by legislative measures which on his own theory might have been deemed superfluous. Curtailment of the liquor trade, more effectual protection of workmen from the tyranny and exactions of Trade Unions, and the provision of improved dwellings by the countenance or direct act of the State, are the principal methods by which existing evils are to be corrected. It matters little to a benevolent theorist that Parliament has lately been compelled to relax the restrictions on Trade Unions, and that the leaders of the artisans are engaged in an agitation for the purpose of obtaining additional facilities for their favourite organization. Philanthropists who are anxious to diminish the use of intoxicating liquors not unnaturally listen to the demands of that section of the working class which seeks to be protected against itself; but it is perfectly clear that the millions which are annually expended on beer and spirits are voluntarily paid, and that a legal prohibition of an almost universal practice would be at the same time oppressive and abortive. Mr. BRUCE and his colleagues were justly blamed for framing a Bill which it would have been obviously impossible to pass; but subsequent discussion has shown that almost any alternative scheme for the same object would have been equally impracticable. Nearly all the prominent speakers who have lately discussed the question, including Lord DERBY, Mr. FAWCETT, and Mr. VERNON HARCOURT, have, on various grounds of political economy or of party expediency, recommended the Government to abstain from legislation; and Mr. DALRYMPLE, an enthusiast in the cause of temperance, lately announced to his constituents his refusal to support the scheme of the United Kingdom Alliance.

The proposal that additional facilities shall be given for the erection of comfortable and wholesome dwellings is less familiar, though it cannot be called novel. The Reviewer professes himself unable to understand the grounds on which land may be compulsorily taken for railways or other public works, while builders of houses for the working classes are reduced to depend like their neighbours on ordinary opportunities of voluntary purchase. The dislike of railways which the writer betrays in several expressions is curiously characteristic of the little sect of social economists to which he evidently belongs. A sneer at facilities for the transit of goods or the locomotion of the richer classes, or a suggestion that the average net earnings of railways are less than five per cent., proves that the writer has not understood the enormous addition to the public wealth which arises from the regular and speedy transit of goods and of persons. The saving of time alone to hundreds of millions of passengers can scarcely be estimated in money value, even if convenience is regarded as insignificant. It is in fact quite unnecessary to compare the respective advantages of railroads and of cottages or lodging-houses. The distinction between the cases, as far as compulsory purchase is concerned, is that a railway must be made on a definite piece of ground, while a builder who cannot buy a plot of land in one place may easily go to another. A single proprietor might, in default of Parliamentary powers have prohibited the construction of the line from London to York or to Dover; but, as experience showed, the FRANKLIN Trustee bought the land which they wanted in two or three different quarters of the town, and their operations could only have been rendered impracticable by a perverse and impossible league of all the landholders and lessees in the metropolis. Their undertaking, though it is understood to be moderately thriving, has not hitherto attained so marked an economical success as to induce capitalists to continue the experiment on a comprehensive scale; yet, if there is any meaning in the Reviewer's reference to railways, it would seem not difficult to find money for any enterprise which offers a fair prospect of remuneration. When he says that "no Railway Company could prove a 'preamble half so forcible or so indisputable' as the allegations which might be made in support of his building scheme, he is apparently not aware of the indispensable recital that "such object cannot be attained except by 'the authority of Parliament.'" It might be asserted that an acre of ground could not be bought by private contract in Spitalfields or Westminster, but the assertion could certainly not be proved. The proposal that land for buildings should be taken by compulsory purchase is made without reference to the well-known rule that in such cases an additional percentage of twenty or twenty-five per cent. is customarily and justly allowed to the vendor. If builders cannot be induced at present to run up lodging-houses on speculation, they would not be tempted by the prospect of paying an additional price for land. Having proved to his own satisfaction that it would be worth the while of capitalists to erect improved dwellings, and to incur the surplus expense of compulsory purchase, the Reviewer next recommends that the Socialist deity which is known as the State should, in case of need, descend to untie the knot. If the builders cannot raise money for lodging-houses at the market price, the State or the Treasury is to help them by the use of its credit. Every projector who demands the assistance of the State admits, as a matter of course, that he proposes to neglect in the particular case a rule which is otherwise prudent and sound. In another part of his essay the writer attempts to show that an average artisan might save from his earnings 50% a year; and if the calculation is accurate, it is evident that he could afford to pay a rent which would return a fair interest or profit to a builder. If dwelling-houses for the working classes for sale or for lease once became good investments, it would be as unnecessary for the State to interfere in Bermondsey as in Belgravia or May Fair. The notorious proposal to provide air, sunshine, and garden ground for the city workman was more attractive, and not much more chimerical.

Another grievance on which the Reviewer dwells is the exorbitant superfluity of retail traders. There is no doubt that the economic machinery of society is in this respect defective, or rather redundant; and French reformers of the world have repeatedly proposed the extinction of shopkeepers, and the substitution of a more limited number of official distributors of commodities. The English Reviewer shrinks from the posterous results which would follow as a legitimate deduction from his doctrines; and he can only rely on the perfectly legitimate competition with tradesmen of Co-operative Societies. The further suggestion that squires and employers of labour should establish and maintain "one comprehensive store, and enable 'it to beat out or eat up all rivals, on condition of its adopting honest prices, sound quality, full measure, and no 'credit,' might perhaps lead in practice to a collision with the laws against the truck system. Miners and other workmen extremely dislike the comprehensive stores which are provided by their employers. Squires have in general enough to do in maintaining the rights of property without converting the whole class of retail traders, and especially the shopkeepers in their own neighbourhood, into deadly enemies. After all, village shops with their bad goods and high prices have been established in compliance with a practical demand. If it suited their customers better to make their purchases elsewhere, there would be no need of legislation, or even of argument. According to the Reviewer, "any contrivance (or 'regulation, if that were possible) that should reduce the 'number of retailers by 50 per cent. or 70 per cent. 'would be probably the greatest practical and immediate boon to the working classes that could be devised.'" If philanthropists would take the advice of cold-blooded bystanders, they would keep their designs on the shopkeepers secret till they had shut up half or three-fourths of the public houses. The regulation which is hinted at as a barely possible means an Act of Parliament against all retail traders not less stringent than Mr. Bacon's scheme for running the publouses. When the Legislature or the Government has fixed the number of shops in every branch of business, it will perhaps dawn even on the semi-socialist intellect that the revival of obsolete restrictions is not uniformly conducive to progress. It took several centuries to convince the English nation that, as a general rule, people know their own business best. Lord DERRY and some less eminent politicians still hold to the faith which had of late been reputed orthodox; but the SCOTT RUSSELLS, and FAKINGTONS, and Quarterly Reviewers assiduously employ themselves in pushing back the hands of the clock. It is not surprising that little attention is paid to their protests against ruder and more impatient interference with social arrangements. It is necessary to leave the machinery to itself, if it is to be of any use, except where it has to be wound up or exceptionally regulated. The alternative plan of depending on the judgment and caprice of the State, which means in England a Minister or a Parliamentary majority, will only satisfy those who from time to time fancy that they can impose their own crochets on the ruling power. The Quarterly Reviewer would be regarded in France or by the International Society as a feeble reactionist. His truisms, his commonplaces, his exposure of popular delusions, though they form much the soundest part of his treatise, would not, in the judgment of real Socialists, be redeemed by his plans of expropriation, or even by his denunciation of shopkeepers; yet a wise revolutionist would not discourage an unconscious associate who, with the best intentions, may be useful in opening the door to the assailants outside.

NAVY ADMINISTRATION.

THE evidence taken before the Meyers Commission may or may not end in enabling Lord LAWRENCE and his colleagues to find out who was really to blame for sending that unfortunate ship to sea; but it certainly has had the effect of revealing to the English public the very extraordinary manner in which one great department of State affairs is conducted. Several navy officials have been examined, and all they say points in one direction. There is no such thing as the administration of the navy in any proper sense of the term. All is chaos inside the Admiralty. There are Departments, the very number of which is a matter of speculation. There is a Board, which its Secretary describes as a phantom. There are clerks who open letters and do what they like with them. There are also persons who answer letters, but it is left to them to connect or not, as they may think proper, what they say with what is said to them. There are persons who sign these answers, but it is no part of their business to know what they are signing. The Admiralty keeps no record showing the history of a ship, although some intention of keeping such a record seems to have been once formed. All that the Admiralty does is to issue an infinity of orders regulating the conduct of its subordinates; but none of these subordinates know what these orders are, nor does the Admiralty trouble itself to see that they are carried out. There is no communication between different branches of the administration, and no one can say in whose sphere the discharge of any duty lies. The Admiralty officials seem to be, with some few exceptions, on which, before the publication of the Report of the Commission, it would be premature to comment, honest and zealous public servants. But in the face of such a hopeless muddle what can they do? They can at the most discharge such duties as they are allowed to fulfil to the best of their ability. But they cannot know what is happening around them, or whether their efforts will be of any avail to the public service. They can only wait and see when the curious state of things to which they belong will come to an end. The Secretary is perhaps the official who sees most of the muddle, who has the greatest opportunity of watching letters opened that afterwards, in the words of the ATTORNEY-GENERAL, vanish into space like the Bella and the Osprey, and then of perusing the communications which ingenious clerks write in answer to such of these vanished letters as they think can be answered with such powers of invention as nature or habit may have given them. And the only conclusion to which the present plain-spoken and intelligent Secretary, Mr. VERNON LUSHINGTON, was able to arrive after fully making himself acquainted with the interior of his office, was that some day a revolution must come which would sweep the whole mass of absurdity away. He may have the satisfaction of knowing that, when the day arrives for such a revolution to have a chance of being realised, he will have done not a little to help it along.

How the business of the Admiralty is really carried on can only be judged by reading in detail the bulky evidence that has been given to the Commission. Here one little instructive fact peeps out, and there another; and scarcely a witness appears who does not add some touch to the general picture of collapse. But, as the conduct of different public officials is touched on by these witnesses, and as the Commissioners have not reported how far the officials concerned have been guilty of negligence or dereliction of duty, to quote the evidence given so far as it illustrates the conduct of Admiralty business might be to quote evidence prejudicial to men not yet condemned. It is only when the witness makes general remarks, or describes some mode or procedure as to which there is no dispute, that reference can at present be properly made to what he has said. Still some instances may be given which illustrate the system, while they do not bear adversely on the conduct of individuals. One of the theories started to account for the loss of the Megara is that the corrosion of the iron plates was due to the galvanic action produced by copper. The President of the Council of Contractors of the Admiralty stated that, in spite of an Admiralty order prohibiting the use of copper pipes and rose-boxes in particular cases, there were many ships in which such articles were still being used, which he attributed to the division which existed between the Contractor's Department and the Engineer's Department. There was an order issued to Dockyard officers, prohibiting the use of copper pipes and rose-boxes, but no such order had been issued to ships' officers; so that, in his opinion, the engineers and officers of the Megara were justified in making use of copper, as they had received no order against it. Again, a kind of cement is admitted to have been used in the Megara which was so bad that an order was sent to remove it from other ships in which it had been used; but this, according to Sir SPENCER ROBINSON, was omitted to be done in regard to the Megara because a clerk had omitted to register a letter in the Ship Branch, owing to which piece of neglect the matter "slipped through." In 1866 a Report was sent from Woolwich, stating that the Megara might do for a couple of years, but should then be re-examined. This Report was no doubt recorded somewhere, as the same witness informed the Commissioners, but no one could say where. In 1867 he wished for some information regarding the Megara, and applied to the Woolwich officers who had sent in this Report. But they had entirely forgotten all about it, and reported that there had been no Report. There was also a letter from a Commodore of the same date in reference to the Megara, but there was what the witness called another "extraordinary lapse" about it; for, although it came to the Admiralty, it never went to the Controller. Further, the witness stated that there was no system in the Admiralty by which the previous reports on ships could be precisely brought up. Partly this miserable absence of all proper organization was, Sir SPENCER ROBINSON thought, due to the insufficient number of clerks employed. But the figures he gave scarcely bore out his statement, as it appeared that each clerk had to attend to an average of only nine letters a day. But, even if nine letters a day are too many for a Government official, it does not appear how a larger number of clerks to do the work of dealing with letters by mere haphazard, and with no notion of what was to be done with them, could have been of any benefit to the country. All that these clerks and their immediate superiors could do was to survey the muddle in which they lived with serene complacency, and placidly await the revolution which the Secretary considered inevitable, but which, had it not been for the loss of the Megara, might easily have been delayed until long after they were all dead and buried.

Who is to blame for all this enormous waste of time and money, and for the dangers to which the lives of officers and seamen, and the safety and honour of the country, have been exposed? It must be owned that the system of Parliamentary government, whatever compensating advantages it may possess, lies more than anything else at the bottom of the mischief. A civilian is by a turn of fortune in the House of Commons suddenly called on to manage the English navy. He may be as absolutely ignorant of the navy and everything connected with it as Mr. GOSCHEN was when he had last spring to pass from the Poor Law Board at a minute's notice to be the head of the Admiralty. The civilian has of course an immense deal to learn. The Naval Lords are certainly there to help him, and the permanent heads of departments are also there. As a rule, the permanent officials of Government departments are very ready to help those whom the shifting waves of Parliamentary strife roll over their heads; and such is the prestige of the House of Commons, and the force of habit, that scarcely any one probably in the Admiralty feels aggrieved or annoyed that his master for the time being is a bustling stranger who does not know one end of a ship from the other. The civilian does not lack assistance, or valuable assistance. But he has so much to do to learn even the rudiments of his business, that he cannot get down to such details as the mode in which letters are answered or left unanswered. Mr. CHILDERS did set himself to work to do something towards reorganizing navy administration, but he naturally began at the end nearest to himself. He altered a little at the top; but he was years off getting to the bottom. The permanent officials, it might be thought, would be able to suggest useful reforms. But when a great system assumes that type of disorganization which consists in a total want of cohesion between its separate branches, those who are conversant with any one branch cannot really propose a remedy for the mischief, but can only try to make the conduct of business in their own department more efficient. Their requests naturally take the form of asking for more money for extra clerks, supervisors, and so forth, and they are at once snubbed. The civilian cannot perhaps understand much about the navy, but he can understand that his colleague at the Exchequer will not like a larger staff being employed. Very great imperfections of management are, we fear, almost inseparable from the plan of making members of Parliament, who have no knowledge whatever of what they have to manage, masters of enormous and complicated portions of the machinery of Government. It is chiefly the honesty, the ability, and the zeal of hundreds of men who spend their lives for a very small recompense in Government offices that make this anomalous system of administering public affairs work as well as it does. Every now and then, too, there is some lucky accident which, in a manner that no one could have anticipated, gives an opportunity of effecting some reform on a great scale. Such an opportunity has now been afforded with regard to the navy, and we can only hope that it may not be thrown away, although it is, we confess, very disheartening to find that Mr. BAXTER is convinced that the system of naval administration as it exists falls little short of perfection.

THE CASES OF WATSON AND EDMUNDS.

THE decision of the HOME SECRETARY in the case of WATSON appears to be in harmony with the prevailing sentiment of society, and it would probably be useless to examine too curiously the reasons by which it might be justified. An atrocious crime was perpetrated with circumstances of almost unexampled horror, and at least half the people one meets express compassion for the criminal. Instead of criticizing what Mr. BRUCE has done, let us observe with satisfaction what he did not do. Neither he nor the Judges who advised him have in this instance given any encouragement to those elastic theories of insanity which would rescue from capital punishment all murderers who excite pity, and many also who do not. In considering the practical application of these theories in Criminal Courts, it may be useful hereafter to remember that they were made to embrace a case in which the only evidence of insanity was furnished by the act for which the prisoner was tried. After a long life of learned labour WATSON saw himself reduced to poverty, and he was, let us assume, further afflicted by the irritating companionship of his wife. When medical witnesses, starting from these facts, proceed to discourse learnedly about "melancholia" and "homicidal impulse," they ought not to be surprised at finding that public respect for the profession to which they belong has not been enhanced by their appearance in the witness-box. Let us, however, do justice to the motives which no doubt induce medical practitioners to place themselves in a position which is always disagreeable and only occasionally remunerative. Mr. Baron MARTIN lately remarked that the defence of insanity was commonly raised when "people of means" were charged with crime. We are quite sure that neither the learned Judge nor any of his hearers forgot that generous devotion which has made medical and surgical science freely available "for all sorts and conditions of men." Hospitals are among the few institutions of this country with which nobody finds fault, and wherever money is raised to build and maintain a hospital, skilful and kind treatment is readily forthcoming for the patients. Both the heads and the body of the medical profession, alike in town and country, are entitled to a recognition of the great services which they render to society and individuals, irrespectively of pecuniary reward. And if the doctors were generally greedy of money—which they are not—they might probably observe that they are likely to get what is called, in homely language, "more

"kicks than halfpence" in Courts of Justice. Provincial practitioners are not only ready, like their London brethren, to give their help gratuitously to those who cannot pay for it, but they have also made observations and formed theories which they are willing upon occasion to ventilate in the witness-box or the newspapers. One of the most odious criminals of modern times was a man named SOUTHEY, alias FORWOOD, who murdered three children, in London, and a woman and a child at Ramsgate. This monster was tried at Maidstone, and money did not seem to be largely supplied for his defence, yet medical evidence of insanity was produced regardless of expense as well as of facts and common sense. It is doubtless true that if a person whose friends possess ample means is charged with a capital crime a lawyer is employed to get up a defence, and he goes to the doctors, just as in another class of cases he goes to the engineers, and he generally obtains what he wants. At a large outfitter's you may find clothes to suit any shape, and among doctors you may find a theory of insanity adapted to any variety of murder. The outfitters are much more particular about payment than the doctors; but, on the other hand, a coat is always worth something, whereas a medical opinion may be unfounded, and possibly pernicious. The experience of Mr. Baron MARTIN, as of other lawyers, might probably be correctly said to amount to this—that honest medical testimony to the insanity of a murderer may be obtained in a great many cases where the prisoner has friends who will take the trouble to apply for it. In this point of view the case of SOUTHEY deserves to be compared with that of WATSON, and indeed the Judge's charge to the jury in SOUTHEY's case was cited by the counsel who prosecuted WATSON, in anticipation of the defence of insanity which was raised in his behalf. WATSON, being a clergyman and schoolmaster, may be presumed to have held the ordinary system of religion and morality which condemns murder; whereas SOUTHEY had framed a system of his own which excused it. Both commit murder, and the one having led a good and the other a wicked life, the goodness of the one and the wickedness of the other seem to be alike regarded as evidence of insanity. The truth appears to be that the production of medical evidence depends not upon the means of the prisoner's friends, but upon the notoriety which the crime obtains, the length of time which elapses between the act and the trial, the topics which happen to occupy the newspapers, and various other fluctuating circumstances. The doctors, however, are not to blame for this accidental and partial application of their theories. They are only too ready to appear when called upon.

We find in the Daily News an account of the supposed reasons for relieving WATSON, of which the writer must have seen, although he did not indicate, the absurdity. The prisoner is old, his character was good, and he is believed to have acted under extreme provocation. This journal has discussed the cases of WATSON and EDMUNDS with so much good sense and moderation that it cannot need to be reminded that wives of the "aggravating" type are not uncommon, and the provocation which they give their husbands is never admitted as an excuse for beating them, although it is now offered in extenuation of the more heinous offence of murder. The Daily News even goes further, and suggests that, if the prisoner had been younger, this plea of provocation might not have availed him. It was doubtless apparent to the writer of this article, as well as to everybody else, that hanging would deprive WATSON of only a short span of life, and that the force of passion ought to diminish with advancing years. If the sentiment of respect for grey hairs were invoked on his behalf, it would be simultaneously remembered that his wife's grey hairs were stained with her blood which his hand had shed. The real source of the compassion which undeniably was felt for WATSON was probably the contrast between the prospects of his early life and the disappointment and misery of its close. His classical attainments won for him the Gold Medal of the University of Dublin, and while he was a student he saw the lady to whom, after the lapse of twenty years, he made an offer of marriage, which was accepted. There are few features of character which more widely excite sympathy than this constancy in mature manhood to an attachment formed in youth; yet WATSON's story of his life, as he told it in a few words of Latin on a scrap of paper, painfully confirms the cynical saying that the cure for love is marriage. At the age of forty he obtained the Headmastership of the Stockwell Grammar School, with a salary upon which he and his wife were able to live comfortably, but hardly to save anything. He held this post for twenty-six years, and then, being, as being thought to be, worn out, he was cast aside. Thus he found himself at sixty-six or more years of age with the tastes and habits of a gentleman, and the position and prospects of a pauper. He had pursued throughout life the studies by which in youth he had gained distinction. But all these years of diligent reading and prolific writing had obtained for him neither fame nor fortune. His learning was not a readily marketable commodity, and the greater part of his time and energy had been expended in procuring the means of decent existence, and nothing more, for himself and wife. It is not the fault of the managers of the Stockwell Grammar School that they are unable to provide pensions for exhausted masters, or to pay salaries out of which provision may be made by vigorous manhood against old age. There have been few more painful stories of life-long struggle and final failure than this of WATSON, and the public mind was strongly affected by the remark that it would be cruelty rather than mercy to cause him to live the few and evil days which remained to him on earth. With much learning, ceaseless toil, and some want probably of worldly prudence, he saw himself at the close of his working life as poor as when he began it:—

He hates him
That would upon the rack of this tough world
Stretch him out longer.

It is not intended to suggest that WATSON was a man more sinned against than sinning; nor need we be disturbed by the possible inference from his reprieve that respectability is an excuse for crime. If he had been less learned he might perhaps have been more prosperous, and might not have been exposed to trials which neither religion nor philosophy enabled him to bear with patience. There is an ancient Greek epigram which describes EPICETUS as lame of body and poor as a beggar, and "beloved of the immortal gods." In modern England study and contemplation are apt to lead to poverty unmitigated by general esteem. In our age and climate a philosopher cannot live in a tub, but must pay rent and taxes for a house. These reflections may perhaps supply some explanation of the compassion which, whether reasonably or not, has been felt for WATSON.

As regards the case of EDMUNDS, we are not prepared to say that Mr. BRUCE could well have taken any other course, under the circumstances, than that which he has followed. It would have been difficult for him to disregard Mr. Baron MARTIN's recommendation of further inquiry, and if there was to be an inquiry he could not do better than entrust it to physicians of experience and reputation who had not appeared as witnesses upon the trial. Unfortunately we have not before us the report of those physicians, or any other information which would enable us to form an estimate of the value of the evidence upon which they founded their opinion of the insanity of Miss EDMUNDS. As the case stands at present, the plea of insanity which, upon the evidence submitted at the trial, was unanimously rejected by the judge and jury, has now been accepted upon evidence as to the nature or worth of which we know absolutely nothing. It is of course possible that the physicians who made this inquiry may have discovered facts which were not made known at the trial; but the only reasons for supposing Miss EDMUNDS to be insane with which the public is acquainted have failed to justify that conclusion. The existing practice of reviewing sentences in criminal cases is in the highest degree unsatisfactory, but all that can be said against it has been often and strongly said, and thus far without any effect whatever. If criminal prosecutions were conducted upon any system, provision would be made in it for the adequate examination of cases of alleged insanity, and for reviewing the result of an inquiry with the same publicity which attends the inquiry itself. It is to be hoped that a theory of criminal insanity which must be regarded as most dangerous to society may not be encouraged by the precedents of this week. The application of that theory to the case of WATSON was a reductio ad absurdum; and the only conceivable justification of the decision in the case of EDMUNDS is that the physicians who examined her after the trial found evidence of insanity of which nothing was previously known. Nothing can be more dangerous to public security than this private and irresponsible method of investigating the plea of insanity in criminal cases.

MR. BRUCE AND THE BREWERS.

WE have not heard much of Mr. BRUCE since he endeavoured in the autumn to excite the compassion of his constituents by likening himself—not perhaps very discreetly, considering the violent Protestantism of his audience—to a well-known saint stung all over with arrows, and by enumerating the number of letters he had to open and answer every morning even when he was supposed, in mockery, to be enjoying a holiday. It may be taken for granted that the HOME SECRETARY has not a very easy time of it. He has a great variety of questions to deal with, and the questions, though not always important in themselves, touch people very closely, and occasion a good deal of personal or local irritation and excitement. The French have a phrase about "killing the mandarin," implying that it is very easy to settle awkward questions by sacrificing a Chinaman at the other end of the world; but a Home Secretary's victims are all near at hand, and if they do not like the treatment they receive, they are sure to make their groans audible and to exhibit their contortions under his eyes. As the HOME SECRETARY'S duties are, under any circumstances, so troublesome and difficult, it is a pity that he should persist in creating artificial embarrassments for himself by a perverse and injudicious course of action. It cannot be said that Mr. BRUCE has not had sufficient warning. Last Session was to have been a great Home Office Session, and we know what came of it. Mr. BRUCE'S bungling occasioned the loss, not only of his own Bills, but of several seats which had been filled by Ministerial supporters, and which are now filled by opponents. His Licensing Bill was laughed out of the House of Commons, but the interests which were threatened did not think it altogether a laughing matter, and have not been slow to take their revenge. It is possible that legislation may be necessary which will not be agreeable to the brewers and publicans; but it is quite certain that no Government can cope with such an influential body which is not backed up by a strong and resolute public opinion. The measure of last Session pleased nobody, and the HOME SECRETARY had no alternative but to abandon it. We are afraid, from Mr. BRUCE'S answer to the deputation of ale brewers last Wednesday, that he has failed to profit by experience. He has learned nothing, but he has forgotten a good deal which it would have been as well to remember. The Government, he intimates, will in future be careful not to repeat the error of introducing too many measures at once, and the Licensing Bill will not make its appearance until the Scotch Education Bill, the Ballot Bill, and the Mines Regulation Bill have been disposed of. This may be a prudent resolution, but the consequence may perhaps be that there will this year be no time for a Licensing Bill of any kind. It does not follow that, because legislation may have to be postponed, the intentions of the Government should therefore be kept absolutely in the dark. It would be absurd to expect that a Minister should disclose the clauses of an important measure, before it had been submitted to Parliament, to a deputation which might probably make use of the information in order to oppose the Bill. But there is a wide difference between giving the details of a measure and indicating the general principles upon which legislation is to be based.

If Mr. BRUCE is under the impression, as he appears to be, that the Licensing Bill of last year was an excellent Bill, and that it was lost only because it happened to be brought forward at a time when there was a crush of other measures which led to its being thrust out of the way, he has profited very little by the instruction and meditations of the recess. The Bill was, in fact, a very bad Bill—arbitrary, fantastic, illogical, and unjust. It pleased nobody and offended everybody. The publicans naturally resented the confiscation of their property. The Temperance people were disappointed by the delay which must take place before the restrictive operation of the measure would commence. Those who looked only to the interests of the community at large were alarmed by the dangerous precedent of a violent invasion of the rights of property, while at the same time they distrusted the effect of a close monopoly in the hands of powerful capitalists. But even if the measure had been of a less objectionable character, there was another reason why its chances of recommending itself to public favour were sensibly diminished. Mr. BRUCE had been so careful to conceal his intentions before the measure was produced, that when it at last appeared it took everybody by surprise. Legislation is not conveniently conducted after the fashion of an ambushade. A suitor in a Court of law cannot be expected to disclose his case beforehand to his opponent; but the passing of Acts of Parliament is not a mere contest between individuals who are seeking, under the guidance of smart attorneys, to take advantage of each other. Mr. HORSMAN has very justly observed that one of the reasons why the Irish legislation of the Government was accomplished so successfully was that the public mind was fully prepared by long discussion for most of the conclusions which were then thrown into a statutory form. It is reasonable that a Minister should be allowed to reserve the details of his project until he has an opportunity of presenting it to Parliament in a complete and matured form; but for his own ease, and in the interest of the measure, as well as in justice to the public, he should take care beforehand to secure popular assent to the broad principles which are involved. The long and tedious controversies which often precede legislation on important questions in this country represent not only the gestation of opinion, but part of the process of promulgation. When the law is at last passed, the country is familiar with its precepts, and is prepared to obey them, instead of having to make acquaintance with new, and perhaps vexatious, regulations in the unpropitious form of pains and penalties. The only chance of passing a satisfactory Licensing Bill is by appealing for support, not to fanatics on the one side, or to interested tradesmen on the other, but to the community at large. If Mr. BRUCE hopes to deal successfully with this question, he must either be content to follow public opinion as it is, or he must create a public opinion in favour of his own views. In either case he had better pluck up his courage, and tell us plainly the principles on which he means to act.

It appears that Mr. BRUCE still looks back fondly and regretfully on the absurd and mischievous project of last Session; but it may be assumed that he will not be permitted by his colleagues to reproduce it. To say that the principle on which the Government desires to legislate is regulation, not restriction, seems to us to be little better than an idle quibble. There is no way of regulating the public-houses which does not involve restriction. It is impossible to reduce the number of public-houses, to limit the hours during which they shall be allowed to remain open, to punish drunkenness, without restricting in a greater or less degree the freedom of the people who keep or frequent these establishments; although, if anybody finds it more comfortable to have this called regulation, and not restriction, there is perhaps no great harm in indulging the whim. It is supposed that the people of this country drink a great deal more than is good for them, and it is obvious that, if there is to be any legislation on the subject, it can only be in the direction of reducing the consumption of liquor. In so far as legislation fails in accomplishing this object, it will be useless; in so far as it succeeds, it will reduce the receipts of the publicans, and will consequently offend that body. Mr. WHITBREAD, it seems, once told Mr. BRUCE that when the sale of beer at any of the public-houses belonging to his firm began to fall off, it was almost invariably discovered upon inquiry that the house had become disreputable and disorderly, so that respectable people would not frequent it. It is possible, therefore, that strict police supervision, although it would probably promote sobriety, might not be agreeable to the Tcetotallers, inasmuch as it would, on Mr. WHITBREAD'S theory, encourage rather than diminish the sale of drink. The HOME SECRETARY appears to be still of opinion that the number of public-houses should be reduced, but he does not say whether he will attempt a reduction. If police inspection, as to the propriety of which everybody except the lowest class of publicans is agreed, were efficiently carried out, it might be expected to lead, indirectly if not directly, to the suppression of the disreputable houses of the existence of which Mr. BRUCE reasonably complains. It was stated by the deputation of brewers that the Beerhouse Act of 1869, and the Suspensory Act of last Session, had been followed by the withdrawal of 8,241 licences, or one-fourteenth of the whole number. If the HOME SECRETARY would be content to confine his Bill to police regulations, and to leave the licensing jurisdiction to the magistrates, as at present, he would probably find little difficulty in passing a measure which would do good not only by its own operation, but by putting an end to, or at least moderating, a very unpleasant and unprofitable agitation. It is impossible to condemn too strongly the disgraceful uproar at the Easter meeting on behalf of the Permissive Bill, and the cowardly attack on Bishop TEMPLE; but the tactics of the Alliance agitators do not invariably display the temperance which they advocate. It is stated that two of the justices at Liverpool on Monday last inflicted fines for drunkenness to the amount of 100*l.*, and also that one of them intimated to some of the prisoners that their employers would be informed of the convictions. It does not fall within the duty of magistrates to circulate reports of the proceedings in their Courts; and it is desirable that they should discharge their judicial functions with calmness and impartiality, and without reference to their private crochets.

LITERARY GARBAGE.

A PUBLISHER whom we will not name has sent us a packet of books with which we are at a loss to know what to do. We have glanced at a few pages, and have no desire to read any more. We should be very sorry to find a place for the volumes on our shelves, and still more to promote their circulation by giving them away. Even in the fragmentary form in which they might be sent to the butterman or used for domestic purposes, there is no saying what contamination a stray sheet might not carry with it. In short, there is only one satisfactory way of disposing of the gift, and that is to put it at once in the fire. In doing so, however, we cannot refrain from making a protest, in the name both of decency and art, against the publication, or rather, we should say, republication, of such works as those which we have just consigned to the grate. These six volumes contain the "Plays, Histories, and Novels of the ingenious Mrs. Aphra Behn," reproduced, as regards paper, type, copper-plates, and binding, in exact imitation of the original editions, and without the slightest curtailment or modification of the original text. It may be admitted that, if Mrs. Behn was to be reproduced at all, there was no use in trying to make her decent. Expurgation would have been a fruitless labour. Shakespeare may be Bowdlerized, so might Dryden, and even Congreve might be made to yield some solid residuum of wit and sense at the bottom of a Puritan crucible. But Mrs. Behn is nothing if not indecent, and would disappear bodily under any process of purification. When the experiment was completed, it would be found that there was nothing left except the covers of the volumes. The publisher of the present edition is, to do him justice, above the mock modesty of asterisks and dashes. If anybody wants to know exactly what Mrs. Behn wrote, and what sort of stuff her contemporaries relished, he will find it all here, as rank and feculent as when first produced. Time has not staled the foulness of the ordure. It appears that copies of Mrs. Behn's writings have become very scarce, and, as they fetch high prices, it may be inferred that there is a keen demand for them. There is a fashion in these things, and Aphra has been picked out of the gutter in which she has lain so long. She is still perhaps to be found here and there in the dusty, worm-eaten libraries of old country houses; but, as a rule, we imagine, she has been ejected from all decent society for a generation or two. It may be remembered that Sir Walter Scott's grand-aunt, Mrs. Keith of Ravelstone, desired in her old age to refresh her recollection of Mrs. Behn's works, which, as a girl, she had often heard read aloud for the amusement of a fashionable company in London. "Take back your bonny Mrs. Behn," she said, returning the volume, "and, if you will take my advice, put her in the fire; for I found it impossible to get through the very first novel." She was ashamed at eighty years of age, and sitting alone, to find herself reading it. The revived taste for these works, if there really is a revived taste, must necessarily be morbid and artificial; indeed, it may be called rather a litch than a taste. It must be presumed that a publisher would not go to the expense of reprinting such books unless he saw good reason to expect a market for them. There can be no doubt, we fear, that there is a market, and, from the commercial point of view, a very good market, for a certain kind of salacious literature, although it is possible that Mrs. Behn may prove, not perhaps too indecent, but at least too stupidly brutish even for the most depraved taste of these days. In looking through the catalogues of several well-known dealers in second-hand books, we have been struck by the prominence given to the class of works which are sometimes described by the mild technical designation of Facetie. Within the last year or two, the number of the dealers who make these wares the staple of their business, and the openness, and even demonstrativeness, with which they advertise their erotic character, appears to have increased in a very marked way. If the title of a work is not sufficiently explicit, stimulating comments are appended as an incitement to purchase it. We find, for example, Contes à rire recommended as "a very curious collection of amatory tales or novels"; and last the peculiar flavour of Crébillon should not be generally known, it is mentioned that his writings are of "a very singular and free character."

It has apparently become a regular, and, if we may judge from the scale of prices, a highly lucrative, branch of book-selling, to seek out all the literary nastiness of past generations for the gratification of eager and wealthy amateurs. The Society for the Suppression of Vice has done good service, for which it deserves better support than it receives, in helping to put down the more obscure purveyors of indecency; but when one hole is stopped, another is opened. It would seem that there are booksellers, with handsome shops in conspicuous parts of the town, who still contrive to do a brisk business in a similar line, not only with impunity, but with profit, and with little, if any, disguise. In the catalogue of a West-end book-shop we lately found a collection of "Nude figures and other free subjects, carefully mounted on stout drawing-paper, and bound in a handsome atlas folio-volume, half red Turkey morocco, cloth sides, ornamental tooled gilt back, gilt edges, patent locks and key, marked at 10s. 10s., with a note appended—"This collection cannot be sent on approval." We have heard that the British Museum was at one time infested with readers who had a predilection for books of the sort which is sometimes called "satirical," and sometimes "free," until the Secretary established a rule that works of this kind should be shown only in a particular manner.

in the presence of attendants of severe mien, specially appointed for the purpose—an ordeal which soon checked the abuse. Private dealers naturally encourage a taste to which they owe their gains, and occasionally, it is said, indulge regular customers with the run of their shelves, and the freedom of the little back room which contains their choicest treasures. A party of connoisseurs revelling in the masterpieces of literary or artistic obscenity suggests some curious reflections. The passion for notoriety, the rage for distinction of any kind, sometimes plays strange pranks; but it is difficult to realize the elation of the man whose bosom swells with the proud consciousness that he is pointed out in society as possessing a finer collection of nasty books and prurient pictures than any one else. Rich bindings of morocco and gold would seem to suggest convivial uses for the volumes which are thus ostentatiously arrayed, although the locks intimate that the exhibition is reserved for a select fellowship.

We have certainly no intention of entering upon a critical examination of Mrs. Behn's writings. It may be said of her indecency, as of the indecency of another dramatist of the same period, that it is protected against critics as a skunk is protected against the hunters; it is safe because it is too filthy to handle, and too noisome to approach. In literary style, in dramatic ingenuity, in delineation of character, her works are as poor and commonplace as anything that can be imagined. The characters are little better than lay figures, and even in the labelling there is a strange poverty of invention. A mean and cowardly fellow, who is or has been a Commonwealth man; a dashing rake, who is of course a Tory, who despises marriage, and who succeeds with the women rather by bullying than coaxing; one or two weak and wanton women, who are all in love with the scamp, and ready, like ripe fruit, to fall at a touch or a breath—these are the types which are reproduced with tiresome monotony. The men are either canting rogues or heartless libertines; the women are ladies of quality who are taken for courtesans, or courtesans who, from the assimilation of manners, find no difficulty in passing themselves off as persons of quality. And this description of the characters is also a description of the plot, which, with some small variations in detail, is always the same wire-drawn story of licentious intrigue and complicated amours, assignments and mistakes of identity, courting and scuffling, with occasionally, when the fun begins to flag, a rush of the company in their night-clothes across the stage. We do not accept wit as an excuse for indecency, but there are books which may be read for their wit in spite of their indecency. But if Mrs. Behn is read at all, it can only be from a love of impurity for its own sake, for rank indecency of the dullest, stupidest, grossest kind, unrelieved by the faintest gleam of wit or sensibility. Even if one were not revolted by the obscenity, one would be oppressed by the wearisome inanity of the dialogue before one had read more than a page or two. It is difficult to conceive any human creature, with intelligence enough to read at all, reading through six volumes of such vapid and disgusting nonsense. We have here at least a proof that dulness and indecorum are quite compatible.

We know, of course, all that can be said in favour of such books as illustrations of art and archaeology. We admit at once that Mrs. Behn's novels and plays, like a great deal of worthless and noxious stuff of the same kind, cannot be ignored by historical students. That they should have been so popular when first produced, and that a century later they should still have been read aloud for the amusement of good society, are facts which must affect our estimate of the culture and morality of those periods. The works of Mrs. Behn are part of the history of Puritanism. The outbreak of debauchery which followed, and was to some extent produced by, the fanatical austerities of the Commonwealth, is illustrated by the profligacy of the City Heiress, and the Feigned Courtesans, or a Night's Intrigue. Even in her own day, however, Mrs. Behn's works had a scandalous reputation, and Pope, who could stand a good deal in that way, was startled by her audacity:—

The stage, how loosely doth Astraea tread,
Who fairly puts her characters to bed!

It is true that this did not prevent her from attaining honourable burial in Westminster Abbey, and it is a pity her books could not have been put to rest with her bones. That they should now be disinterred from the obscurity into which they have happily fallen is surely inexcusable. For historical purposes there are copies enough in public libraries and private collections, and the general reader may be content to accept on trust the assurance that all he would learn from perusing them himself would be that they are very dull and very indecent. We were startled the other day to find a weekly paper—not Reynolds's, as might perhaps be supposed, but a literary journal of some pretensions—declaring effusively that "all students of English literature will be grateful" for this reprint of Mrs. Behn, and that "a larger public may now find entertainment, and should find nothing but profit, in studying" her writings. The idea of getting any good out of such books as these reminds one of the philosopher of Laputa who endeavoured to extract the elements of food from the refuse of humanity. The critic admits regretfully that "the best passages cannot be quoted," but he does not appear to be conscious of the inconsistency of welcoming the reprint of what he is himself afraid or ashamed to reproduce in his own pages. In a recent prosecution a question was raised as to how far the reproduction in a popular form of well-known works of art and literature comes under Lord Campbell's

Act; but the repentance of the defendants, and their promise not to repeat the offence, spared the magistrate the necessity of giving a decision on what is perhaps a difficult question. It is quite certain that, if Aphra Behn's novels and plays were now published for the first time, the publisher would suffer for it. They are worthless as art, and outrageous in their gross and bestial indecency. It is true they are not as yet hawked in the streets. The reprint is reserved for those who can afford and are willing to pay handsomely for filth. The idea of reproducing Aphra Behn in a costly édition de luxe reminds one of the unmentionable messes in strange vessels which are supposed to have sometimes been paraded at the drunken feasts of Rochester and his companions.

If we could suppose that this reprint was only a casual freak, we should not be disposed to say much about it. But we have observed a systematic progress in these experiments which is somewhat alarming. The publisher who has now favoured us with a reproduction of Mrs. Behn began by a reprint of a collection of old ballads, some of which were unsavoury enough to impart a distinctive flavour to the volumes. Not long since we had to remonstrate with another publisher, who seemed to be making it his mission to revive books which should rather have been allowed to rot in their old obscurity. Where is this sort of thing to stop? These are days of democratic levelling, and the masses will not submit to a monopoly of nastiness for the benefit of rich amateurs. There is no reason why Mrs. Behn's, or other works just as bad, or worse, should not be republished in penny numbers for the benefit of shopboys and housemaids, as well as in four-guinea editions on large paper. The infamous crew whom the Society for the Suppression of Vice has in a great measure succeeded in punishing and dispersing will return to their old trade in a new and simpler, as well as safer, form. This is not a subject on which one law can be maintained for the rich and another for the poor; but example is more effective than legal restraints. We trust that the publisher of Mrs. Behn will be disappointed in his hopes, and that he will find his venture left upon his hands. It can hardly be pretended that there is any need to revive old nastiness. It must be a strangely unreasonable appetite that is not satisfied with what is to be found in the current literature of the day. We have women who write novels quite as wanton, if not so gross, as Mrs. Behn's. Astræa herself would perhaps have blushed at some flights of the Swinburnian muse, and might not unreasonably resent the imputation of having trodden the stage more loosely than the hundreds of half-naked ballet-girls who now dance the can-can nightly at the most fashionable theatres.

LONGEVITY.

WE have often felt a vague wonder at the industry of that anonymous writer who daily adds up the ages of the longest-lived persons mentioned in the obituary of the Times, and determines their average tenure of existence. We confess that we do not share the astonishment by which he appears to be periodically seized on the discovery that the united ages of half-a-dozen people recently deceased amount to over five hundred years, and their average age to near ninety. We have no particular data by which to guide our anticipations, and the phenomenon to which our attention is invited has now occurred so very often that we have ceased to regard it as bordering on the miraculous. But if our unknown friend would carry his investigations a little further, we fancy that he might provide material for some really interesting speculation. A German observer, for example, has recently calculated the average longevity attained in different professions. His information, if trustworthy, would be very interesting, not merely to insurance offices, but to young men settling the difficult question of their employments for life. If a youth will be content with 56 years, he may become a doctor; if he requires a year more, he may be an artist; if he wants 58 years of life, he may go to the Bar; but, in order to have a fair prospect of attaining to 65, he must enter into holy orders. Is it better to attend to the physical or to the spiritual wants of man when nine additional years of life reward the higher line of duty? Does the superior longevity of clergymen spring from the possession of a good conscience, or from the fact that the responsibility of attending to the soul presses more lightly than that of attending to the body, or from differences in the physical conditions of the two professions, or from the varying demands which they make upon the intellect? De Maistre drew an inference in favour of Catholicism from the supposed fact that the average reigns of kings in countries which had adhered to the old faith were longer than those in countries polluted by heresy. We should be sorry to adopt his logic in this case, though we do not quite see our way to the opposite conclusion, apparently adopted by the British Medical Journal (from which we derive our information), and embodied in the old saying about those whom the gods love. Whatever occult causes may be at work, it is plain that in any case the average longevity in any profession must be affected by a great number of complicated conditions; and to unravel their varying influence it would be necessary to check these simple observations by others bearing upon different sets of causes. We may assume, for example, that the intellectual conditions go for something, though they are generally subordinate to others which act more immediately. When, for instance, we find that artists came so low in the list, we may suspect that not merely the irregularities to which they are tempted, or their disposition to a town instead of a country life, must be accountable for a great deal, but also that some effect should be ascribed to the peculiarities of the artistic temperament. It would be interesting from this point of view to compare the average longevity of men who pursue different studies under similar physical conditions. Thus we might ask whether in Universities professors of theology are generally found to live longer than professors of medicine or of literature or the fine arts. If so, part of the superiority of the clerical tenure of life must be ascribed to the nature of their studies as well as to the external circumstances of the clergy. We are not prepared with any body of facts bearing upon these inquiries, and merely throw out the hint for the benefit of those whom it may concern.

There are, however, a few obvious facts which may suggest the possible fruitfulness of such investigations. Parents have for a good many centuries been disgusted when their sons have plunged into metre instead of taking to the counting-house; but they have never, we suspect, made full use of the argument from the deleterious influence of the pursuit upon human life. Poetry, we should be inclined to say, from a cursory inspection of the most accessible facts, is almost as destructive as those trades which are proposed to be the subjects of Parliamentary interference. It is as bad as razor-grinding. Looking through any list of English poets, the number of early deaths is startling. Burns, and Byron, and Shelley, and Keats, and Chatterton will occur at once. To the list of those who died before fifty we may add Spenser, Thomson, Collins, and Goldsmith. Shakespeare managed just to get beyond his fiftieth year, and Pope and Gray got halfway from fifty to sixty; but an aged poet is an exception of the proverbial kind. Milton lived to a respectable age; but then he long refrained from indulgence in this dangerous practice in favour of the superior (we speak from a sanitary point of view) pursuit of political life. He did not long survive the recurrence to his earlier pursuits. Cowper lived to near seventy; but it drove him mad. Dryden reached the same age without the same penalty; and Wordsworth, by dint of a regular country life, survived all his contemporaries, and attained the respectable age of eighty. The only wonder, in the last case, is that a man of so sound a constitution, and placed under such favourable circumstances, did not live to confute Sir G. Cornewall Lewis; he is really a case of premature death, and we suspect that the "Ode on the Intimations of Immortality" took ten years out of his life, while his other inspired moments may account for the remaining period. Besides which, two years in the Lakes cannot be counted for more than one in London. Dryden alone remains to confront us; and it must be confessed that Dryden's poetry comes very close to the borders of prose. By way of contrast, let us suggest the names of a few speculative philosophers amongst English writers of reputation. We find that Bacon and Hume lived to be 65; Berkeley to be 69; Locke, 72; Reid, 86; and Hobbes, 91. Amongst the German metaphysicians, Kant died at 80, and Schelling at 79, whilst Hegel was prematurely cut off at 62. In France, Malebranche lived, in spite of a delicate constitution, to be 87, and then had to be killed by an encounter with his brother metaphysician, Berkeley. Descartes, it is true, died at about the age of Shakespeare; but Descartes was naturally delicate, whereas we can hardly doubt that Shakespeare had a fine constitution. If they had exchanged pursuits, no one can say that Shakespeare might not have rivalled Hobbes, and Descartes perished as early as Keats. Spinoza, again, died at 44; but De Quincey very properly argues from this and other circumstances that he must have been murdered. Let us hope for the credit of philosophy that such was the case. At any rate, though the shortest-lived of metaphysicians, he would have had a very fair tenure of life for a poet. We have not indulged in any profound researches; but we have had the curiosity to determine the average age of the English poets contained in a short list at the end of the Golden Treasury. The result comes out precisely 56, which, according to our German authority, is just that of the most unhealthy of all professions. The average, however, is materially increased by the admission of such unreasonably long-lived people as Rogers and Mrs. Barbauld, and other minor poets. A still shorter list of metaphysicians gives an average of 68 years, or a length of life superior even to that of the clergy; but we admit that it would be desirable to base any decided theory on a wider collection of facts.

There is of course nothing surprising in these results. The true philosophical temperament is precisely that which is favourable to long life. A man who never irritates himself about anything, who never subjects his machinery to an unnecessary shock, will go on living when a far stronger man, animated by more troublesome passions, will beat himself to pieces against the world. The same disposition which fits a man for long processes of patient meditation will generally enable him to take life easily; and it is curious to observe how such a speculator, for example, as Hume, whilst his philosophy tends to upset all established creeds, may be personally a Conservative of the strongest kind, and desire the stability of the institutions whose vitality he is doing his best to destroy. Just so Gibbon attacked Christianity in theory, but was utterly disgusted when revolutionists began to reduce his theory to practice. Poetry of a certain class may be comparatively innocuous for similar reasons. Chaucer, Wordsworth, and Goethe were all long-lived poets, because they seldom indulged in violent emotion. Descriptive poetry generally may be regarded as fairly harmless; and even graceful song-writers, like Herrick in old days and Tom Moore in ours, may be a long time in wearing themselves out. But a young man who takes to writing revolutionary odes, or who shares the passionate impulses of a Byron or a Shelley, might almost as well take to drinking, so far as his prospects of longevity are concerned. It is the feverish irritability to which all poets are more or less liable that is really destructive; though, of course, they may occasionally keep their passion within bounds. Perhaps there is an apparent contradiction to this theory in the fact that clergymen are said to be long-lived. Mr. Galton asserts, in his work on hereditary genius, that the spiritual heroes of the world have generally been men of sickly constitution; and one might fancy that a tendency to indulge in strong religious emotion would be as pernicious as the analogous disposition to poetry. But, in the first place, it is probable that the mass of clergymen are as little inclined to undue excitement of any kind as their neighbours. Most of the sermons which we hear give very little indication of a fiery soul absorbed by uncontrollable passion, and overpowering its feeble tenement of clay. And, moreover, excitement does not appear to be injurious when it is worked off in action. Politicians and lawyers live long enough, though they go through a constant course of vehement excitement. A man of a certain strength of constitution probably finds the stimulus rather healthy than otherwise; and men like Brougham or Palmerston are all the better for the ceaseless strain upon their faculties. If they had been excluded from any practical displays of energy, and condemned to be always working themselves up into vehement emotion, with no better mode of discharge than writing verses, it is possible that they would have fretted themselves out of the world at an earlier period. We must add, however, that in all such speculations there is always an obvious alternative. It may be not that poetry exercises a deleterious influence, but that men of weak constitutions naturally take to expressing themselves in poetry. The disease may, in short, be the cause, instead of the effect. It would be impossible to pronounce confidently on so large a question, and we can merely commend the subject to statistical inquirers. If they apply themselves to the investigation, we might discover some useful hints, and even find out in time what particular schools of art or theology are most destructive; whether, for example, a Calvinist generally lives as long as an Arminian, or a classical as a romantic poet. The field is boundless, and we are content to leave the development of the subject to those who may have time and opportunity to work it out.

THE ETHICS OF INFECTION.

IN the last few years a great deal has been written, and perhaps something learnt, about the nature of infection, and the means of stopping the spread of infectious disorders. No one, however, so far as we know, has at all considered the course which a man should pursue when illness breaks out in his neighbour's household. There are indeed many general rules of conduct which are for the most part carefully observed; but they have never as yet been reduced to any system. We propose, therefore, in our present remarks not so much to try to throw any further light on this question, as to gather together from our observation of what is usual a few simple rules which may serve as a kind of Institute of Infection. In the first place, then, it would be well to remember that, though there is a divine command to visit the sick, it is of course implied provided they are not infectious; for it is not to be imagined for a moment that we should be commanded to run the least risk of conveying any disorder to others, not to speak of ourselves. Moreover, while we are enjoined to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, nothing is said about visiting them in their infection. On the contrary, we are enjoined to keep ourselves unspotted from the world, which certainly may be taken to imply that we should keep entirely clear of all contagious illnesses. If, therefore, fever has bereft a wife of her husband, or a widow of her child, let no one, however near he may be to her, be so presumptuous as to think that it is his duty to go to console her. Let him write to her at as great length as he pleases, assuring her that, though from a sense of duty he cannot visit her, yet his heart is with her. At the same time it would be only common prudence to request her not to answer his note, for fear the paper might convey infection. We are not sure that prudence in such a case ought not to be carried so far as to require him to refuse to attend the funeral, for there is no saying how illnesses are spread. Perhaps it might be sufficient if it were distinctly understood that every one should assemble wearing gloves previously steeped in Coddy's Fluid or sprinkled with carbolic acid, and that no greeting should pass beyond a shake of the gloved hand. In all cases we must remember that our sense of what we owe to ourselves, to our family, and to the public should far outweigh what we owe to the sufferer. It may possibly be painful for a widow or a bereaved mother to be constantly reminded of the infectious illness from which she has so sadly suffered. At the same time we may feel satisfied in our conscience if we are promoting the greatest possible happiness of the greatest possible number. These precautions, and others like them, should be exercised not only by those who have never had the disorder, but quite as much by those who have already had it. Even if we have had the scarlatina, for instance, it is well to remember that perhaps one person in every hundred takes it a second time, and that even those who do not take it may convey it to others in their clothing. Perhaps the best way of completely satisfying our conscience, if we are at all foolishly troubled with the subject of any infectious duty, is in each case to repeat constantly that the person we have been suffering from a highly contagious, or even more dangerous, or most infectious disorder, and that therefore we must precautions are required. In like manner, should the young mother of a large family have her children stricken with fever, the utmost that a judicious friend of the family can possibly venture or be expected to do is to send the gardener or one of the outdoor servants now and then to make a noise and to give trouble by ringing at the bell and leaving his mistress's kind love and inquiries. It might at first sight be thought that a neighbour who had herself nursed all her own children through the fever, and who therefore had nothing to fear, ought to offer her services, and was especially bound by the divine injunctions to visit the sick. It has however in other matters been abundantly shown that many of the precepts of the Gospel, suitable as they may have been to a far simpler form of life, cannot be literally applied to our complex society. Society brings its duties, as well as the bed of sickness, and just as it would be scarcely decent in our crowded thoroughfares to take off one's coat and give it to a man who had taken one's cloak, so it would clearly be contrary to good breeding to render ourselves and our homes an object of suspicion and alarm to our neighbours by visiting the sick.

At the same time, while we can do so little for our neighbours in their troubles, we can at all events greatly increase the sympathy felt for them by spreading exaggerated reports of the fever. The surest way of raising general interest is to begin to ask whether there has not been something wrong in the drainage which ought to have been looked to long ago. It will be well to go on to say that it is reported that the eldest boy can scarcely live through the night, while the baby is beginning to show the rash. Should the mother leave the sick-room to seek a breath of fresh air, and be met in the road by a neighbour, the latter will of course hastily cross over to the other side, and in a loud voice express her regret that her duty to her own family requires her to keep so far apart, considering in how severe a form the fever has appeared. If she is assured that the disorder is running its course very mildly, she will, while expressing her delight, not fail at the same time to observe that in these mild cases the after consequences are always the most severe. Such remarks as these are really most kind, as they effectually prevent that elation of spirits which is commonly to be noticed in a mother who is nursing three or four children at the same time. While there should be the utmost carefulness in shunning not only those who nurse the invalids, but also every member of the family, even if they have had the fever before and carefully keep away from the sick-room, there is not the slightest need to be on one's guard against the doctor. It is not to be supposed for a moment that it could have ever been intended that doctors should be deprived of all the pleasures of society, and it is reasonable to suppose that by a special dispensation they do not carry infection with them. No lady therefore need scruple for a moment to invite to a dinner-party all the physicians of the Fever Hospital, provided only that she carefully exclude any of her friends who may in the last month or two have had a case of fever in their family. She must not be foolish enough to think that, after all the anxieties they have gone through, a little pleasant change might be beneficial for them. She will of course write to tell them how much pleasure it would have given her if she could have seen them at her table, but that she feels sure that, under the circumstances, they will not attribute her apparent want of hospitality to any lack of friendliness. Important as these rules are for every one, still more important are they for a parent. He should consider that the obligation of preserving his own children is far above all other obligations. Unmarried people, of course, may be bound to visit the sick, provided that they are careful not at the same time to visit the sound. Unmarried people may at once try to comfort widows and orphans, even before the whitewashers have come in, and before Condy has done all that Condy can do. But parents, and especially mothers, should remember that there can be no moral duty so strong but that it may be with a safe conscience neglected, provided its fulfilment involves their children in the slightest risk of the remotest danger. Let them remember that selfishness for their children's sake is after all a sort of virtue. Some captious people may possibly object that children who see their parents selfish for their sakes may possibly grow up themselves selfish. But surely a parent can guard against this by general exhortations on the duties we owe to our fellow-creatures, and by taking advantage of every such event as the illness of the Prince of Wales to inculcate the general obligation we are under of feeling for the sick.

It may be the case that a parent is so fortunate as to have his child fall ill of a fever at school. If so, he will not, we trust, neglect to profit by all the advantages which are afforded him. He will at once write to the head-master, and, while acknowledging that of course illnesses are not under our control, but are under the dispensation of a far higher power, he will add that it is really most vexatious that his son should have fallen ill, and that he cannot in the least account for it. He will not fail to add that, as the child has fallen ill at school, he must decline to bear any responsibility in the matter, nor can he, out of consideration to his other children, if he has any, or to himself, if he has none, for a moment think of visiting him. Still, to show that he is not indifferent to his child's sufferings, he will request that those who are nursing him will find time to send him at least two letters a day, giving him the fullest particulars of his health. There may be some parents who, being their love for their children to such a point of weakness as to venture to offer, if it can be in any way arranged, to look in through the window at their sickening son when on his sick-bed. With a view to such displays of parental love, it would be well if all school infirmaries were built on the ground-floor. A parent who thus ventures will no doubt make a point of seeing the nurse, and will promise her half-a-crown if she will look after his son more carefully than after his companions. When the boy is safely through, he will probably remember that after all it is not to human aid that our thanks are due, and will be content with offering her two shillings. Of course he will at the same time remove his son from the school, to mark his sense of the great impropriety of the occurrence of such an illness. However mild may be the nature of the fever that breaks out in a school, no judicious parent will for a moment hesitate at once to remove his son, at least for a time, provided he has not taken it already. He will not be moved by any such idle considerations as that "the child is father to the man," and that a boy who is taught to flee from the most moderate risks will never grow up into a courageous man. He will not allow any considerations of studies interrupted to have the least weight with him, nor will he for a moment deign to reflect whether it might not be better for his son to incur some slight danger rather than have his habits of industry broken in upon, and his stock of knowledge lessened instead of increased. There will no doubt be some heartless or foolhardy parents who will say that their son must take his chance, and that it is idle to hope that he can always escape risk of infection. The true parent, however, as we have said, will at once remove his son, and will decline to pay the school bill. He will in that case see the youth grow up worthy of him, with the same prudent regard for that chief blessing, health; which, while it will throughout life allow him to feel for the sick, will nevertheless lead him to feel for them most conveniently when they are at a safe distance.

THE VOLUNTEERS AND THE BRIGHTON REVIEW.

IF we were left without patent examples to show what are the dangers that attend the possession of a large Volunteer force, and what are the defects which those who on patriotic grounds advocate its maintenance should set themselves to overcome, there would be fair excuse for those wide differences of opinion among the leaders of the movement which are exhibited in the letters of Lord Bury on the one hand and of Lord Elcho and Lord Truro on the other. In commenting on this remarkable phase in the history of our modern Volunteers, we shall preface our remarks by stating broadly that we believe it difficult to overrate the value of the sentiment that produced them, if it is properly utilized. Born of a special insult from our nearest European neighbour, the Volunteer force has survived the first occasion of the discovery of the need, has hindered the recurrence of the panic which overtook us, in common with other neighbours of the Second Empire, after the success of Solferino, and has given the whole nation that intelligent interest in its defensive resources the want of which caused our Crimean disasters, and would have proved our ruin had the campaign of 1854-5 been waged at home instead of on the shores of the Black Sea. But as we strove to encourage the movement in its early struggles, so we hold ourselves bound to point out its shortcomings now, and especially when the pages of recent history offer two vast examples which seem as if written for our warning.

It is almost a truism to say that, if the late war in France has taught us any lesson, it is the obvious and perhaps mortifying one that masses of armed men, though filled with ever so much patriotic ardour, and thrown by their leaders into the jaws of death with ever so much zeal and skill, cannot avail to save a country invaded by trained armies of regular soldiers. The scattered efforts of the Gauls of old were hardly of more advantage against the shock of Cæsar's legions than the levies of Republican France against the corps of Prince Frederick Charles, of Manteuffel, Gœben, and Werder. This was from no lack of personal valour, or military aptitude, or competent generalship. Let but a fair study be made of General Faidherbe's own narrative, in which the colours used are most favourable to his army, and it will be seen how, at the first sound of serious reverse, his raw troops melted from him beyond all power of rally. There is a lesson here by which all will be impressed, save those wild dreamers who still prate of the success of Robespierre's levée en masse, as though that standing falsehood of advanced Republicanism had not been exploded long before Gambetta's sad and useless attempts to imitate it. But there may yet be those in this country who refuse to see in the Armies of the Loire and of the North the counterpart of what our own Volunteers might prove on an emergency under some rigorous administrator who should insist on making field armies of them. These were but Frenchmen, they may say, opposed to Von Moltke. Let such persons look closely at what happened to our own kith and kin across the Atlantic a few years earlier, yet at a period later than the creation of our own Volunteer force. Here was a powerful nation which had refused to take the pains to keep up its own limited regular army even to the moderate standard fixed by its representatives. Suddenly a crisis came which left it face to face with the national danger of an armed and organised rebellion. The life of the Great Republic, that unity which its founders doubtless designed to endure, seemed to be threatened fatally, and the people of the North were roused unwillingly to action. Were our readers forgotten the events that followed? The conventional American trust in millions of militia, enrolled on paper and bound to State muster once a year—a ceremony often omitted—vanished at the breath of real war. Volunteers for three months were called for, and crowded in myriads to Washington eager for the fray. Alas! the three months had well nigh expired ere any leader could be found bold enough to take them three days' march into Virginia to face even the hardly better organized force which had gathered to meet them. We need not dwell on the sequel; the attempt of McDowell to outflank his enemy, the defeat that turned in panic rout before the army knew itself to be beaten, the inextinguishable ridicule which followed all over the world when that famous description of the flight from Bull Run was read, which perhaps helped to sow the seeds of the deep-rooted enmity that is now manifesting itself in the pages of the American case at Geneva. We laughed Homerically on this side of the water; but, laughing, we forgot one vital matter; the picture which War Correspondents drew was the picture of the behaviour of a Volunteer army in its first panic, and that army mainly one of our own blood. Many of the men who thus shamefully fled fought like heroes on many a bloody field after, and showed themselves the enduring kinsmen of those who triumphed under Wellington, and marched up to the muzzles of the Sikh guns under Gough.

What, then, is it that makes the difference between rout and heroism? Whence the danger—for there is an obvious danger—to those Governments which trust in enthusiasm, numbers, and devotion, rather than in made soldiers? Shortly, it is this. There are certain real essentials for a fighting army, besides the men and the material suitable to its numbers. They may be divided into the three well-known heads of organization, drill, and discipline. As yet we are only aiming at the first of these things as regards our regular forces, and no one pretends that it has been applied to the reserves of any class. We must therefore pass on to the others.

Drill in its lower elements is the easiest of military accomplishments—at any rate for infantry soldiers—to acquire. The higher or tactical portion is only just being opened to our forces generally by the practice of large manœuvres. How little the present spirit of the Volunteers promises for them in this direction may be gathered from the fact that, after the loud advertisement of the War Office that no more than 5,000 could be received into the Aldershot manœuvres, and that priority of application only would be attended to, it was with difficulty that 3,000 could be collected. In plain words, the Government could not succeed in getting one-sixtieth part of the Volunteer roll together for a fortnight's genuine exercise. Yet drill of any description is comparatively easy of acquirement, as it is easy to comprehend and to define, compared with the higher quality of discipline—the chief governing principle, not only of armies, but of all successful combinations of masses of men. Discipline is known, like its opposite, panic, rather by its practical effects than by theory. It is discipline which inspires with his stern sense of responsibility the Polish corporal serving the German or Russian masters whose cause he dislikes; which enabled the Archduke Albert, with a familiar parade-ground word, to recall to its duty a battalion staggering under the enemy's fire; which has again and again, in ancient history and in modern, carried a small body of regular soldiers straight through a mob of untutored warriors rushing to the encounter in the first simple confidence of personal courage. For discipline implies that common trust in the guidance of the superior, and in the support of the equal, which makes each individual no longer a mere unit, brave or faltering as the case may be, but a component part of a powerful moral machine. Give a Volunteer three days of isolated spring drill, and the effect will, in three days later, vanish from his natural carriage; give them to an old soldier out of practice, and he will walk through the next summer with a more erect bearing. For the action of discipline is ever far more moral than physical, and the soldier has thus been practically reminded of the profession to which he belongs.

If these truths are, as we hold them to be, indisputable, we must thank Lord Bury for his plainspoken protest, with which all our readers must be familiar, against the resolutions of Saturday last. "The Volunteers," he says, "as far as the meeting could bind them, have decided for themselves against Sir Hope Grant." To put the whole matter briefly, an honest and plain-spoken General, not a brilliant genius, but a man of much hard service and of kindly heart, thought fit last year to express his candid opinion that the gathering on Brighton Downs was "calculated to do more harm than good." The commanding officers chiefly concerned meet, and, instead of laying their views respectfully before the authorities, as Lord Bury suggested, and obtaining full discussion on the matter, they constitute themselves practically their own Minister of War, and resolve that "it is desirable to hold the Easter Monday Review as usual." And these are the men to whom the country would have to look for the enforcement of discipline in the Volunteer battalions if the emergency came for which they exist. Truly may we say with Lord Bury, we "hope it may not yet be too late to take the wisest course." With him too we hope that an appeal to the general good sense of the body of Volunteers will discountenance all that savours of faction and of the fatal tendency to put the force above the country for the defence of which it exists.

Lord Truro and Lord Elcho have stated the other side of the case. Perhaps the best answer to their arguments is suggested by a couple of sentences of their own. Lord Elcho, for example, is disposed to subordinate military preparation and efficiency to the enjoyment of a cheap holiday at the seaside, or "a hard-worked metropolitan course and urbanity." Let them have the holiday by all means, but let us abstain from the mockery of calling it military service. Again, Lord Truro takes an utterly false view of the situation when he speaks of the protest of commanding officers as "due to the body they represent." Their first duty in all such questions is to England herself, whose Volunteer battalions they have undertaken to lead. Without some sort of discipline acknowledged by all ranks, such battalions should not be maintained by the country which their commanding officers apparently refuse to serve unless allowed to have their own way without contradiction, comment, or check. Discipline of any kind implies self-abnegation, a quality of true patriotism which the proceeding of last Saturday, and Lord Truro's defence of it, alike ignore. Yet if this be struck out of their category of virtues, and if the place of the discipline which embodies it is to be filled by joviality, goodfellowship, and personal feeling, we shall have a force of which that judgment may be pronounced which a high authority has lately uttered as to the old seventeenth-century fortresses of France:—"This means of so-called defence is useless in peace, and very dangerous in time of war."

THE SOCIAL ANATOMY OF NEW YORK.

THE assassination of Mr. James Fisk will probably satisfy the popular conception of poetical justice. He won his position by violent means, and he came to a violent end. It appears to be beyond doubt that, in his quarrel with Stokes, Fisk had wrenched the law to his purpose, and had, by the connivance of his hirelings and satellites on the Bench, contrived a plan for crushing his adversary which was in its way quite as violent and lawless as the "wild justice" to which Stokes resorted. It is possible that in the particular question at issue Fisk may have been in the right and Stokes in the wrong; but it is at least certain that when Stokes heard that he was to be indicted for conspiracy before one of Fisk's creatures, he believed that his condemnation was written in advance, and most people who knew anything of the relations between Fisk and the Judges of New York took the same view. It is needless to say that, even if this view is correct, it does not in any degree justify the deliberate and cold-blooded murder which has been committed. It would perhaps be rash to assume that, even upon the clearest evidence of his guilt, Stokes will not be acquitted. Criminal, as well as civil, justice in New York is administered in a peculiar manner. A murder of a singularly brutal and unprovoked character was lately committed in one of the tramway cars, and the murderer, although convicted and sentenced, has practically been reprieved by the favour of the authorities. In another case, a man who had shot a journalist was acquitted in consequence of his plea that the journalist had seduced his wife. A well-known politician a few years ago murdered his wife's lover, and was acquitted on similar grounds. He took his wife back, and has since held high office in the diplomatic service of his country. Poetical justice is a bastard branch of the judicial family, and must be excluded from the Courts. The only safeguard of society is that murder shall be uniformly punished, without reference to the motives which may have actuated the murderer. Evidence as to motives may be admitted in order to show whether the act was or was not premeditated, but not in extenuation or justification of the crime itself. The acquittal or pardon of the murderer of Fisk, on the ground that he was an injured man and that Fisk provoked his fate, will tend to perpetuate and confirm the chronic lawlessness which has made New York a byword among civilized nations. It would be absurd, of course, to affect any regret for Fisk's death, apart from the manner in which it was brought about. There are occasions when adherence to the maxim "De mortuis," &c., is as idle as well as a foolish, and in some degree immoral, hypocrisy. Fisk was in every sense, and in almost every possible way, a bad man. His wickedness was flagrant and defiant. He was a notorious blackguard, swindler, forger, and thief. His private life was a course of shameless and vaunting profligacy. His public career was devoted to cheating and robbery. He cheated when he could; when he failed in that way, he seized what he wanted pretty much as a footpad might do. These things do not cease to be true because he has now been shot like a dog. It is no use mincing words about such a man. At this distance we can look at the matter calmly and dispassionately, but it is necessary to speak plainly about Fisk's character in order that the nature of the society in the midst of which he flourished, and the circumstances which made his villainy triumphant, may be clearly understood.

Fisk's personal history is pretty well known, and we need not go over it again. A pedlar's son, he was successively an errand boy, waiter, hanger-on at Van Amburgh's show, pedlar, commercial traveller, broker, railroad proprietor, and gold speculator. He was a bold, dexterous, and unscrupulous adventurer, as ignorant as he was impudent, but with abundance of ready wit and unflinching self-possession. The "watering" of Erie stock, the violent expedients by which he and Gould obtained absolute control of the railway, the "cornering" of the gold market in 1869, and the subsequent speculation of contracts, to the ruin of a large number of people, when the Government intervened to stop the game, will be remembered among the principal episodes of that and his confidence, and sufficiently indicate the nature of the operations by which he built up his fortune. He was connected with the Tammany Ring, and shared through its medium with the Judges and the whole administration of the city. Since the recent revolt of the citizens against the rulers who had so long enslaved and plundered them, things had not been going so well with Fisk. He had influence enough with the Bench to save himself, and he no doubt reckoned that, when the storm had lashed a little, another daring coup would recover lost ground; but in the meantime he was beginning to be pressed by the interests on which he had trampled. Among others who had turned against him was one of his mistresses, who threatened to publish the confidences with which he had entertained her four years ago, when he seized the Erie books, and fled with them and her to Jersey, and from that sanctuary made arrangements for "buying the Legislature." The feud was embittered by the appearance of Stokes, a fast young Wall Street broker, as the woman's adviser and protector; and Fisk, abandoning all efforts to compromise the matter, prepared to crush the pair by means of the irresistible power which a corrupt judiciary placed at his disposal. The contest was an obviously unequal one, and this has been urged by Stokes's friends—Stokes himself maintaining a wary silence—in excuse, if not in justification, of the murder. Whether Stokes reckoned on public sympathy to secure impunity for the crime, or how far such a calculation may prove by the result to be well founded, remains to be seen. The news of Fisk's death sent up Erie shares about 3 per cent., and it is evident that though the mob, with whom he was always on good terms—having the highwayman's trick of being free-handed with his money—was at first somewhat excited, and threatened to lynch the murderer, the general feeling of the community is rather one of satisfaction and relief. It is, we fear, a symptom of the kind of demoralization which has gradually and insensibly overtaken the inhabitants of New York that there should be no manifestation of deep abhorrence for the crime. As far as we can see, it is regarded chiefly in the light of an unfortunate and rather irregular proceeding which prudence would not have dictated, and which cannot in strict propriety be approved. People are quite ready to say a good word for Fisk, but we have failed to detect any strong condemnation of the murderer. A sagacious observer predicts that, even if there is not enough sympathy already to save Stokes from the gallows, there is sure to be enough before his trial comes on. He is on the best of terms with the reporters, he is to have his portrait in two of the illustrated weeklies, and an anxious public studies with rising interest the minute daily chronicle of his life in prison—the number of cigars he smokes, his gossip with his visitors, his mutton-chops and omelette for breakfast, chicken broth for lunch, and "porterhouse steak, pickled beet, and pot of strong tea" for supper. The opera-house was besieged to see Fisk lying in state in full uniform; he had a public funeral, at which his regiment of militia paraded with the conventional emblems of mourning, and listened to a gushing sermon from the chaplain. But Fisk is buried, and almost forgotten, and Stokes is the hero of the hour. "Stokes in good spirits" is the comforting heading of the latest bulletins. The "irrepressible Jolie," the vulgar Helen of a coarse intrigue, also shares the honours of the occasion, "her voluptuous charms splendidly set off by a dress of black silk, velvet jacket, jockey hat, and 'illusion' veil." She has now probably a great career before her as a lecturer on women's rights.

An amusing and characteristic apology has been put forward on behalf of the respectable people of New York to explain away the predominance which such a man as Fisk was allowed to attain amongst them. Fisk, we are assured, was never admitted into good society. No genuine "Knickerbocker" ever sat down to dinner with him. Even Shoddy was rather shy of his company. He was excluded from all respectable clubs and haunts of men, and he walked through public ball-rooms, with his diamonds blazing on his shirt front, without a single person saluting or in any way recognizing him. The truth is, we are told, that Fisk and Tyed and the rest of them were social outlaws in New York. This is just the sort of reasoning which we used to hear from the St. Germain people in Paris about the Emperor and his Court. The Faubourg did not "know" Louis Napoleon, and the trifling circumstance of his holding France, including the Faubourg, in absolute subjection was of course immaterial. For several years Fisk and his friends were masters of New York, distributed the patronage, helped themselves freely out of the treasury, packed the Legislature, and suborned the Judges. They exacted taxes, passed laws, jobbed, and plundered as they chose. But the gallant and high-spirited Knickerbockers had their revenge. They refused to dine with Fisk, and made a point of cutting him in society. Several reasons may be suggested to explain the sudden and despotic dominion which Fisk secured over the affairs, not only of the Erie Railway, but of New York. In the first place, he was essentially a barbarian, and had the advantage of that simplicity of purpose and action which is free alike from fear and shame, and goes straight to its aim by the shortest and most direct road. He had no conscience, no scruples of honour or honesty to restrain him. It was perhaps not unnatural that a civilized community which had grown accustomed to something like law and order should at first be bewildered and confused by such a sublime defiance of the elementary principles of social intercourse. In the next place, the political constitution of the State favoured the execution of his purpose. When the tyrant gazed that humanity might have had one look, it was with a view to holding the people ready by the throat; and the administration of the State might be supposed to have been conducted with a similar object. The ballot represented the key of the situation to any party which could obtain the custody of the ballot-boxes. Fisk and his friends imposed no restriction upon liberty of voting, and perhaps their expenditure on personators and repeaters has been exaggerated; they secured the counting of the votes, and they had invariably, down to the end of last year, a large majority. With the Legislature, the Bench, and the Civil Service in their hands, they could do what they pleased; and, considering the temptations to which they were thus exposed, it may be said that they were almost moderate in yielding to them. Again, although New York now boasts that it never sat at meat with Mr. Fisk, it certainly made an idol of him after a fashion. It has been suggested that Fisk, when he first came to town, set himself deliberately to do strange, indecent, and outrageous things, in order that they might be taken notice of in the newspapers and might make him notorious. It is improbable that Fisk ever heard of the historical precedent for this line of action, and it is doubtful how far he set himself to work it out with distinct premeditation. But, at any rate, if he only followed the promptings of his nature, he profited by them. The newspapers were constantly full of him, and when he drove his four-in-hand through the Central Park, or appeared with a bevy from his harem in any public place, all eyes were fixed on him. He was the best advertised man in the New World, and his speculations profited by it. Moreover, the public began to regard the source of so much amusement and excitement with a kind of good-natured, friendly feeling, with which was mingled probably a certain degree of admiration for his pluck and cleverness, and above all for his success. Fisk was not a representative man in the sense that he reproduced in himself the precise characteristics of the society in which he lived, and over which he triumphed; but he was unquestionably a product of that society. Its loose morality, political supineness, love of excitement, and sympathy with successful smartness, supplied a congenial soil for this rank and noxious weed. New York has no more to fear from Fisk, but unless there are considerable changes in its own moral and political condition, there is no reason to suppose that another impudent and unscrupulous adventurer may not play the same part, and reduce the city once more to the servile and disgraceful subjection from which she has hardly yet escaped. Fisk's rascality was not single-handed, and numerous partners of his guilt and spoils survive him. Respectable "Knickerbockers" who were too nice to dine with him, were not above gambling in the wake of his villanies. It is positively asserted that only four or five weeks back several capitalists in New York took part in negotiations which were started by Fisk and Gould for a new form of fraudulent security to the amount of between six and seven millions sterling. We judge the tree by its fruit, the body by its humours, and the accidental removal of such a creature as Fisk does not heal the rottenness on which he thrived, and of which he was only the outward symbol.

METOIKOI IN SWITZERLAND.

THE Swiss Federal Assembly began its adjourned Session on January 15th, and the Ständerath has already debated and resolved on some of the points on the treatment of which in the Nationalrath we have already spoken, and on some also on which we have not. But we will put off all remarks on the present Session till the Session is ended, the more so as it seems that the Assembly can debate faster than we, even with the help of a vacation, can comment. We feel ourselves quite behindhand in not having yet said anything on the debate in the Nationalrath on the question which many people regard as the most important of all that have been started by the present Revision. This is the question of Etablisement or Niederlassung, the rights of citizens of one Canton who are settled in another. For aught we know, the Ständerath may be discussing the matter at this very moment, and they may have come to their conclusions before what we are now writing can find its way into type. But we will go on as we have begun, with the proceedings in the Nationalrath, and will keep the amendments or confirmations of the Ständerath till the Session is over. And let every one bear in mind that the decisions of both Houses together are not final. In a matter of everyday Federal legislation they would be so; but in the case of a constitutional amendment, two powers stand behind, the Cantons and the whole people, either of which can reject, though neither can amend, the proposals of the Federal Assembly.

The question of Niederlassung or Etablisement is one which has special interest for the classical or mediæval scholar. The Swiss Gemeinde or Commune, which, more than either the Confederation or the Canton, is the real kernel of Swiss life, is a thoroughly mediæval institution, which has lived on through all changes, and which, like so many other mediæval institutions, reminds us at every moment of things in ancient Greece and Italy. Some years ago we lighted on metoikoi in a small district in North Germany, a common possession of the commonwealths of Lübeck and Hamburg. We presume that they are there still. There certainly is nothing in the new German Constitution to change their position in local matters, and, if it has given them votes in Imperial matters, the analogy between their position and what we shall presently have to speak of in Switzerland is only made more perfect. If it be so, it will follow that in both cases men who are denied the lower privilege are allowed the higher. In the old state of things in Switzerland, we need not say, there were metoikoi in abundance. There are now no metoikoi, but the metoikoi are still a large and increasing class. The Gemeinde, the Commune or Parish, is the element which is at the bottom of everything. It would be both historically and practically, though not constitutionally, true to say that, as the Confederation is simply an aggregate of Cantons, so the Canton is an aggregate of Communes. The difference of course is that, as the Cantons are sovereign States, the Confederation can legislate for them only so far as the Federal Constitution empowers it to do so, while, as the Communes are not sovereign, each Canton can freely legislate for its own. But practically the Canton is an aggregate of Communes; the Commune is as distinctly an independent sphere of political life smaller than the Canton as the Confederation is an independent sphere of political life greater than the Canton. The exact rights and powers of the Communes differ widely in different places according to ancient usage and cantonal law; but everywhere the Commune has large powers of self-government, and powers which touch those small affairs of everyday life which come more keenly home to the mass of mankind than the greater matters which come within the range of the Canton and the Confederation. The church, the school, and many other of the small matters for the sake of which, after all, political societies largely exist, are in the hands of the Commune. And it is to the Commune, not to the Canton or the Confederation, that the citizen who is no longer able to support himself looks for support in his extremity.

But what is the Commune? How is it constituted? Who are its members? How is membership gained? How is it forfeited? On these points the Federal Constitution has hitherto been anything but explicit. Its forty-first article lays down the general principle that every Swiss citizen may settle in any part of the Confederation which he thinks good, and that he everywhere carries with him his status of citizen and the right to vote in all Federal and all Cantonal matters. But his position in the Commune is left wholly to local law; the Constitution expressly excepts from the civic rights which he carries with him the right to vote in communal matters or to have a share in the profits of communal property. These points are left to cantonal legislation. Now in the Swiss Communes generally, just as in the old Greek commonwealths, citizenship is strictly hereditary. Wherever a man lives, he remains a burgher of the Commune of his forefathers; mere residence, even from generation to generation, conveys no more right to the burghership than it did at Athens or Sparta. The Swiss of another Canton, or even of another Commune in the same Canton, who settles in a Commune to which he does not belong, though the equal of his neighbours in all Federal and all Cantonal rights, is for all communal purposes, that is, for all the small purposes of daily life, as strictly a metoikos as Lysias was at Athens. On what terms he may be admitted to the burghership—on what terms, in short, communal burghership may be granted or sold—is a matter with which the Federal Constitution does not concern itself; it is left wholly to local law. All that it does secure to him is that he shall have free commerce, and shall not be subject to any special peroletoi. But most Communes have some corporate property, and in some of them the corporate property is very considerable. And the degree of liberality in conferring the communal franchise is remarked to be in an inverse ratio to the value of the communal property. A poor Commune is always more liberal in granting its franchise than a rich one. In Geneva, indeed, where the communal property is small, the communal franchise can even be claimed as a right by one class of metoikoi, that is, by the adult children born of Swiss parents in the Canton. Otherwise, where there is no legislation of this kind, the metoikos and his descendants, except in the case of special grant or purchase, remain metoikoi for ever and ever. And though the metoikos cannot be laid under a special peroleion, the same thing may be done in another way. The members of the hereditary Commune, instead of using their corporate property for public communal purposes, may divide its profits among them as a private estate, and may provide for public communal purposes by taxation, in which the metoikos, though he has no vote, pays his share. Again, though the Federal Constitution guarantees the right of settlement everywhere to all its citizens, the right is a good deal clogged by various stipulations. Settlement may be altogether refused to him unless he produces certain papers—"un acte d'origine ou une autre pièce équivalente, un certificat de bonnes mœurs"—which of course may mean anything—and "une attestation qu'il jouit des droits civils et qu'il n'est point légalement flétri." We should certainly think it odd if an Englishman, Scotchman, or Irishman settling in another part of the United Kingdom—to say nothing of a mere change of county or parish—should be asked for papers of this kind before he could buy land, or vote, or do anything at all. Then, though the metoikos cannot be denied his cantonal rights, his admission to them may be delayed by cantonal law for any time not exceeding two years. Lastly, by one of the vaguest provisions in the world, the settled metoikos may be removed from the Commune of his settlement, not only if he becomes chargeable, as we should say, to the parish, but by judicial sentence in penal matters, and by police authority—"s'il a perdu ses droits civils et a été légalement flétri; si au contraire est contraire aux mœurs; ou s'il a été condamné pour une contravention aux lois ou règlements de police." This is certainly clothing the police—that is, as far as the Confederation is concerned, allowing cantonal legislation to clothe the police, if it thinks fit—with an arbitrary power which seems strange under a democratic government. How many convictions are needed for a man to be reckoned as "condemné pour?" and might a treasonable commune shut its gates against all who, by settling there, were guilty of "con-

As a matter of study, of comparison between old Greek, mediæval, and modern commonwealths, nothing can be more interesting than this state of things. And it is a state of things of which traces may still be seen in many places among ourselves. Wherever any kind of privilege or property belongs to a class of hereditary freemen, we have the remains of an institution essentially the same as that of the Swiss Gemeinden. Nowadays such privileges and property, where they still exist, have no exclusive political character; no one is anywhere shut out from voting either for a member of Parliament, for a town-councillor, or for a guardian of the poor, on the ground of his not being an hereditary or otherwise qualified freeman. But when, as was the case up to the great Reform Bill, the elective franchise was in many boroughs wholly in the hands of freemen, the powers of the English Gemeinde went even further than those of the Swiss. But, curious as the present state of things is as a matter of antiquarian politics, it is plain that it must be full of practical evils. According to statistics which were brought forward in the debates, nearly half the population of Switzerland live in Communes to which they do not belong by birth. That is, they have communal rights which they cannot exercise in their hereditary Communes which perhaps they never saw, while in the Communes where they actually live and where all their nearest interests lie, they are—whatever local legislation may think fit to make them. They may perhaps, in old age and poverty, be sent away against their wills from the place where they have spent all their lives to find relief in a place where they have all along had hereditary rights, but with which they have never had any personal connexion. Some remedy is clearly needed for such a state of things as this, a state of things which must often interfere with personal freedom in a way hardly consistent with democratic principles. At the same time it must not be forgotten that the several Communes have the same right to their corporate property as any other individual or corporate owner, a right which we are far from denying the power of the supreme authority to touch, but which at all events is not to be lightly touched. Proposals to remedy these evils were laid before the Assembly by the Federal Council and by the Committees of the two Houses. Those of the Federal Council and of the Committee of the Ständerath, speak, we must say, with an uncertain and hesitating voice. But the proposals of the Nationalrath are clear enough. The settler in a strange Canton is to obtain a communal as well as a cantonal vote after three months' residence, but he is to have no share in the property of the Commune. Moreover the right of settlement may be either refused or taken away, not only in the case of a penal sentence, but in case of the settler becoming chargeable, as we should say, to the parish. It will be seen that, though the settler is secured his vote in communal matters, yet the members of the hereditary Commune are not hindered from dealing with the communal property as a private estate and throwing all public charges on the taxation which étrangers share along with hereditary burghers. On the other hand, the proposal not only takes away the absurd certificate of good morals, but seemingly takes away all necessity of "papers," unless they somehow lurk in the words "après avoir dûment justifié de sa qualité d'électeur." The extraordinary variety of the communal institutions in different Cantons, and even in different parts of the same Canton, was clearly set forth in the debate, as well as the practically different senses in which the word Commune is consequently used. Vigorous attacks were made on the system of expulsion on the ground of poverty—expulsions just like the removals once so familiar under the English law of settlement. But it seems strange to any Englishman used to go, settle, buy, in any county or parish, and to get a vote by simple residence, that the requirement of "la production d'un acte d'origine ou d'une autre pièce analogue," struck out by the Committee, was put in again by the House. Two of the most interesting speeches were those of M. Rambert of Vaud and Herr Klein of Basel. The former set forth the wide difference between those Communes where the public property is fairly applied to public purposes, and those in which it is treated as a private estate. His proposal that all such private divisions should be forbidden, and all corporate communal property applied only to public communal uses, was lost only by the casting vote of the President, who himself did not object to the principle of the proposal. Herr Klein's proposal that the étrangers should gain a right to parish relief in the Commune of his adoption after five years' residence was not adopted.

The final result of the voting in the Nationalrath, if adopted by the other powers of the State, will leave the power of refusing or withdrawing the right of settlement only in the case of a criminal conviction or of chargeability to the parish. The "acte d'origine" is retained. The étranger who passes these tests acquires both a cantonal and a communal vote after three months' residence. But he gains no right over the communal property, which the hereditary freemen may still deal with as they please. It is plain that something has been gained, but not so much as might have been looked for from the liberal tone of many of the speeches. The Swiss Gemeinde will still for many purposes remain one of the curiosities of political archæology.

AFRICAN EXPLORATION.

WE need not say that our best wishes will accompany the Livingstone Expedition, yet it by no means follows that the Government is to be blamed for declining to subsidize it. We should be loth to take a desponding tone with regard to one of the most sanguine and adventurous of travellers. Dr. Livingstone has made fast friends in the highest scientific circles; and, as it has seemed to many, the men most competent to form an opinion on his fate have gone on hoping against hope. But long ago these hopes seemed to be founded less on reason than on feeling, and they have necessarily grown fainter as the latest news from the traveller has receded into the distance. It is now nearly three years since we last had any authentic accounts of Livingstone. If he still survives, he may be presumed to be in a district which communicates with the coast by native traders; and the residence of a white man so widely known over Central Africa must have created more than a merely local sensation. Yet no trustworthy rumour about him has reached Zanzibar or any other of the trade ports on the coast. Those who know Africa best must best know the chances that beset a European life under prolonged sojourn in the probable conditions. Those who know Livingstone best express a strong confidence that he is the very man to live down the circumstances that beset him. His works and his labours go far to support this confidence, and we gladly admit that there is a good deal to be said from that point of view. But then, we ask, is the Government in precisely the same position as any private person or association? Does it enjoy the same freedom of indulging generous and chivalrous impulses? It is a grave responsibility to attach official sanction to an enterprise which at the best partakes of the character of a forlorn hope. The history of the search after Franklin and his companions taught men in authority a lesson which they surely should not forget. Sir John Franklin carried a Government commission into the Polar seas. Long after all reasonable hope of his rescue had ceased to exist, the Government persevered in an almost desperate attempt. Expedition after expedition was sent among Arctic icefloes and icebergs with the certainty of great suffering and at the peril of valuable lives. The sympathy of the nation sanctioned these expeditions, and even when we felt that they had become Quixotical we were slow to say as much. But it is right to point out that, in the present case, the Government need recognize no similar obligation to reach some indefinite point of Central Africa. Dr. Livingstone holds, it is true, Her Majesty's commission as Consul, and his researches have deserved and obtained the gratitude of his countrymen; but we must remember that he did not undertake in his official capacity the journey that has landed him and us in the embarrassment which we now deplore. If, however, the Government subsidized Lieutenant Dawson's party, and if Lieutenant Dawson should be reported missing in the interior, the Government would bequeath to its successors another Franklin legacy. The Government is bound to weigh the matter well, and we can easily understand that it may feel itself obliged to adhere to its answer in the negative. It is the penalty of public life that it must often require a sacrifice of private feelings, as in the case of a Home Secretary who has to refuse reproaches to criminals under capital sentence. We are sure that a gallant volunteer like Lieutenant Dawson would be the last man to press the Government for a guarantee of his personal safety. At the same time we may express our conviction that, should the Dawson expedition share the fate of the traveller in search of whom it is sent, popular sentiment will insist on efforts to extricate it, if extrication seems at all practicable. This of itself is a sufficient reason why the Government should not be precipitate in tendering any such guarantee, or exceed its strict duty by hampering the action of its successors.

Because we believe the Government to be right in this matter, it by no means follows that the Geographical Society acts unadvisedly. On the contrary, this is precisely a case where private individuals and corporations may legitimately exercise a wide discretion, and, thinking as it thinks, the Society is more than justified in acting as it proposes to act. It owes much to Livingstone himself. It owes something to the memory of its late President, who expressed a firm hope to the last hour of his life that he would again see his absent friend. The present President and the official and unofficial authorities of the Society have in a measure inherited Sir Roderick Murchison's convictions. The acclamations of the meeting of Monday evening expressed the warmest approval of the proposed expedition. Very well. Let the expedition be carried out by all means. It is a matter of public concern which commands the public sympathies. It was the idea of the Geographical Society, and has grown up under its auspices. Surely the Government, without laying itself open to censure, may take the view expressed by Mr. Ball in his short and sensible speech, without adopting all his conclusions. It might urge something to the following effect:—Scientific geographers, who, as they say themselves, are the authorities most competent to judge of the chances of success, pronounce decidedly in favour of the expedition. The public very naturally follows the lead of these capable guides. The movement has no lack of friends, the sum asked is comparatively small, the expedition has been decided upon in any case, and such a subsidy as has been asked for ought to be unnecessary. This is what the Government might have urged fairly enough, but we think it would have acted more wisely had it said nothing at all beyond meeting the demand with a simple negative. Unluckily it has thought fit to give reasons for its refusal, and we agree with Sir Henry Rawlinson that those reasons are no reasons. We puzzle ourselves as to what alternative to a search expedition it can possibly have had in its mind.

This Livingstone Expedition suggests reflections on the broad subject of Central African exploration. We do not underrate the value of scientific discovery, nor would we discourage the spirit of English adventure. The enterprise that has done such great things for us would cramp and stifle itself were it confined within the limits which cold common sense might prescribe to it. But we are entitled to ask, although there may be a satisfactory answer to the question, whether all that we have gained in Central Africa can be held to compensate all that we have lost or risked? Or, if we strike a balance now, and decide that the martyrs of African adventure have not sacrificed health and life without a sufficient equivalent, we may still fairly enquire whether it is worth our while to persevere further. We can understand expeditions undertaken for definite practical reasons. We can conceive that philanthropists may be fully justified in facing fever, famine, and poisoned weapons for some such philanthropic purpose as the suppression of the slave trade on the Upper Nile. But researches for the gratification of geographical curiosity are a different matter, and commerce, we should fancy, has assured itself by this time that the game is hardly worth the candle. We have filled up in outline that great blank in our maps which used to be marked "unexplored." We have justified broadly Sir Roderick Murchison's speculative predictions as to the watershed of Central Africa. We fancy we have traced the mysterious course of the Nile to its lake fountains. We have also acquired something more than a vague notion of the natives and the capabilities of their country. We know the names of savage potentates, and their barbarous capitals. We have learned vicariously by melancholy experience the treacherous character of their policy, and the arbitrary proceedings of their chiefs. And the moral of all that we have learned amounts very much to this—that we are not very likely to benefit either them or ourselves by hasty meddling with them. We do not say that a time will not come when, by appealing to their self-interest, we may impose on them the blessings of civilization and commerce. We only argue that the result is not to be precipitated by wild dashes at the interior. Indeed, the good work is going slowly forward now in the natural course of things; but where it is advancing to any purpose, it is making its way from the outskirts where civilization is steadily pushing barbarism back. In the South, for example, it is not so very long ago that Gordon Cumming's volumes of sport appeared as a new revelation. Until then his hunting-grounds had been an unknown world. Now the white man has pushed back the elephant almost to his furthest limits. Chiefs far to the north of the territory of the ferocious Moselekatze have received white legations in the shape of missions, and regulated their conduct on some sort of compromise with the teachings of the Christian faith. Livingstone himself had settled on the Zambesi river. Long ago on the Eastern coast we established diplomatic relations with the Sultans of Zanzibar, and, notwithstanding the abuses of the Eastern slave trade, we have exercised a sensible influence there. Englishmen of courage, ability, independence, and honesty, like Sir Samuel Baker, are clearly doing excellent service to humanity when they consent to replace incompetent and interested Egyptian officials. But the commercial and political history of our settlement on the Western coast is scarcely such as to encourage us to mix ourselves up in the domestic affairs of the remote interior. In the West the tribes which might seem to have a direct interest in conciliating our favour fight out their intestine squabbles on our very borders, with the weapons we sell to them. Of course it is our national mission to develop trade everywhere, and, equally of course, when there is any reasonable prospect of profit, we should hesitate to say a word against it. But, as far as we have yet learned, Central Africa is rich neither in gold nor ivory, and our prejudices do not permit us to deal in the slaves which are the staple produce of the interior. Central Africa is not the barren desert we once believed it to be, but in the best years the provision-grounds do little more than supply the population, as our travellers have discovered to their cost. Thus, we fancy, we can form a rough estimate of all that England would be likely to gain were she to succeed in opening communications and establishing amicable relations everywhere. We believe, moreover, that we can give a shrewd guess as to how far we should benefit the natives. On the other hand, experience has taught us the difficulties, hardships, and dangers that beset the pioneers whom we despatch on this work—native ferocity to be dominated, native suspicion to be disarmed, native intrigues to be baffled, native cupidity to be satiated; commons short, water scarce and often poisonous, and a climate fatal to European life. Experts have decided that there is adequate ground for Lieutenant Dawson's expedition; and we repeat that we wish him and his party all success. But we earnestly trust that the Geographical Society may never again have to make application to Government for Government aid towards a similar object.

BALZAC'S PÈRE GORIOT.

WHEN dramatists wish to illustrate the tenderness of pater-nity, and especially the sufferings inflicted by that tenderness, they do wisely to paint the relation between a father and his daughters. The influence of sex, so strong in all the relations of life, affects the parental relation very powerfully. In many instances the fatherly instincts which are only half-awakened by the advent of a first-born son become energetic on the arrival of a daughter, and during all the years of childhood a little girl has privileges which are denied to the most exemplary of her brothers.

All men in whom the paternal feelings are not utterly deadened make pets of their little girls, and nothing but the eager anxiety for a male heir could so change the natural condition of a man's heart as to make him tenderer towards a boy. The general rule is that women spoil boys, and men girls; but however probable it is that a tender-hearted lady will bring up a boy too indulgently, it is still more probable that a father will be utterly incapable of anything like discipline where his daughters are concerned. In some instances this weakness is carried to the most extravagant excess, and a natural law which in healthy moderation serves to compensate men for the comparative uselessness of female children, and prevents them from feeling that they are a burden, becomes the cause of some of the most exquisitely painful situations which the student of humanity can contemplate. Many a man denies himself repose that his daughters may live in the most self-indulgent idleness, and sacrifices of this kind are made so habitually that they scarcely attract attention. The visibly painful cases are comparatively rare, and a case so painful as that of Balzac's Père Goriot is, we will not say impossible in real life, but at least unusual enough to lie quite beyond the range of ordinary experience. We may do well, however, to remember the observation made long ago by Dickens in the preface to Nicholas Nickleby, that "what we call the world, which is so very credulous in what professes to be true, is most incredulous in what professes to be imaginary," and also to bear in mind that an observer like Balzac, in a place like Paris, is likely to meet with examples of softness and hardness of heart which go beyond anything that we are commonly accustomed to. Even the daily newspapers contain occasional instances of parricide; and since there are people in the world unflinching enough to poison and stab their progenitors, it is possible that there may be others who, having been accustomed from infancy to the most boundless indulgence, will accept it and abuse it to the last.

The parallel between the Père Goriot and King Lear is sufficiently obvious, but in Balzac's story we have no Cordelia, and he has the advantages and disadvantages of a minutely realistic study from modern life, and of a narrative in simple prose. Typical examples of human passions are admitted more readily in the "no man's land" of poetry, and though in one sense a story from modern life may impose itself on our belief with greater circumstantial force, we receive it in a more critical spirit. No one asks whether there are women so cruel as the daughters of King Lear, but the reader cannot help wondering whether in modern Paris there ever existed two ladies so heartless as the daughters of old Goriot. In one respect Goriot wins our sympathies more easily than Lear, for Lear is a king, and so is placed above the conditions of ordinary mortality; whereas Goriot is on our own level, a successful tradesman who has for sons-in-law a banker and a viscount. The division of a kingdom affects us less than the division of a fortune, and the very obscurity of old Goriot's latter years, spent in a dusty lodging-house, in ever-increasing poverty, seems more terrible to the ordinary reader than the tumult of a royal camp. The idea suggests itself as probable that Balzac may have had some distant intention of this kind. He may have thought, "I will give the people a King Lear of their own time and in their own class, and compel them to feel his hardships, as hardships which might happen to themselves."

The Père Goriot began life as a simple workman in a vermicelli manufactory, and being clever and economical he purchased his master's business when the latter accidentally fell a victim in the troubles of 1789. Goriot managed to avoid the dangers of the time, and by great prudence, combined with the commercial faculty, amassed a considerable sum of money in time of scarcity, with which he carried on his regular business afterwards, and so multiplied it. In his own trade he became extraordinarily acute, and to a fertile conception united great rapidity of execution, planning like a diplomatist and marching like a soldier. Outside of his speciality he remained the uncultivated working-man that he had been on his start in life, a man insensible to every kind of intellectual pleasure and incapable of understanding an argument. In nature of this kind the affections concentrate themselves as the intelligence does. Goriot's wife was the first object on which he lavished his affection, but on her death his two daughters took her place, and his love for them grew into a form of mental disease, or over-development, the abnormal passion of pater-nity. He brought up his two girls without refusing them anything, educated them like ladies of rank, and accustomed them to the luxuries of fashionable life. Anastasia, who was courted for her beauty by the Count de Restaud, had aristocratic tastes which made her accept his offer in order that she might shine in high life; the other sister, Delphine, cared more for money, and married a German banker called Nucingen, who became a baron of the Holy Roman Empire. Goriot remained in trade, but his daughters and their husbands worried him till he quitted it, though nothing else in the world had any interest for him. He gave his daughters 30,000*l.* each, reserving about 400*l.* a year for himself, the produce of the goodwill of his business. His hope had been to pass the greater part of his time with his daughters, but he perceived very soon that an old vermicelli-maker was not the kind of father whom these noble ladies were anxious to grow to society. They received him when they had no other company, but gave him clearly to understand that his presence was not desired at their dinner-parties. When Goriot offered his fortune between his two girls he had fondly expected to pass the remainder of his days in their two houses alternately. As soon as the truth became quite clear to him he went to live at Madame Vau-quer's pension. This house of entertainment was situated between the Pantheon and the Val-de-Grâce, one of the dullest and dreariest quarters of old Paris, full of nothing but schools and lodging-houses. Here was a horrible table d'hôte, where poor old Goriot ate his meals. Balzac is particularly strong in his descriptions of places of this kind, and spares us no detail. He tells of the dim glass, the chipped old plates, the dirty napkins, the walls with their encrusted foulness, the various and unimaginable smells. It is a horrible life for an old man who has no friends, that life of the table d'hôte, and most horrible of all in a regular pension of this kind, amongst vulgar and unfeeling people who like to make a butt of a timid and defenceless convive. Any one who is gentle, whether from weakness or from refinement, is sure to be treated contemptuously by a company of oads and snobs, and Balzac describes in detail, or rather portrays than describes, the coarse brutality of manner which old Goriot had to put up with.

But why put up with it? A single man with 400*l.* a year need not live in such a place as Madame Vauquer's lodging-house. When he first came to lodge with Madame Vauquer, old Goriot, at that time in his seventieth year, took a suite of three rooms in her house, and dressed well, putting on a clean white waistcoat every day. He had eighteen frilled shirts of uncommon fineness, and wore two large diamond pins in his frills united by a golden chain. Everything about him was equally irreproachable. He had plenty of silver plate, and linen of various kinds; he took snuff from a box of massive gold, and took it like a man who knew that the supply would never fail. At that time, of course, he was not le Père Goriot, but Monsieur Goriot; for in France, when the title of father is applied to a layman, it implies a certain contemptuous familiarity. In those lustrous days of the gold snuff-box and diamond pins, Monsieur Goriot was treated with consideration. Madame Vauquer went even beyond this, and endeavoured to make herself agreeable to him, with an ultimate view to the possibility of a matrimonial alliance. The failure of this project, and a pecuniary loss occasioned by the departure of a swindling "countess," embittered her mind against Goriot, and she began to torment him in her way by depriving him of certain little luxuries. This being ineffectual, for the old vernicelli-maker was too simple in his habits to pay attention to annoyances of this kind, she set her other lodgers against him, and they began to make a butt of him for their amusement. They had no precise idea in the lodging-house of what the old man might be, or of what he had been in the past, and their balked curiosity resulted in very unfavourable guesses. When people are at the same time empty and garrulous, they resent reserve on the ground that, if a man will not talk about his affairs, it is because his affairs are bad. So the people in Madame Vauquer's establishment attributed to Goriot every vice and shame that hides itself from the light of day. Amongst other things he was a spy, but this theory fell to the ground, because he was considered too stupid to be a spy. It was certain, however, that he was an old libertine, because a beautiful young lady had been to see him in his rooms, and Madame Vauquer and her servant, who had listened, had caught some expressions of endearment. This visit was followed, a month later, by one from another young lady. About this time Goriot removed to a story higher, and reduced his pension to nine hundred francs. This change fixed his title for the future. When it took place, Madame Vauquer and her lodgers ceased to call the old gentleman Monsieur Goriot, and called him le Père Goriot ever after.

It then became the fashion to torment the Père Goriot mercilessly about the young ladies who came to see him. He answered that they were his daughters, which was not believed, and Madame Vauquer asked if he had thirty-six daughters; old Goriot replied gently that he had only two. He became more and more economical in his way of living, gave up taking snuff, used powder no longer, went up to the third story, and reduced his pension to forty-five francs a month. When he ceased to use powder, his face, under the discoloured remnant of his natural hair, took upon itself an expression of ever-increasing sadness. The signs of deepening poverty were also visible enough to eyes so accustomed to observe such indications as were those of the mistresses of a lodging-house. His diamonds, his snuff-box, and other precious things disappeared one after another. His fine linen was worn out and replaced by the coarsest and commonest. His handsome blue coat was succeeded by a rough brown one, and his whole costume revolutionised in the same way. He became gradually thinner and thinner, the calves of his legs disappeared, his face, formerly round, with contentment, was wrinkled all over, the skin of his forehead gathered up into folds, and his jawbone marked itself below the hollowed cheek. His eyelids were red round his eyes, his lower lip began to fall, his face took an expression of stupidity. In a word, he aged rapidly and lamentably.

His fellow-lodgers, who, though of different occupations and professions, were all of the class that delights in chaffing, became more and more contemptuously merciless. They laughed at him to his face, and treated him with unpleasant familiarity, and with the odious patronage exercised by the vulgar towards the weak and unfortunate. The one exception to this rule was a young student of gentle birth, Eugène de Rastignac, who perceived that they were mistaken in their estimate of Goriot, but who could not, until circumstances aided him, find the solution of the enigma. It happened about this time that this young gentleman had an ambition to make his way in society—an ambition the more natural in him, since he was related to one of the most distinguished families of the French Republic, the Germain, and at the same time compelled by poverty to live in the uns congenial atmosphere of Madame Vauquer's lodging-house. M. de Rastignac called one day upon a lady of rank whom he knew slightly, and found himself agreeably received in her house until he happened to speak of the "Père Goriot," whom he had just seen in the act of leaving the same house, adding that they were very near neighbours. The lady's husband took up the word "père" in undisguised irritation; the lady tried to turn the difficulty by asking Rastignac if he liked music, and going to her piano. The fact was that this countess was the Père Goriot's daughter. The discovery of this led Rastignac to a close and singular intimacy with Goriot. Afterwards the young gentleman became acquainted with Goriot's other daughter, Madame de Nucingen. When Rastignac saw how both these ladies lived he could not help asking Goriot how it was that, whilst he had daughters whose surroundings were those of luxury, he himself could live so miserably:—

Ma foi, dit-il, d'un air en apparence insouciant, à quoi cela me servirait-il d'être mieux? Je ne puis guère vous expliquer ces choses-là; je ne sais pas dire deux paroles de suite comme il faut. Tout est là, ajoute-t-il en se frappant au cœur. Ma vie, à moi, est dans mes deux filles. Si elles s'amuse, si elles sont heureuses, bravement mises, si elles marchent sur des tapis, qu'importe de quel drap je sois vêtu et comment est l'endroit où je couche? Je n'ai point froid si elles ont chaud, je ne m'ennuie jamais si elles rient. Je n'ai de chagrins que les leurs.

In a word, the reduction in Goriot's manner of living has been due simply to a constant drain upon the resources that remained to him in order to supply the extravagance of his daughters. It is a case of excessive or diseased sentiment, as remote from the true balance of healthy nature as the intensest egotism of the avaricious. Goriot has become personally quite insensible to good or evil fortune, yet at the same time painfully sensitive to the slightest and most temporary inconvenience which can affect the ideal well-being of his daughters. To put it otherwise, his sensitiveness to the inconveniences and sufferings of poverty, instead of being reduced or deadened, has on the contrary been heightened, but at the same time it has been transferred, carried out of himself and his own life, into the life of his daughters, by a morbidly exquisite sympathy. Balzac paints with daring truth the consequences of a sympathy of this kind. It goes so far that whatever can give pleasure to the daughters, whether the pleasure is right or wrong, moral or immoral, is a source of happiness to Goriot, whilst the least privation or annoyance that can ever affect them wounds and tortures him intolerably. For their vainest pleasures, for the payment of debts they had neither of them any right to contract, he reduces himself in his old age to the barest necessities of existence. This passion of paternity becomes more and more dominant as senile weakness supervenes. Finally it absorbs and concentrates all the remaining energies of the man.

The drama steadily increases in pathos and interest to the end. Goriot defaces and sells the pieces of silver-plate that remain to him, reduces himself to the lowest pitance, and finally has an attack of serious apoplexy, brought on by a terrible scene with one of his daughters, who urgently wants more money of him, because she has been pawning her husband's family diamonds. Goriot's latest extravagance has been to furnish a separate apartment for Madame de Nucingen, which has cost him 12,000 francs at a time when he refuses himself a pinch of snuff from motives of economy. In consequence of this he cannot help his other daughter, and finds himself in the difficulty which is always finally certain to overtake the boundlessly generous—the difficulty of having no longer the means of generosity. The consciousness of this is more than Goriot can bear, and he succumbs to the misery of feeling that he is no longer equal to the duties of paternity. Whilst he is dying, his daughters, not ignorant of his illness, go to a great ball, and a hundred times in the night the old man repeats, "They are dancing; she has her beautiful ball-dress. Delphine, my little Delphine—Nasie!" He is happy to think that they are enjoying themselves; but later he begins to want them, and, finding that they do not come, feels their ingratitude very painfully. The strongest passages in the book are the dying man's alternate outpourings of tender love and cruel disappointment:—

Elles vont venir, reprit le vieillard. Je les connais. Cette bonne Delphine, si je meurs, quel chagrin je lui causerai! Nasie, aussi. Je ne voudrais pas mourir pour ne pas les faire pleurer. Mourir, non bon Eugène, c'est ne plus les voir. Pour un père, l'enfer, c'est d'être sans enfants, et j'ai déjà fait mon apprentissage depuis qu'elles sont mariées. Dites donc, si je vais en Paradis, je pourrai revenir sur terre en esprit autour d'elles. J'ai entendu dire de ces choses-là. Sont-elles vraies?

He waits and waits for them, suffering through the weary hours of the night, and the day following. Finally, he perceives that they will never come, and sees clearly:—

Elles ont toutes les deux des cours de roche. J'avais trop d'amour pour elles pour qu'elles en eussent pour moi. Un père doit être toujours riche, il doit tenir ses enfants en bride comme des chevaux sornous. Et j'étais à genoux devant elles! Les misérables! elles couronnent dignement leur conduite envers moi depuis dix ans. O mon Dieu! puisque tu connais les misères, les souffrances que j'ai endurées; puisque tu as compté les coups de poignard que j'ai reçus, dans ce temps où m'a vieilli, changé, tué, blâmé, pourquoi me fais-tu donc souffrir aujourd'hui? J'ai bien mérité le péché de les trop aimer. Elles se sont bien vengées de mon affection, elles m'ont tenu comme des bœufs.

Still, just as he is dying, he calls for them tenderly again, by the pet names used when they were children, "Nasie—Filine!" And just at last, when his eyes are dim, and Rastignac and the doctor lift him to ease him, his outstretched hands catch the men's hair and he whispers it to his daughters:—

Je ne meurs plus, dit-il. Ah! mes anges! Deux mots, deux mots seulement, pour que je s'en aille sur cette parole.

The tragedy ends with a pauper's funeral, followed to the cemetery by two empty carriages. There is a sentence towards the close of the story which implies that, in Balzac's mind, Goriot represented "la Paternité." But the truth is that, though a striking delineation, and one of the most complete conceptions in the whole range of imaginative literature, Balzac's Père Goriot does not represent all the qualities which belong to the ideal father. It is conceivable that a father might love his daughters as tenderly and devotedly as Goriot loved his, and yet have sufficient strength of character to set limits to his indulgence. At least one-half of the beauty and grandeur of paternity consists in the firmness which denies itself the pleasures of tenderness unrestrained. Goriot was punished, not because he indulged his daughters, but because he indulged himself. His self-indulgence, it is true, was not of a common type. He refused himself every physical luxury, and every mental luxury except one. That one, however, the luxury of paternal tenderness, he revelled in till it first ruined, and then killed him. We cannot help pitying Goriot, and, in spite of Balzac's manner, there is deep pathos in the narrative; but Goriot's case is one of those numerous cases in which a quality or passion appears to be wonderfully strong because other qualities, which ought to counteract it, are too weak to do their duty.

THE TRADESMEN'S PROTEST AGAINST INTERNATIONAL BAZAARS.

THE tradesmen who met this week at the Mansion House to protest against international bazaars have expressed their meaning with unmistakable distinctness. The managers of these bazaars will hardly have the audacity henceforward to pretend that the late Prince Consort would have approved of their development of his idea of International Exhibitions. It is impossible to doubt that, as the Lord Mayor observed, the Prince Consort "would have been grieved if he had thought that these Exhibitions would ever have undergone such a transformation." The difficulty, however, is to give practical effect to the protest of this meeting. These Exhibitions are not national, although they are called international; and as the nation does not directly pay for them, the national representatives need not be consulted about continuing them. It is a fact deserving perhaps of explanation, that the ostensible manager of these Exhibitions is an officer of Royal Engineers, and that the work of preparing for them has been chiefly done by soldiers of the same corps, wearing uniform. It is possible that this may have been intended to symbolize the pacific policy of the present Government. When swords are beaten into pruning-hooks, it may be proper to employ red-coated Sappers to unpack crockery. It might, however, be worth while for some member of the House of Commons to ask Mr. Cardwell under what department of military duty he arranges the shopkeeping proceedings of Colonel Scott and his assistants at South Kensington. These soldiers are either employed in the public service or they are not. The establishment which they manage may be a national Exhibition or it may be a trading bazaar, but it cannot be both.

It appears that the departure of the Commissioners from the original principle of International Exhibitions has been caused by their concession to French exhibitors of the right to manage their part of the Exhibition as they pleased. Thereupon the French exhibitors instituted a large bazaar instead of an exhibition of art, and the Commissioners, to meet the complaint of the English exhibitors, offered them similar privileges. But a speaker at the meeting declared on behalf of himself and his brother tradesmen that they did not want shops rent free at South Kensington. They would rather not have them, for such a system is not calculated to render these Exhibitions useful in the promotion of arts and manufactures. The speaker recommended the Commissioners to recall the concession which they have made to French exhibitors, and to conduct the Exhibition on the same principle as the Royal Academy—that is, "to admit nothing which had not a certain degree of merit in it." That, said he, would be satisfactory to all concerned. But, supposing that the Commissioners should refuse to adopt his recommendation, then he urged the English traders "to meet them with a passive resistance, and one and all abstain from exhibiting." We hope that the English traders will follow this sensible advice. Even the ingenious Mr. Cole C.B. will hardly find himself able to conduct an Exhibition without exhibitors. If, said the speaker, the representations of that meeting failed, his hearers had simply to refuse to exhibit at all, "and then there would be no Exhibition." We think, but are not quite sure, that he is right. There would still be the Educational Department, to which it might be possible to induce schoolmasters to send copybooks; and there would, of course, be also the Department of Fine Arts, where a moderate trade might be done in pictures and engravings. We do not at this moment see how any new departments could be invented, but Mr. Cole C.B. would doubtless be equal to the emergency. The danger is that the combination against the bazaar may not be universal. Some tradesmen may perhaps be tempted by the prospect of a concentration of the puffing powers of the Commissioners upon themselves. It would, however, be difficult to pretend that a few obscure tradesmen represented the industry of England, and it might even happen that the business of unpacking and arranging goods might leave Colonel Scott and his corps of Sappers at liberty to attend sometimes to military duties.

Another speaker, with whom we sympathize, declared that he was tired of all the nonsense that was spoken about the fine arts in these days. "One would suppose," said he, "that we had never heard of the fine arts until Mr. Henry Cole came into existence, but that was all nonsense." It may be doubted whether Mr. Cole has ever advanced those arts which he certainly did not invent, but it is certain that he is a principal author of the system of international bazaars. "It was found," said another speaker, "that there was an under-movement of Mr. Cole and Mr. Wright, and that the foreign exhibitors were selling and removing goods." This was felt to be unjust to the English exhibitors, who were therefore permitted to do the same, and the consequence was an influx of fresh goods every day, and the Exhibition was turned into a bazaar. Assuming this to be, as we believe it is, a correct description of the progress of affairs at South Kensington last summer, the proper idea of an International Exhibition was manifestly abandoned. It can scarcely be believed, said another speaker, that men in the high position of the Commissioners of the Exhibition would lend themselves, as they have done, to proceedings so strongly to be deprecated. Of course it could not be believed until we knew that there was "an under-movement of Mr. Cole." But it remains to be seen whether Mr. Cole's potent influence will not be overborne by the vigorous protest of the London tradesmen. "I am here," said the Lord Mayor, "to denounce in no measured terms anything like an attempt to make the International Exhibition a retail trade for the advantage of foreigners." This is tolerably plain language. "I do not think," said the Lord Mayor again, "that the gentlemen acting on behalf of the Trades' Protection Association have been fairly treated by the Commissioners;" and this is an opinion which can hardly be disregarded. "It is a most unfair procedure that the foreign exhibitor should have conceded to him privileges which are denied to the English exhibitor." But if the same privileges are conceded equally to all exhibitors, the idea of an Exhibition is irretrievably lost in the reality of a bazaar. The Commissioners can hardly disregard the public protest of the Lord Mayor against their "conduct, as utterly opposed to the righteous dealing which we might have expected at their hands." But he finds a partial excuse for them in their amazing ignorance of the under-working of Mr. Cole. The Lord Mayor, having thus opened the proceedings, a resolution was moved to the effect that the meeting viewed with regret and alarm the determination of the Commissioners to convert the International Exhibition into enormous retail shops. A speaker, in support of this resolution, was certain that the Commissioners would not dare to disregard it. But the Commissioners—or at least Mr. Cole, acting in their name—possess a sublime audacity. Popular opinion is to be brought to bear upon the Commissioners, and they are to be compelled to retrace their steps; but if they do, it will be for the first time since they placed themselves under Mr. Cole's guidance.

Whatever becomes of International Exhibitions, it is certain that Mr. Cole will proceed with the duty which he has undertaken of improving his countrymen's taste and instructing them in science and art. We shall, however, wait with curiosity to see whether anything comes of this meeting at the Mansion House. The speakers are manifestly and unanswerably in the right. It is monstrous that the foreigner should have an advantage over the Englishman in selling goods at these Exhibitions, and it would be impossible to place them upon an equality. When complaint was made that the foreigner had been allowed to open shop in the Exhibition, it was suggested, on behalf of the Commissioners, that the Englishman might open shop also. But how could space in the shop be fairly apportioned among various claimants for it? In the result a favoured few would probably obtain the privilege, and would monopolize the advantages which men of small capital would be unable to enjoy. And besides, a bazaar is one thing and an Exhibition is or ought to be another. We trust that the unanimity of the meeting will be proof against the allurements of individual advantage. The tradesmen will carry public opinion with them in their protest against the degradation of art and the insult to the Prince Consort's memory. Let us suppose the shops, English and foreign, to be established, and the system of catalogues and guides and reports to be in full activity. It would be impossible to avoid the suspicion, and difficult to prevent the reality, of favouritism on the part of the Commissioners towards a tradesman whose wares might be most extravagantly puffed. We should imagine that the Commissioners would decline to incur the imputation of partiality, even if there were any advantage in the bazaar system, which there is not. It was announced as the unanimous opinion of the manufacturers in the Staffordshire Potteries that they ought not to assist the present or any future Exhibition at South Kensington by exhibiting in the Fine Arts Department, unless the idea of a bazaar be entirely abandoned. If this resolution be adhered to, there will be almost inevitably a mitigation of the activity of Mr. Cole.

REVIEWS.

PRINCE HOHENSTIEL-SCHWANGAU.*

THE title of Saviour of Society is almost as definitely personal as a proper name; and, as the Prince of Hohenstiel-Schwangau makes war on Austria and smashes Savoy and Nice, the French Empire might have been substituted for the imaginary principality, and Paris or the Tuileries for the Residenz, but that delicacy prescribes the use of a conventional name when the character of a living person is analysed. The Emperor Napoleon indeed would, even if he had been introduced in his own name, have had little reason to complain of an apologist who sometimes defends his conduct and motives with a subtle ingenuity of which he might perhaps himself be scarcely capable. Notwithstanding the ironical appearance of the title-page, his services in saving society are acknowledged in perfect seriousness. It may be conjectured that a part at least of Mr. Browning's qualified approval is attributable to the Emperor's share in the liberation of Italy, for few indigenous patriots have been so earnestly devoted as the foreign poet to the cause of Italian independence; but for purposes of art or of criticism it matters little whether opinions which may be advocated in verse are politically sound. The enterprise which narrowly escaped defeat at Solferino was only one step in the adventurous career which included the Crimean war, the abortive Mexican expedition, and the disaster of Sedan. The Empire which was to establish peace resulted in a succession of wars; and the French nation is not consoled for the misfortunes which it has endured by the incidental triumph of justice in Italy. Whatever objects beyond the acquisition of two Piedmontese provinces by France may have induced Napoleon III. to engage in the war of 1859, he has won for himself the unforeseen advantage of a powerful though discriminating advocate. The apology would have been completer and more arduous if it had included some plausible explanation of the quarrel and declaration of war in 1870, and of the delay at Metz and the fatal advance from Châlons. It is possible that the greater part of the poem may have been written before the fall of the Empire, and that an explanation of the final reverses would have been incompatible with Mr. Browning's plan. The unpopularity which at present attaches to the thesis maintained by the Prince of Hohenstiel will perhaps not be abated by the style of a poem written in Mr. Browning's harshest and most enigmatic manner. His condensed vigour of thought has never been displayed with less admixture of ornament; although he has seldom afforded fuller proof of his extraordinary power of reasoning in verse. The versification is sometimes rough and generally monotonous; and yet the effect of the composition is in no respect prosaic. The dramatic propriety of the Prince's monologue is carefully and successfully maintained; and it is unnecessary to inquire whether the supposed speaker would in real life be capable of the generalizations by which he justifies his conduct. The poet indicates, amongst other elements of character, the unconscious sophistry which tinges all controversial autobiography; but the general tone of the earlier part of the apology apparently corresponds with Mr. Browning's serious judgment. In substance the fallen potentate takes credit to himself for having kept society in Hohenstiel-Schwangau together for twenty years. Claiming no constructive genius, he holds that he served his country best by maintaining internal peace, and allowing time for consideration. Like Bishop Blougram, the Prince of Hohenstiel admits to himself that perfect sincerity is difficult or unattainable:—

Alack! one lies oneself
Even in the stating that one's end was truth,
Truth only, if one states so much in words.
                    but, do your best,
Words have to come; and somehow words defect
As the best cannon ever rifled will.

Not one man in ten, and not one woman in a hundred, tells the truth and the whole truth in assigning a reason for the most trivial act. A systematic justification of a life passed on the summits of power will undoubtedly be liable to verbal deflection.

For the purpose probably of transposing an everyday topic into an ideal region, the poem is, by a machinery characteristic of Mr. Browning, enclosed in a framework within a framework. The Prince addresses his apology, over a cigar in Leicester Square, to a young person of the neighbourhood, who would assuredly not have understood a single word of his elaborate explanation; but towards the end of the poem it appears that Leicester Square and its congenial denizens are only creations of a dream, and the speaker finds himself at home in his Residenz of Hohenstiel-Schwangau, having fallen asleep over a letter to his "Cousin-Duke," containing probably the remonstrance against the Hohenzollern candidature for the throne of Spain. Awake or asleep he follows the same course of reflection, consoling himself with the remark that

Twenty years are good gain, come what come will;
Double or quits! The letter goes! or stays?

The letter, as the world has reason to know, went to its destination, producing, among more important consequences, a striking inconsistency between the policy of the Saviour of Society and the imaginary description of his own conduct:—

While I have rule,
Understand! war for war's sake, war for the sake
Of the good war gets you, as war's sole excuse,
Is damnable, and damned shall be. . . .
Now you fair would war
Because the neighbour priggish even much;
Because there has been silence half an hour,
Like Heaven on earth, without a gunner shot
Announcing Hohenstiel-Schwangau
Are minded to disturb the jubilee . . .

You I aspire to make my better self,
And truly the Great Nation. No more war
For war's sake then. And, seeing wickedness
Springs out of folly, no more foolish dread
Of the neighbour waxing too inordinate
A rival through his gain of wealth and ease.

A careless reader might be puzzled by the Prince's depreciation of that foolish dread of the prosperity of a neighbour which in fact brought his prototype to ruin. He also exceeds the permissible license of self-deception when he represents the war with Austria as a purely beneficent and disinterested protest against wrong, and the seizure of Savoy and Nice as a condescension

To the natural susceptibility
Of folks at home, unwitting of that pitch
You soar to, and misdoubting if Truth, Right,
And the other such augustnesses repay
Expenditure in coin o' the realm.

For himself the hero only announces to his countrymen:—

Hohenstiel-Schwangau, you and I must march
The other road! war for the hate of war,
Not love, this once. So Italy was free.

It is much to be wished that Mr. Browning would regard the natural susceptibility of folks who admire his genius, if not by abstaining from the dramatic use of sophistry, at least by substituting lines which may be scanned for such agglomerations of tuneless syllables as

To the natural susceptibility.

Verse pregnant with thought and meaning may sometimes be allowed a temporarily pedestrian gait, but it is bound to be verse, and not merely inharmonious prose. If Mr. Browning is sometimes careless of the niceties of language, he is never indifferent to dramatic consistency or to the logic of poetry. The second half of the apology of the Prince of Hohenstiel-Schwangau is at the same time a satire, in the form of an ideal narrative of the career which might have been pursued:—

Autobiography, adieu! The rest
Shall make amends, be pure blame, history,
And falsehood; not the ineffective truth,
But Thiers-and-Victor-Hugo exercise.
Hear what I never was, but might have been
I' the better world where goes tobacco smoke.
Here lie the dozen volumes of my life—
(Did I say, lie? The pregnant word will serve)
Cut on to the concluding chapter, though,
Because the little hours begin to strike;
Hurry Thiers-Hugo to the labours' end—
Something like this the unwritten chapter reads.

It is in the life so depicted by the "veracious and imaginary Thiers" that firm discouragement of war, disinterested liberation of Italy, and acquisition of supreme power without violation of pledge or promise, are contrasted with the actual history of the Second Empire. The irony which is thus directed against some portions of the Prince's conduct is not incompatible with apologetic hints, nor even with partial eulogy. The suppression of the National Assembly and the Republic is justified by arguments which might in some degree excuse the means by which the end was attained:—

Hohenstiel-Schwangau being, no dispute,
Absolute mistress, chose the Assembly, first,
To serve her; chose this man, its President
Afterward, to serve also—specially
To see that they did service, one and all.
And now the proper term of years was out,
When the Head-servant must vacate his place,
And nothing lay so patent to the world
As that his fellow servants one and all
Were, mildly make we mention, knaves or fools.

In the imaginary story the President resigns his power and appeals to the people, who unanimously entrust him with the power which he demands; but on the assumption that all his opponents were knaves or fools, the conspiracy of 1851 might be almost pardoned, especially as the Assembly would, in accordance with the Constitution, have prohibited the Prince from seeking re-election. The methods of enforcing order or submission were in both cases the same:—

Heavily did he let his fist fall plumb
On each perturber of the public peace,
No matter whose the wagging head it broke—
From bald-pate craft and greed and impudence
Of night-hawk at first chance to prowl and prey
For glory and a little gain beside,
To sordid head-top, foamy patriotism,
And tribunitian daring, breast laid bare
Through confidence in rectitude, with hand
On private pistol in the pocket.

By precisely the same arguments tyrants in all ages have defended enterprises which might otherwise have been regarded as selfish. If all adversaries of despotism are knaves and fools, if patriots keep their hands on private pistols in the pocket, it matters comparatively little whether the despot who reduces them to silence appeals to a confidential body of Fleury's and Morny's and St. Armands, or to the people which is assumed to be at the same time infallible and supreme. It must be for the general benefit that the only wise and competent ruler should ascend the throne, and if the door is locked he must climb in through the window. The ideal Prince of Hohenstiel also followed the example of democratic usurpers in the use of the power which he had acquired by free election:—

As thus began his sway,
So, through its twenty years, one rule of right

Sufficed him; govern for the many first,
The poor mean multitude, all mouths and eyes;
Bid the few, better favoured in the brain,
Be patient, not presume on privilege,
Help him, or else be quiet—never crave
That he help them.

The giant Talus in the Faery Queen adopts the same doctrine of the expediency of flattening the hills and exalting the valleys; but in the days of Elizabeth it had not occurred to English poets that perfect polity would be represented by a dead level of society with a presiding Sultan. It is indeed probable that on this point Mr. Browning sympathizes rather with the direct judgment of the Prince of Hohenstiel than with the theories of his more perfect counterpart. In the autobiographical part of his apology the Prince sneers at the privilege by which divers hundred thousand fools may vote

A vote untampered with by one wise man,
And so elect Barabbas deputy
In lieu of his concurrent.

It would be presumptuous to attribute too confidently to an essentially dramatic poet the opinions which are expressed by the characters whom he creates; but when he comes to Italy, and especially to Rome, Mr. Browning scarcely cares to abstain from looking through the mask. It certainly never occurred to any previous assailant of the Papacy to describe its nature as best typified

By its embodiment in Peter's Dome—
The scorpion body with the greedy pair
Of outstretched nippers, either colonnade
Agape for the advance of heads and hearts.

To a friendly or indifferent eye the east front of St. Peter's scarcely suggests the image of a scorpion. The description of a congregation or assemblage of cardinals round the Pope, trembling at the menaces of the Emperor, is singularly effective:—

And ye, what strikes the panic to your heart?
Decreet council chambers, where some lamp
Drives the unbroken black three paces off
From where the graybeards huddle in debate,
Dim cowl and capes, and midmost glitters one
Like tarnished gold; and what they say is doubt,
And what they think is fear, and what suspends
The breath in them is not the plaster-patch
Time disengages from the painted wall
Where Rafael mouderingly bids adieu,
Nor tick of insect turning tapestry
'To dust, which a queen's finger traced of old;
But some word, resonant, redoubtable
Of who once felt upon his head a hand,
Whereof the head now apprehends his foot.

The picturesque and impressive passages which are thickly interspersed through the poem would sufficiently atone for defects which it might be possible to point out both in the plan and in the composition. The Sphinx, as the Emperor calls himself, undertakes to disclose her riddle:—

Because night draws on, and the sands increase,
And desert whispers grow a prophecy—

and as long as such reasons are assigned for the disclosure, it is perhaps not necessary to inquire why the revelation should be made to a questionable auditors in Leicester Square. The intellectual effort which is required to grapple with Mr. Browning's marvellous involutions of thought is in itself no inconsiderable pleasure, for experience shows that the windings of the labyrinth are regulated by a law, and that in the inmost recesses a treasure is concealed.

KAVANAGH'S ORIGIN OF LANGUAGE AND MYTHS.*

THIS is the kind of book which is thoroughly baffling to the reviewer. He is inclined to make the same remonstrance as Achish, King of Gath—"Have I need of madmen?" Of course we do not for a moment suppose that Mr. Morgan Kavanagh is not perfectly capable of taking care of his private affairs; but, as far as anything like literary criticism goes, his speculations are much on a level with the belief of the man who, though rational on other points, believed that he had private intelligence from the planet Saturn, or of the other man who came one step nearer to the bounds of possibility by believing that he corresponded with a princess in cherry-juice. In truth we are not sure whether in making these comparisons, we are not giving Mr. Kavanagh an undue advantage. These two unfortunate persons suffered only under a monomania. If their friends only kept clear of the two fatal subjects, they could hold reasonable discourse on other matters. There was no fear of their breaking people's heads or breaking out into abusive language. Mr. Kavanagh's case is somewhat different. That he writes nonsense about the Origin of Language and Myths is in no way remarkable; in so doing he is, as we know to our cost, only one of a very large body. That he writes, as on the whole we think he does, greater nonsense on those ticklish subjects than any one else that we know of, is, if we come to think of it, in no way remarkable either. On every subject on which men write nonsense there must be some man who writes the greatest nonsense, if we only had the good luck to come across him in each case. If this were all, Mr. Kavanagh's theories about the letter O, and all the other odd theories to be found in his book, would fairly come under the head of harmless monomania. He would be no worse than the ingenious gentleman who believed that all the details of the Nibelungen Lied were true history, and that they all happened in Norfolk. He would be no worse than our cherished Yorkshire friend who believes that all the great events of British history happened within the postal delivery of Doncaster, save only the landing of Caesar, which took place in the same region as the exploits of Attila and Theodoric. The speculations of Mr. Kavanagh, Mr. Haigh, and Mr. Surtees are in themselves very much on a level, but Mr. Haigh and Mr. Surtees do not revile sound scholars in the same way in which Mr. Kavanagh does. Mr. Kavanagh, in his second volume, gets dramatic, and gives us a long performance in dialogue, of which we are far from understanding the whole, but which seems designed to deal by Professor Max Müller very much as Aristophanes dealt by Socrates and Cleon. Mr. Kavanagh has also a great deal to tell us about several other living persons who have in different ways pleased or offended him. But the person of whom Mr. Kavanagh tells us most is Mr. Kavanagh himself. He is his own Boswell; he keeps a window in his breast; he reveals the secrets of his own confessions.

If we were to look on Mr. Kavanagh from the point of view of reasonable people, we might be surprised at the presumption of one who has undertaken to set so many eminent scholars right, when, by his own showing, his qualifications for the task are so remarkably small. Will it be believed that the man who has undertaken to upset the whole system of Comparative Philology confesses, or rather boasts, not only that he knows nothing of Sanscrit, but that he is actually ignorant of modern High-German? In fact, as his instances of words seem always to be picked out of dictionaries, we may perhaps be allowed to doubt whether he has any scholarlike knowledge of any language whatever. We cannot help being surprised that a man in this state of mind should take upon himself to deal with philological subjects at all. But we are not surprised that, when he has taken it upon himself, he should throughout speak of real scholars with the boisterous contempt, not of mere ignorance, but of that more hopeless state in which the eyes are wilfully shut. We all know the type of man, often a merely harmless and amusing type, who really knows nothing of modern scientific discovery, who has been diligently muddling himself through his whole life with the works of antiquated and mystical writers, whom he quotes as so many infallible oracles. There is always something which, if amusing, is a little touching, in the way in which people of this kind appeal to their Bryant, their Parkhurst, or whatever the cherished idol may be, as if the whole modern world, instead of keeping an indistinct memory of their names, would at once recognize a reference to every page of their writings. Such men, it often happens, have never heard of scientific philology and mythology, and most likely would not even know the names of the scholars who have given themselves to their investigation. Their light is in truth more misleading than utter darkness; still they have been honestly working according to their light, such as it is. Mr. Morgan Kavanagh has got far beyond this harmless stage. It would be too much to say that he understands the views of scientific scholars; but he knows that there are such men, and that they have views the acceptance of which would utterly set aside his own cherished theories. He therefore turns on them with a sort of ferocity. We are sure Mr. Kavanagh is perfectly honest; the very self-condemning nature of his confessions, the very wildness of his attacks on others, shows that he is pouring forth what he really feels. Of course this is no excuse for him, as he has the means of knowing better; but it makes his mental and moral state a curious study. It seems that Mr. Kavanagh wrote another book a good many years ago. He came to a knowledge of the writings of Professor Müller and M. Littré after he had written that book, and to his great surprise he found that neither of them had taken any notice of it. That they had really never heard of Mr. Kavanagh and his book—that, if they had seen his book and if it was at all like the present book, they might think it the greatest kindness to say nothing about it—of course never comes into Mr. Kavanagh's head. Professor Müller, M. Littré, and scholars in general, are all engaged in a wicked conspiracy to hide Mr. Kavanagh's light from the world. Moreover he wrote for the "prix Volney," and did not get it, and therefore he has a further grievance against the judges of the "prix Volney" and the world in general.

What Mr. Kavanagh's own theory is we do not profess to know. We have tried to make it out; but there are things which are beyond us, and this is one of them. But, as far as we can make anything out, it seems to have something to do with the letter O, which has somehow become the Alpha as well as the Omega of Mr. Kavanagh. If we rightly understand him—a point about which we are very far from feeling comfortable—"man's first word" was to say O; a view which would have been fully understood by Will Atkins's wife in Robinson Crusoe. We think it safer to say where Will Atkins and his wife are to be found, as haply some modern readers may have forgotten them. Will Atkins's wife, then, summed up all religious worship under the phrase of "saying O"; her grand and simple view of natural theology was that "all things say O to Him." In the same spirit, according to Mr. Morgan Kavanagh, human speech began by all men saying O. Again, if we rightly understand it, it was the sun to whom they said O; for is not the sun round? and is not the letter O round? and do we not make a round shape with our lips whenever we say O, whether to the sun or to anything chief. Of this, the true origin of language, Professor Müller and Mr. Littré were not aware; they were blind, wilfully blind, for had not Mr. Kavanagh already written a book on the matter, by whose light they obstinately refused to profit? They are therefore to be reviled and held up to scorn throughout the book. Professor Müller especially, besides his other offences, has to suffer for the deadly sin of being a German; he therefore comes in for yet harder measure than his French fellow-sufferer. There is something irresistibly droll in Mr. Kavanagh's way of quoting and referring to both his friends and his enemies, and in the simple-minded confessions of his own ignorance with which the quotations and references are often accompanied. "It will not be difficult for a child to correct Mr. Max Müller's mistakes, even though as ignorant of German as I am myself." "What is the word for serpent in Hebrew? It is, according to Dr. Adam Clarke, who, as every one knows, was a great Hebrew scholar, Nachash." "This is confirmed by Webster, from whom I learn that the Saxon of the verb to rep is hrepian," &c. "The Greek word καρπύριον is thus explained by Donnegan." "I learn from Webster that the etymology of copy is copie in French and copy in Armoric." "I open my Parkhurst, who was, of all learned Christians, one of the most orthodox." "The mistakes of Professor Müller in this passage would be unpardonable if its author knew anything of the origin of language." "It seems that Welcker, a great German scholar, is of opinion." "Bopp, though a very learned man, knew nothing of the origin of language." "If M. Max Müller knew no more of Sanskrit than I do myself—but believing, as every one else does, that he is deeply read in this language." "If I did not know from report that M. Max Müller is very learned in Sanskrit, I should say his knowledge of this language was very limited." "This I knew before, but not from an acquaintance with Sanskrit, of which I happen to be wholly ignorant; but from my own principles, which must in time to come serve the philologist more than a knowledge of fifty languages." "A philologist named Jal, some learned German, I suppose—has been led to imagine." Such are the ignes fatui of scholarship which Mr. Kavanagh has arisen to put out; how different is the steady light of his own intuitive knowledge!

But why do I not allow myself, in my etymologies, to be led astray by fanciful notions? Because I have been so led too many times already, so that I am now doubly on my guard against every etymology bearing in the slightest degree the appearance of fancy. And then I have the advantage of certain fixed principles unknown to my predecessors, by which I am constantly checked and kept within rational limits whenever on the verge of going wrong.

The fixed principle unknown to Mr. Kavanagh's predecessors seems to be that of steadily keeping out of sight, not only the special discoveries of Comparative Philology, but all regard to the historical connexion of languages in any way. We will put aside all references to mysterious languages like German and Sanskrit, of which Mr. Kavanagh "happens to be wholly ignorant." Mr. Kavanagh, by his own account, has lived a good deal in France, and seems to be able, or to think himself able, to write for a French prize. But it is all one to him whether he derives a French word from Latin or a Latin word from French. In the like sort it is all one to him whether the syllable of a word on which he plays off his philological sleight of hand is the root or only the ending. Distinctions of that kind may be very well for German Professors and people who understand Sanskrit. They are beneath the notice of men who speak always on fixed principles and who are never led away by their fancy. One or two specimens may amuse. Mr. Kavanagh gets across that very hard word gargon and its kindred:—

M. Littré allows us to understand, as shown above, that the ending on of gargon has grown out of garcionem, accusative of garcio, a word in low Latin; now granting that there ever has been such a word, and that it has been regularly declined after the manner of words in the third declension, I cannot help regarding as a mistake the derivation of the ending on of gargon, which I believe to be the same as the on of budon, broudon, monton, &c.; that is, as an article fallen behind its noun, and of which a more ancient form appears to have been an, and that like this word, it then meant one. And this view is confirmed by M. Littré himself, since he shows, in passages quoted from old writings, gargon to have been written gargun. And we should remark that every word which served anciently as an article meant both one and the; that is to say, it was both indefinite and definite. Hence the word gargon must have once been an gars or an gars, and then the meaning was either an gars or le gars, as the sense directed. Thus the peasant, with whom the old forms of words in all languages remain longest, frequently uses gars for gargon, as every Frenchman knows. We have, therefore, in our endeavours to trace gargon to its original, to notice only gars, which must have long preceded gargon, just as le sold must have long preceded solat; that is, before le fell behind sol and joined with it.

A little knowledge of "low Latin," and of its manner of declining words in the third declension, might not be wholly useless to one who explores the early history of the French tongue, even though Sanskrit and German are deemed to help nothing to that end. We remember very well how St. Thomas of Canterbury—we are sorry that he used such bad language—once addressed a certain man, "garcionem filium et broum appellatum."

Here again—

In filios, sol, and sun, the radical meaning of each of these words is one. This is made very plain by sol, root of solus, yet the fil of filios is the same word; that is, it means solus or one. And in the u of sun has grown out of the separate h, this word has also the meaning of one, for the root is sun. The Greek of monos is monos, and its root monos differs from sun and sol from the fil of filios; and what one may more clearly than the mean monos and sol, just as the sun does, then its meaning and monos and sol.

and sun, for the l of each of these words being the same as the l of monos, and monos and sol must be therefore the same as monos and sol. And the English word moon has still the same meaning, for it is radian to mon, as is shown by moon, and mon is the radical part of monos which means both one and alone.

We have not room to copy what Mr. Kavanagh says at vol. i. p. 76 of seq. about the etymology of tranquillus. We could not conscientiously recommend anybody to buy Mr. Kavanagh's book, but, if any one of our readers chances to fall in with a copy, it might be worth while to con over those three or four pages; and, indeed, by the simple process of turning over the pages, the philologist in an idle mood will constantly light on things which to the initiated are equal to the cream of all jest books.

In all things it is well to know what is in store for us:—

Atqui scilicet quæ sibi barbarus
Tortor pararet.

Among Mr. Kavanagh's curiosities we have not failed to notice his curious fly-leaf, which runs thus:—

Copies of this Work are, with the Author's respects, presented to several Literary Reviews and Scientific Institutes, in the hope that, considering the importance of its subject, it may, for the sake of truth and science, be thoroughly and critically investigated. The principal parts of all such notices—whether favourable or adverse—shall, while received with thanks, be inserted and freely commented on, in a small volume or brochure, to be entitled "An Author his own Reviewer."

We await our doom with calmness, sitting in expectation "on our keel," which, according to Mr. Kavanagh, is the true sense of "tranquillus."

PHILLIPS'S ESSAYS FROM THE TIMES.*

THESE essays, which now for the first time appear under the name of the author, are specimens of the literature which some twenty years ago was considered to be the best writing of the leading paper of the day. The essays, or some of them, for we confess that our curiosity has not been sufficiently great to induce us to clear up every detail of their history, were originally collected in order to provide for the wants of railway travellers. The publisher described them as "literary productions of the highest order," and intended them to be a substitute for the wretched trash which then had almost exclusive occupation of the book-stalls. The motive was excellent in every way, and we may hope that it was rewarded by a fair amount of success. The essays are throughout most unexceptionable in their morality, and we should be glad to think that, even at the present enlightened period, the materials offered at railway book-stalls were always up to this standard. We shall, however, merely consider them as illustrating the pitch of excellence attained in this department of literature at the time when the first Great Exhibition was the wonder of the day, when Louis Philippe was the last new exile from the French throne, when Gordon Cumming was the great African lion, when people were disputing as to whether John Sterling was an infidel, when Mr. Kingsley was writing vehement radicalism, and when the Saturday Review—if we may mention such a trifle—was not yet in existence.

The general character of the writing may be described in two words. We should call it, if we might borrow a bold metaphor from America, "one-horse" Macaulay. We recognize the characteristics of the most popular essayist of the time, so far as those characteristics are compatible with immeasurable inferiority in force and fulness of mind. Lord Macaulay's popularity has lately been on the decline, and those who boast themselves to be our great connoisseurs in style are apt to sneer at his obvious faults. Yet, after every deduction has been made, it would be grossly unfair to deny to him the possession not only of wide and accurate knowledge, but of talents as vigorous as they were undoubtedly limited. To many aspects of politics and literature Lord Macaulay was all but absolutely blind; but what he did see he saw distinctly, and described with admirable vivacity. His merits and his faults are reflected in an unequal degree by his imitators; and that which was pardonable mannerism in the original is apt to become ridiculous in the reproducer. In some respects, however, the model was not a bad one. He did not tempt his followers to lose themselves in the clouds, or to talk sheer nonsense in aiming at philosophy. Young writers in the press might easily find a guide who would lead them on more dangerous paths.

We will however come a little nearer to Mr. Phillips. He of course adopts that distinctive peculiarity of his model which may be described as a constant indulgence in false antithesis. We find sentence after sentence which, though apparently brilliant at the first glance, will seldom bear a moment's inspection. Mr. Phillips, for example, calls Coleridge the "great philosopher, to whom learning came in humility, wisdom with the confession of ignorance, to receive the lessons which poured from his soul with an aim, a fulness, a scope, an originality and force that have never been surpassed in modern times, if even they have been equalled in antiquity by the great oracles of the Academy and the Porch." The exaggeration of the eulogy, as well as the form of the phrase, is characteristic. To compare Coleridge to the great Greek philosophers or to the great Germans from whom he plagiarized, is one of those rash judgments which imply that their writer wishes to be very eloquent about something which he does not understand. And when we look into the phrases in detail, why should learning come with humility, and wisdom with the confession of ignorance?

* Excerpt from the Times. By Samuel Phillips, B.A. London: John Murray. 1871.

Why should not learning confess ignorance and wisdom be humble? The last antithesis sounds to us the neater of the two; but it is probable that, so long as the sentence had a good mouth-filling sound, Mr. Phillips did not trouble himself much about the meaning. Here is another bit of fine writing about Égalité Orleans, which means to say that at one time he was very popular:—"Did he visit the theatre, the performances were suspended that actors and audience might join in one tumultuous welcome of the hero. Was he met in the public walks, the enthusiasm of idolatry knew no bounds. Did he present himself to the people, surrounded by his family, the people threw themselves at the feet of their benefactor, and loaded him with blessings." It is easy to manufacture formulae of this kind by the dozen; and few readers will take the trouble of asking whether the imposing framework encloses any solid substance. Mr. Phillips says in one place of a bombastic proclamation of Lord Ellenborough, that it was written in a style "for which the inflated bulletins of Napoleon, the talkee-talkes of a North American Indian, and the Song of Deborah might each have stood as the model." That sounds very smart; but, if one looks twice, it is impossible to understand how three such dissimilar models could well have been adopted at once. The Napoleonic style, indeed, is obvious enough; but Deborah and the Red Indian have plainly been thrown in at random to make an apparent epigram, though at the cost of swamping the real meaning.

The likeness, however, of which we speak extends far beyond the style. Mr. Phillips, who quotes the "eminent historian, Mr. Macaulay," in nearly every essay, evidently shares his opinions. He is a good sound Whig, with a general impression that railways and telegraphs will annihilate all human evils. It is amusing to see this good, steady—we had almost said stupid—essayist, triumphing over "the redoubtable Thomas Carlyle," to whom he administers a severe rebuke on account of the Life of Sterling. Of the merits which make that book one of the most perfect bits of Mr. Carlyle's writings, or indeed of all English biography, he does not show even a glimmering perception. It never occurs to him that it displays humour and graphic power, or tender feeling; he is intensely offended by a mannerism differing from his own, and irritated at Mr. Carlyle's belief that the world is full of shame which will not be cured even by an unlimited supply of railways. It may be—we need not argue the point—that the thoroughly commonplace mind is nearer the mark in one sense than the original genius. Mr. Carlyle's view may be dyspeptic and distorted; but the attempt to criticize his book by a man who is profoundly incapable of even recognizing the existence of the evils which Mr. Carlyle exaggerates, is like nothing but the attempt of a colour-blind man to criticize a painting. In a similar spirit Mr. Phillips falls foul of Alton Locke. He remarks, à propos of Mr. Kingsley's attack on the sweating system, "How much wiser to give soap, light, and air to the poor, than to irritate spirits sufficiently depressed by dirt with dreams of political equality never to be realized," and so on. That is the true self-complacent spirit of the comfortable classes; give the poor soap instead of appealing to their souls and intellects. The advice may have something in it, though it comes rather oddly from a man who in the same paper extols the laissez-faire principle to the skies, or, in other words, declares it to be a primary political axiom that the people are to get soap for themselves. But at any rate Mr. Kingsley's errors—we imagine that he has pretty well repudiated them now—were above the reach of a man who could only recommend soap instead of sermons. The article ends with a genuine bit of Macaulayese:—"And this is Chartism! And this is the book of a man of the people, addressed to those who are answerable for the workman's wrongs and bound to reform them!" After a great deal of which eloquence the agreeable conclusion is reached, that "even such wild and wanton teaching as that with which we have been dealing can operate but as a feather against the wholesome living tide that pours steadily and surely on towards the abiding shores of a blessed civilization." A feather against a tide is a bold metaphor, and it is rather hard to work out the metaphor about the tide and the shore; at all events one is tempted to prefer even the wild ravings of a Socialist fanatic to the calm, stolid self-content that prevailed in these islands when the first victories of Free-trade were still considered as heralds of an immediate millennium.

Turning to more purely literary matters, we find the closest approximation to the Macaulay type in an essay on Swift. In this, as in several other essays, Mr. Phillips follows the precedent of his original in merely taking a book as a text, and relating the story as from his own sources. The essay on Swift is suggested by M. de Wailly's novel of Stella and Vanessa; but it is substantially on the model of Lord Macaulay's essays on Addison or Byron. In accordance with the well-known precedent, he begins by a string of antitheses. Swift, he declares, was from one point of view an "angel," and from another "a fiend." "If we tell the reader what he was, we shall in the same breath communicate what he was not." Then it appears that though he was witty, he never laughed; that though he was a strong friend, he abused his familiars; that though he was economical to a fault, he made sacrifices to the poor; that though he was a sufferer in body, his frame possessed great vitality; that though he hated Ireland, he was Ireland's first patriot; that though sincerely religious, he played into the hands of infidelity by exposing cant and hypocrisy, and so on. "If we decline to pursue the contradictory series further, it is in pity to the reader, and not for want of materials at command." We should think not; for there never was a prominent man who might not be made the subject of a similar series. In fact, not one of the above antitheses has anything surprising in it. They are mere tricks of language, not genuine puzzles of character. What, for example, is there surprising in the combination of a strong constitution with a tendency to a particular disease or set of diseases? Or would any one anticipate from Swift's ferocious and sardonical humour that he was likely to be a laugher? Or what was there inconsistent about a proud man with a soured temper being a fast friend—especially when his friends were at a distance—and yet coarsely imperious to his dependents? These are childish enigmas if seriously propounded, and they are irritating to one's taste if they are mere devices for giving forced animation to the style. Mr. Phillips applies his "contradictory series" in this instance to prove that Swift was more or less mad from his youth. The hypothesis is almost as convenient to a biographer as to a criminal judge, and summarily gets rid of all necessity for analysing motives and portraying character. That Swift had morbid tendencies which ultimately ruined his intellect is of course clear enough; and they may have affected his conduct for a long time previously, and given the peculiar tinge to his savage humour. But, whatever may have been the extent of the disease, no human being had ever a more strongly marked character than Swift, or, setting aside a few superficial eccentricities, one which was more thoroughly consistent throughout. It was a character, if ever there was one, which he that runs may read; and it annoys one to find a writer cast a glance at it, exert his ingenuity to distort it by a few easy antitheses, and then roughly mark it down as mad. There is of course one part of Swift's career, his relations to Stella and Vanessa, which naturally suggests some mystery; but we suspect that Scott is right in indicating a different explanation.

Before parting with Mr. Phillips, we must add that, in spite of the faults we have described, he had really very respectable abilities, and some genuine literary merits. He could tell a story straightforwardly and unaffectedly when the attraction of "our eminent historian" did not urge him to eccentricities. The best essay in these volumes is probably that upon Southey. The many admirable qualities of that exemplary man are well brought out, and the judgments expressed of his writings seem to be sound and fair. Mr. Phillips shows no great fund of knowledge though he writes like a well-educated man, and no special richness of thought or observation. Still he writes in the main a good manly English, and only blunders into nonsense at rare intervals when following Lord Macaulay too blindly, or venturing to discuss subjects which are beyond his sphere. The standard which he reaches is not a very high one; but, after all, when we look at the bombast and the sentimental twaddle of some professors of fine writing amongst our contemporaries, we may reflect that there are worse people to imitate than Lord Macaulay.

MYTHS OF MEDIEVAL POPES.*

SOME eight years ago, when he was preparing to write a work on the history of the Papacy, Dr. Döllinger gave the world the first fruits of the course of studies in which he was engaged in the shape of a bulky pamphlet, entitled Papstfabeln des Mittelalters. He explained that these "fables," nine of which are included in his treatise, however various in their origin, had so much in common that they had all at different times exercised a marked influence on the history, poetry, theology, and jurisprudence of the middle ages. And he therefore hoped that they would have an interest not only for professed theologians, but for students of mediæval history and literature generally. That hope was fully justified by the reception of the work in Germany; but it now appears for the first time in an English dress, and we cannot doubt that Mr. Plummer has done well to translate it at a time when the author's name has come to be so widely known in this country. His object in doing so is partly of course the same as that of the original publication; but he avows also a secondary motive, applying to some only of the essays, as bearing on the present crisis in the Roman Catholic Church. And we may add, from a wider point of view, that all of them alike supply an instructive illustration of the natural genesis of myths, and of the truth of the popular saying about the distinction between scotching a snake and killing it. It would indeed be difficult to find more signal testimonies to the fact that, while truth is often slow of attainment, and little valued when it is known, error once accepted dies very hard. This is strikingly exemplified with reference to one class of the fables:—

What is of importance still to consider is this:—that though these legends have been abandoned, the claims which have been made on the strength of the legends have not been abandoned. The self-condemnation and self-deposition of Marcellinus is assigned to the regions of fable; but the principle Prima sedes non judicatur a quocumque is maintained. The grant made to Silvester is allowed to be apocryphal; but the authority and territory which the popes acquired or retained on the strength of that supposed grant are still either possessed or claimed. It would not be too much to say that the bulk of what is now claimed or reclaimed by the Roman See, in the way of supremacy, infallibility, and temporal dominion, is demanded, either directly or indirectly, in virtue of documents which have been either forged or falsified. The invalidity of the Uti sedit has been exposed again and again, but possession (or vehement claim to possession), through a most unhappy prescription, still continues. "C'est une question totalement gangrenée par la fraude."

* Fables respecting the Popes of the Middle Ages. A Contribution to Ecclesiastical History, by John J. Ign. von Döllinger. Translated, with Introduction and Appendix, by Alfred Plummer, Fellow and Tutor of Trinity College, Oxford. London, Oxford, and Cambridge: Livingstone, 1871.

There are some historical problems, no doubt, as Mr. Plummer observes, which even in this critical age remain, and are perhaps likely always to remain, unsolved; but those here selected for discussion by Dr. Dollinger are no longer among the number. In some cases, as in the alleged baptism of Constantine by Silvester, the fiction looks at first sight more natural than the truth, while such strange inventions as that of Pope Joan can only commend themselves on the principle of Credo quia impossibile. But in all alike we are enabled, in the light of modern research, to lay our finger on both the process and object of the working of what Mr. Grote calls "the mythopoeic faculty." And herein lies the special interest of the investigation. We shall best consult the convenience of our readers by giving one or two specimens of Dr. Dollinger's method of unravelling these historical puzzles, which may incline them to examine the volume more fully for themselves. And we will select for the purpose the first and the last of the fables comprised in it, that of Pope Joan and of Silvester II., which, amid important differences, resemble each other closely in some minor particulars, as well as in equally exhibiting the fortuitous origin and the tough vitality of vulgar errors in history. Up to this day the story of Pope Joan is not only widely credited, or at least regarded as credible, among the ignorant, but is even used as a controversial weapon against Popery, not merely, as we were previously aware, in the florid rhetoric of English Dissenting pulpits, but also, as Dr. Dollinger has shown, by grave professors and historians. Less than thirty years ago Professor Kist wrote a book in defence of the myth; and Luden, in his History of the German People, considers it inconceivable that a tale universally believed "from the eleventh century downwards" should be untrue; while a writer in the Nouvelle Biographie Générale, published in Paris as lately as 1858, goes further, when he says, "Cette croyance a donc régné dans le monde chrétien depuis le neuvième siècle jusqu'à la Renaissance." Even Kurtz, who denies to the myth any historical value, thinks it will probably always continue to be an insoluble enigma. And it has in fact been for the first time satisfactorily solved in the volume before us.

Dr. Dollinger begins by enumerating as false or inadequate several previous explanations, all of which, moreover, share the common vice of assigning to the invention much too early a date. For, so far from being universally accepted from the ninth, or even the eleventh, century, it never assumed any definite shape before the middle of the thirteenth, when it first appears in a theological work of the Dominican Stephan de Bourbon, who quotes the contemporary chronicle of another Dominican, Jean de Mailly, four centuries after the alleged occurrence. All earlier notices are now proved to be interpolations. But the chief means of disseminating the story was the worthless Chronicle of Martinus Polonus, which attained an authority to which it had no intrinsic claim through the author's close connexion with the Papal Court, where he long filled the offices of chaplain and penitentiary. Yet Martin himself knew nothing of Pope Joan, whose name is a later interpolation in his record, first written in the margin at the bottom of the sheet, or as a gloss at the side, and thence gradually and very violently thrust into the text, somewhere between 1278 and 1312. And the interpolation was accomplished in this wise. Martin's Chronicle allowed each Pope as many lines as he had reigned years, and each page contained fifty lines, or embraced half a century. But he did not know how to fill up the eight lines appertaining to Leo IV., who reigned from 847 to 855, and accordingly left a blank space at the top of the page containing the second half of the ninth century. Here, before Benedict III., who really succeeded Leo within a few days, was introduced the story of Pope Joan. And there was a further reason for the period selected. The extreme improbability of a woman being elected Pope is explained in the legend by her great intellectual attainments, and Leo IV. happens to be the only Pope noticed by Martin as a man of remarkable learning during the four centuries from John VI. to Gregory VII. The language used by him of Leo is repeated with slight modification in the interpolated record of his alleged female successor. Other chroniclers took up the story, which was chiefly spread by the Dominicans and Franciscans, who had been alienated from the Roman Court by the policy of Boniface VIII.; and by the beginning of the fifteenth century it had become so thoroughly established, that when Huss defended his teaching at the Council of Constance by appealing to the case of "Agnes who became Pope Joan," no one thought of contradicting him; and even the learned Gerson cited the case to prove that the Church might err in matters of dogmatic fact. Pius II. (Æneas Sylvius) did indeed express some doubts, but his Ultramontane contemporary, Cardinal Torquemata, had none; and the Dominicans, who possessed the means of detecting the fraud at any time, never attempted to do so. It was not till the later half of the fifteenth century that the Greeks, to whom it would have been so serviceable a weapon of offence, heard of the story. Such, then, is the history of its growth; but how are we to account for its origin? We are first struck by the strange discrepancies in different versions of the tale. Sometimes the Pope is Agnes, sometimes Jean; at first she was altogether nameless; some writers place her date, eventually fixed, as we have seen, at 855, as late as the eleventh century; some assign Mayence, some Athens, some England, as her early home. Nor is the catastrophe itself related in the same way by all the chroniclers. According to Stephan de Bourbon, the child took place as the Pope was going in state to the Lateran palace to be crowned, and she was at once stoned by the people; but the earliest form of the narrative, as found in the interpolated

Martinus Polonus, allows her a quiet reign of more than two years before the fatal dénouement, after which she at once dies, and is buried on the spot; while Boccaccio makes her retire into private life, instead of dying or being killed. In one account the child is born while the mother is celebrating High Mass. And when we come to examine the basis of fact, it is truly amazing to discover from what a molehill the mountain has grown up. There was a statue—whether of a male or female figure is now uncertain—holding a child, in a street which, on account of its narrowness, was avoided by ecclesiastical processions; the statue, removed by Sixtus V., was metamorphosed into Pope Joan and her baby, and the Papal cortège was supposed to make a détour in order to avoid passing the scene of her public disgrace. Near this statue was a stone, really set up by a priest of Mithras in the third century, but supposed to be the tomb of the detected impostor, and the inscription on it, "Parc. Pater Patrum P.P.P.," i.e., "propria pecunia posuit," was misread into in which form it is cited by Stephan de Bourbon; and the words were afterwards explained to have been addressed to the Popes in full Consistory by the devil. Last, but not least, there were two pierced stone seats of peculiar shape at the Lateran palace, taken probably from one of the ancient public baths, where it was customary, from the time of Paschal II. in 1099, for the newly elected Pope to be placed, and the object of this ceremony was asserted to be that his sex might be publicly ascertained. Curiously enough, this is expressly declared by the Swede Lawrence Bank, who was present at the enthronement of Innocent XI. in 1644, and professes to have seen the seat, though in fact the ceremony had been abolished more than a century before. Our astonishment at the slender and wholly irrelevant data on which so portentous a superstructure has been erected may be somewhat diminished by the strange catalogue of similar mythical growths, such as that of Archbishop Ilatto and the rats, which Dr. Dollinger has appended to his criticism. But still the well-known sarcasm of Thucydides about the little trouble taken by most people to ascertain the truth has seldom been so conspicuously verified.

It is remarkable, on the other hand, as Mr. Plummer has pointed out, how much of the reputation of the Roman Church for immutable orthodoxy is due to the obscurity of her earlier rulers, and how soon the ideal halo fades from their brows when they emerge into the light of history.—

It is a coincidence worth noting that, while Liberius thus prominently steps forward from the obscurity which envelops most of his predecessors, he at the same time loses the character of unflinching orthodoxy with which (in the absence of evidence to the contrary) it is not difficult to invest them. Zephyrinus, it is true, during his long pontificate, had held and taught heterodox and contradictory doctrines respecting the Godhead, sometimes following Noetus, sometimes Sabellius. But his errors were the errors of a confused and ignorant man, ruled by the powerful and subtle mind of Callistus; and Zephyrinus left behind him no formal statement of his beliefs to discredit his office. It was reserved for Liberius to commence his pontificate by excommunicating Athanasius, and to regain it by signing the semi-Arian creed of Sirmium, and once more renouncing communion with the great champion of the creed of Nicea.

Dr. Dollinger may perhaps take some comfort, under his present sentence of excommunication, from reflecting that he suffers in company with the illustrious champion of Catholic orthodoxy fifteen centuries before.

The last of the fables here mentioned, that of Silvester II., who was supposed to have made a compact with the devil, differs from the myth of Pope Joan in having been long since consigned to general oblivion. But in several respects the two legends have a strong family likeness. Both were of strictly Roman origin; both were gradually developed; both were spread chiefly by Dominican writers; in both a Latin verse plays an important part; and both had a personal rather than a theological significance, though capable of easy adaptation to controversial purposes afterwards. The story of Silvester, who reigned from 999 to 1003, is briefly this:—

A Pope, who was held in great honour by his contemporaries, who was renowned as the most learned scholar and the most enlightened spirit of his time, whose memory remained unswayed for a century after his death, becomes gradually an object of suspicion, the calumnies about him assume larger and larger dimensions, until the papal biographers of the later middle ages represent his whole life and pontificate as a series of the most monstrous crimes. According to them, Silvester II. entered into a league with the devil, and exercised his pontifical office in the devil's service and in obedience to his will.

At first it was only insinuated that Gerbert had shown too much love for profane sciences, and thus found favour with the Emperor Otto III., who procured his elevation to the Papacy; but a century after his death Hugo of Flavigny speaks of his sinister arts (præstigia), meaning probably Court intrigues. Some years later Siegebert of Gemblours says he was addicted to the black art, and had been struck dead by Satan; while Cardinal Benno, who was a bitter enemy of Gregory VII., not only makes Gerbert first introduce the art into Rome, but relates how Satan promised him that he should not die till he had said mass in Jerusalem. The story evidently was framed to account for a man of the very humblest extraction rising by sheer force of intellectual culture to the highest dignity in Christendom, which was to the populace an implausible riddle, and to their leaders matter of bitter jealousy. And then came in the fumes but scarcely metrical line—

first said to have been composed by Gerbert himself to com-

morate his translation from the Archbishopric of Rheims to that of Ravenna, and finally to the Papacy. Then he was said to have written it beforehand as a prophecy, and finally to have received it as a promise from the devil, to whom he owed his unexampled success. Accordingly Ordericus Vitalis in 1141 states that he studied with a demon, and twenty years later William Godell represents him as doing formal homage to Satan. In this fully developed form the story is related by William of Malmesbury and a host of Dominican chroniclers, with some picturesque additions of their own. In 1390 Dietrich von Nien had the good sense to suggest the correct explanation, that the Romans hated Silvester on account of his extraordinary learning, and therefore accused him of practising devilry.

Mr. Plummer has done his work as a translator creditably, and has added an interesting introduction and some useful appendices of his own. From one of these we learn that Mosheim did his utmost to rehabilitate the story of Pope Joan for polemical purposes, and Bayle's exposure of his sophisms is sufficiently complete. Other Protestant writers have supposed her child to be Antichrist, and an eminent Dutch minister considers it immaterial whether his father was a monk or the devil. Mr. Baring Gould supposes her to be an "impersonation of the great whore of Revelation, seated on the seven hills," as expressing the prevalent idea about the Papal Court from the twelfth to the sixteenth centuries, which appears to us a rather far-fetched, and certainly superfluous, explanation. Another appendix gives the text of the famous letter despatched by Adrian IV. (Nicolas Brakespear) bestowing Ireland on our Henry II., by virtue of his inherent right to dispose of all Christian islands, and on condition of an annual tribute of one denarius for every household to the Roman exchequer. For that large class of English readers to whom German is still a sealed book, Mr. Plummer's clear and readable version of a work of considerable historical interest, and displaying all the profound and conscientious research for which the author is distinguished, will be a most valuable boon.

PORTER'S LIFE OF DR. COOKE.*

THAT Dr. Cooke was a very remarkable man is sufficiently proved by what he did. He rose by perfectly legitimate means from a low rank in life to a position of national importance, in which his opinions and actions were worth the consideration of statesmen. He undertook great enterprises, and accomplished them with astonishing success. When he was a young Presbyterian minister, the Synod of Ulster, with which he was connected, was deeply tainted with Arianism. The Arians were its most intellectual, most active, most courageous members, and Cooke had to play, in a manner adapted to the North of Ireland, the part of Athanasius contra Mundum. He expelled Arianism from the bosom of the Synod, and succeeded in enforcing tests with a strictness that had been long quite unusual. In consequence of his persevering action all candidates for the ministry were obliged to subscribe the Westminster Confession of Faith, and even the lay elders had to accept the Westminster standards. Having banished heterodoxy, Dr. Cooke proceeded to seek union. All essential differences between the Synod of Ulster and the Secession Synod had disappeared; the two bodies became one, and agreed to form for the future the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. When national education was in question Dr. Cooke obliged the Imperial Government to defer in some important particulars to the views of which he was the exponent and organ. During the Repeal movement he challenged O'Connell to a public discussion, and the agitator was glad to evade the challenge at the trifling expense of a lie. An American College conferred the degree of D.D. on the champion of evangelical truth, and Trinity College, Dublin, requested him to accept the degree of LL.D., which he earned, not only by his opposition to heterodoxy, but by his advocacy of establishments. Having been early Moderator of the Synod of Ulster, he became in due time Moderator of the General Assembly. He taught moral philosophy and harangued on party politics. For eighteen years he conducted three services every Sunday at a church in Belfast, giving at each service a lecture or sermon an hour long, without either exhausting his own strength or cloying the appetite of his congregation. He was appointed to the appropriate Professorship of Sacred Rhetoric in the Assembly's College, he became President of that College, Dean of Queen's College, Belfast, and Agent for the Regium Donum. When years, honours, and occupations were growing on him he resigned the emoluments connected with his church, and wished the congregation to elect another minister as his successor; but they were unwilling to have any one in his place, and he continued to preach to them for another twenty years. To use the words of his biographer, he was the idol of all sects of evangelical Protestants. When he died at the age of eighty he was honoured with a public funeral almost as a matter of course, and he is to stand in bronze for the edification of the people of Belfast.

Yet Dr. Cooke was not a man of a peculiarly elevated type. If he had been greater in himself his work might have been less, or at any rate the result of his labour would not have appeared so much in a rounded and symmetrical shape. There was something physical in the character of his energy; his manner of arguing was akin to boxing or wrestling; he caught hold of his man, and mauled him. His very positive opinions were formed by some reading, a little thinking, and a great deal of fighting. He seems never to have had any serious intellectual difficulties to overcome, but to have piled his stock of information with perfect ease on the top of Calvin's Institutes. Illustrations he was glad to have to any conceivable extent, but too much knowledge of a thorough kind might have been inconvenient to him. When he was no longer a young man, he kept no commentary beyond grammar and lexicon; he was guileless, so far as we know, of a single original thought, and his popularity as a speaker depended on qualities quite alien from depth and refinement. His speeches and sermons, when printed, disappointed persons who had heard and admired them; they required for their full effect an atmosphere of impassioned personality. He carried his adversaries about with him to be attacked and mangled at his pleasure. He would reply to a newspaper from the pulpit, and when O'Connell was at a distance, exclaimed, "Hear me, Mr. O'Connell! You challenged me at Belfast; I challenge you in the face of the Empire." We may be sure that if the two men had met, the Cook of the North would have crowed as loud and struck as fiercely with his spurs as the champion of Repeal. Dr. Cooke would not, like O'Connell, have condescended to falsehood and subterfuge, but he would have fought with unsparing severity, and have betrayed rather loose notions of a fair fight when hard hitting was in question. His object as a controversialist was to disable his adversary, and in his retorts he considered justice far less than effect. He once found himself opposed to a certain Mr. Brooke, whereupon he remarked, "I list the murmurs of a babbling brook." The pun raised a laugh, but scarcely disposed of the subject under discussion, which happened to be the desirableness of creeds. Mr. Brooke, who was opposed to all compulsory subscription, observed that the Bible was the work of God, and that the attempt to frame a creed was therefore a presumptuous attempt to improve a work of God. The argument was certainly not profound, and might have been answered in a legitimate manner; but Dr. Cooke preferred to give it a rough and ready treatment. "My reply is easy and self-evident," he said; "you are a work of God, and even your best friends will admit that you are capable of considerable improvement." It would be difficult to find a stronger example than this of the kind of retort which with strict propriety is called impertinent. Mr. Brooke was placed in the same category with the Bible, that he might be made the object of an unworthy personal attack; what became of the Bible under the circumstances the speaker did not stop to consider. Dr. Cooke could be, when he pleased, still more crushing and equally illogical. An American who once lauded in his presence the working of the voluntary system in the United States was asked by him whether any of the ministers who were supported by voluntary contributions resided in the Slave States. On receiving an answer in the affirmative, Dr. Cooke replied:—

Well, well! The delicacy of some ministers, like the delicacy of some appetites, is truly wonderful! Some men faint at the smell of cheese; others to the attar of roses prefer the perfume of ripe stilton. De gustibus non est disputandum; nor shall I infringe the canon. Still I may be permitted to admire that ecclesiastical gourmanderie which rejects State endowments as abhorrently as tartar-emetic, yet can swallow and digest the bones, sinews, liberties, and souls of slaves.

The attack was not only unnecessary and ungenerous, it was also unjust. Dr. Draper has observed, in his recent History of the American Civil War, that the conversion to Christianity of the African race in the Southern States has been neither superficial nor nominal, but universal and complete, and that the annals of modern missionary exertion offer no parallel success. Though a determined partisan of the North, he attributes this wonderful change to the admirable conduct of the white women of the South towards the slave population; to their active exertions as well as to their passive example; to their care in teaching the young, and administering religious consolation to the aged, sick, and dying. The Southern clergy were the closest allies of the Southern women in matters both political and ecclesiastical, and were utterly misrepresented by Dr. Cooke when described as spiritual ogres devouring the bodies, rights, and souls of men.

But we shall do in our turn an injustice to Dr. Cooke if we think of him as a hard-headed man who indulged in unfair personalities with the deliberate intention of playing on the passions and prejudices of his hearers. When he roared most terribly he was a lion upon instinct, and obeyed the same impulses that he excited. He was born in Londonderry, and though he had some blood of the English Puritans in his veins, he was more influenced by the Scottish descent of his mother. We know what the Scotch character becomes after a little seasoning in Ireland. It gains pliancy without losing much in firmness. The Ulster man is often on the surface as witty, as playful, as easily moved to laughter or anger, as much given to bulls, as any other Irishman, but below the outer covering there is a hard firm-grit that tells of another nationality. The Scotchman proper has purpose, but not wit; the Irishman proper has wit in abundance, without adding purpose; the Irish Scotchman has both purpose and wit, though his manner of combining them is often incongruous. He has taste, but it is bad taste; his rhetoric is better in quantity than in quality, and he hides his metaphors in details. Dr. Cooke belonged to the transplanted stock, and bore fruit accordingly. In an early sermon we find him describing France as something given over to the country; he probably did not see the joke, but he might just as well have described her as something else. In one of his letters he writes:—"On Thursday we had a meeting of the Bible Society in Fernoy. We had Mr. Pope. He is a delightful man. He is a Goliath trusting in the God of Israel." If in one of George Eliot's novels we had been told of a Mr. Pope who advocated the Bible Society, and was a delightful man, yet a Goliath trusting in the God of Israel, we should have congratulated the novelist on the happy audacity of her invention; but truth is often stranger than fiction, and the future Dr. Cooke had probably not the faintest notion how good a thing he had put on paper.

Dr. Porter, who has married one of Dr. Cooke's daughters, has performed the part of biographer in a very creditable manner. As his volume covers eighty eventful years, he cannot be accused of dealing at too great length with the life and times of his hero. There is more said than is wholly necessary or agreeable about thrilling eloquence, cutting irony, scathing satire, and so on, but these touches of description are probably only true to the facts. Dr. Porter's short jerky sentences contrast curiously with the rolling, surging, foaming specimens of eloquence which he quotes from the speeches of Dr. Cooke. It appears that he could not always read his father-in-law's writing, for he makes Dr. Cooke say in a letter:—

The Church of England and Ireland has sinned much, and it will suffer much. I see it in the distance. It must pass through the furnace that it may be purified. Yet in that Church there is still a world of spiritual life. Indeed, I think it contains the most spiritual men I meet. Dear Mr. Simons, of St. Paul's Cross, the holiest man I ever met, is praying for you.

Paul's Cross perished at the fire of London, and did not rise again. The true reading is St. Paul's Cray, a village in Kent, of which the church, which is somewhat remarkable for its architecture, is dedicated, we believe, not to St. Paul, but to Paulinus. The incumbent, when Dr. Cooke wrote the above-quoted letter, was the Reverend John Simons, a well-known leader of the Evangelical party, who united piety with humour. His grace before meat was "John Simons, lackest thou anything? Lord, thou knowest that I lack nothing." He was somewhat curious in eating, and occasionally combined cookery and theology in a singular manner; and his ministrations in church were not always conducted in strict conformity with the rubrics of the Church of England. But he created a very favourable impression on Dr. Cooke, and on a great many people besides. On the whole, the great Protestant leader of Belfast has been happy in his biographer. He has received in death, as in life, a great deal of high-flown praise, but his history has been told in a plain, straightforward manner, suitable to a character that did not need magnifying, and would not bear idealizing.

HAMERTON'S ETCHER'S HANDBOOK.*

THIS useful little book gives to the amateur and young student both practical knowledge and critical insight. The chapter on the "Training of an Etcher" may be taken as an example of the pleasing way Mr. Hamerton has of approaching a subject which is necessarily technical, and often encumbered with details and directions as to "plates," "grounds," "etching-needles," "printing," and "processes." We are told that, "with few exceptions, etchers of high rank have hitherto been distinguished painters to begin with." In proof of this position—which in itself implies that etching is not an easy art—may be quoted the names of Rembrandt, Dürer, Claude, and Turner, with many others. An etcher, in fact, must be an artist in knowledge and in training; his hand must be sure and swift, his eye keen and discriminative; his intellect too should have the analytic power of selecting in nature the salient traits of a picture. Mr. Hamerton, indeed, holds that an etcher, "before he uses the needle, should have studied drawing, light and shade, and composition, in some other art, either with the brush or the crayon or the pencil, in water-colour, oil, chalk, or charcoal." An etcher, we are told, must be a sketcher; he will do well also to practise pen-drawing for the sake of form and play of line; soptic work with the brush likewise is to be commended for study of light and shade, without which a plate will turn out scattered, weak, and purposeless. Etching, in fact, though frequently chosen as a pretty dilettante pastime, can be perfected only at the cost of labour and study, patience and perseverance. Mr. Hamerton says to the tiro plainly:—

You will have many a hard battle, many an hour of mortification, but let me tell you that all good etchers have passed through these ordeals, and been dirty with charcoal and oil and printing ink, and burnt their skin with acid, and spent hours and days in rubbing and scraping and correcting, often with no immediate result except utter disappointment. Correct plates a little, but if they do not come right with a reasonable amount of effort and pains, have them repolished, and etch something else upon them. You will advance better by doing fresh subjects than by wasting time in trying to cure incurables. Imitate nature in this as in everything. She does not trouble herself about curing incurables, but sends fresh, healthy babies every day into the world to replace them; she leaves the uprooted tree to rot where it lies, but all around it the twin-leaved younglings sprout from their cotyledons. Etch many plates innocently and happily, not troubling yourself in the least about what any friends or the public may think about them.

Mr. Hamerton tells us that, since the revival of etching within the last two years, etchers have found out two things—first, that the art is more difficult than it was supposed to be; and second, that its capabilities are quite beyond anything before dreamed of. The difficulties arise from what may be termed the contradiction between etching and nature. Etching depends solely on lines; whereas in nature there are, according to an accepted maxim among artists, if lines, at any rate no outlines. Hence an essential distinction as soon becomes apparent between painting with a brush and etching with a needle; the one at a single sweep graduates the tone, which the other can simulate only by reiterated lines. "The doctrine about the etched line" involves more subtle distinctions than the ordinary reader can well imagine. The principle that "every art does best when it is most itself" seems to point to the conclusion that etching best develops its capabilities when most reliant on lines. The stroke of the needle should therefore be freely outspoken, frankly confessed, "preserved as much as possible, and made the most of." The line leaves the hand without let or hindrance; the executive touch—like that of the musician with bow sweeping the strings of a violin—is responsive to the will, and resolute under impulse. "The slightest accent or deviation, even the most transient hesitation or trembling of the designer's hand, is at once registered by the sensitive line." Thus etching, though denied colour, is not cold; though restricted in modes of utterance, it is not wanting in "executive expression" and "emotion." Mr. Hamerton tells us how Rembrandt, "the greatest painter-etcher who ever lived," knew the value of executive expression—that kind of expression by which the hand, from the beginning of the work to the end of it, reveals the most delicately various phases of passing emotion, the seekings and waitings and hesitations, and the bursts of passionate ardour when the light from heaven flashes upon the soul of the artist, and his heart glows with tenfold heat, and the hand cannot be swift enough to record what the brain sees in the intensity of the inward vision.

The etcher's art, like other arts, has much which cannot be taught; the best part of it, as indicated in the above passage, is happy intuition, or what usually goes by the name of genius. Still even as to "the doctrine of lines"—a doctrine which implies subtleties that might engage the thoughts, not of artists only, but of philosophers—much may be learnt from the practice of the great etchers. A kind of conventional language has become current in the art, based on rational principles which are the outgrowth of experience. Given methods may, too, have become all the more prescriptive because etching is not so much a strict transcript as a free translation of nature. In etching we come constantly to the correspondences which subsist between things outward and inward; to confess weakness is moral strength; to work with modesty and moderation is a sign of art power; and thus the etcher's line, which in its infirmity and insufficiency is the limitation to his art, becomes his victory. There are ways by which the art, without imitating, can construe, interpret, and unfold nature. In "etching from nature" Mr. Hamerton rightly says, make it a rule to choose the kind of subjects best adapted to the art and to yourself. Distant mountains, the modelling of the human figure, present difficulties; on the other hand, the etcher can successfully deal with picturesque buildings, foregrounds exuberant in vegetative overgrowth, costumes, "a beggar's tattered dress, or the wrinkled face of an old woman." Experience, with the observation of thoughtfully manipulated plates, will teach the student how to make his lines explanatory, expressive, and descriptive. The lines of a sky will naturally be horizontal, those of an upright building necessarily perpendicular, those of a thatched roof diagonal. But, besides such leading lines of latitude and longitude, there will be scope for endless variations; when the wind ripples the waves, or bends the reeds by the river, the needle must glide sportively, freely, yet firmly. Again, the contrasted character of surfaces, whether rough as a rock or smooth as a silvery beech stem, must find response in the etcher's touch. Indeed, we know of few more exquisite delights than to watch the way in which a consummate master will play with his subject, circumvent nature, and perfect his art. Etching has about it a certain legerdemain, not the trick of the conjuror who plays with swords and eats fire, but the skill of the musician who from the pointing of his fingers evokes melody.

Mr. Hamerton does not take kindly to our English etchers. He tells us that they "are not generally to be recommended as examples of the most genuine work in the art, because, for the most part, they have set themselves to get painters' results, or engravers' results, rather than the special qualities of etching." Again, he says, "In England etchers usually finish falsely by the multiplicity of lines which have little meaning." And yet in the volume on Etching and Etchers the author uses among his illustrations masterly plates of Mr. Samuel Palmer, Mr. Cope, Mr. Frederick Taylor, and Mr. J. P. Knight. But his affections are evidently given to the French, notwithstanding the "meaningless impudences" of their manipulation. It cannot be denied that each school errs; the French through effrontery, affectation of carelessness, ostentation of sketchy incompleteness, and other assumed marks of genius. The English, on the other hand, fail through timidity, pretty painstaking, and over-finish. We incline to think, however, that the English etcher is the safer instructor of the young beginners for whom this Handbook is chiefly intended. An English etcher is usually himself a learner; by teaching others he himself learns how to spell; he is on a level with his pupils; and, what is more, he is seldom troubled by that impetuosity of genius which carries away wildly the etching-needle of certain devil-may-care French artists. The humble truth-seeking state of mind best befits the young student. But English executants fall from want of knowledge when to leave off; they belabour the plate over-much, and so, instead of transparent brilliance and sketchy suggestiveness, their work runs into dull opacity and assiduous stolidity. Mr. Hamerton, in his twenty-second chapter, on "Finish in Etching," distinguishes between opposite errors. Finish does not consist in the multitude of lines, or in other signs of great labour. On the contrary, the best finish is that which conveys most thought by fewest touches. The principles which regulate art expression and literary composition are identical; concentration is the secret of strength, brevity is the soul of wit; perspicuity, conciseness, compactness are at once the laws of thought and the grammar of language and of art. "True finish," says Mr. Hamerton, "lies in the intensity and successfulness of the mental act, and that may be proved quite as much by selection and omission as by hard labour." False finish is labour without guiding thought, the multiplication of lines without meaning, a smoothing of surface at the expense of character, an endless adding of detail with no accession of truth. Chalk drawings over which pupils slave in our Government Schools of Art err in this direction; the method of study in France has greater breadth, because more of mental purpose.

This "Handbook" will doubtless be the means of still further extending the practice of etching, an art which has peculiar charms for the amateur, and rare capabilities for the thorough professional. We have known many amateur etchers, and we hear of several dilettante or professional etching clubs. Among the latter may be named a well-trained class in the schools at South Kensington, under the direction of Mr. Richard Lane, A.R.A. The work here done is intelligent and unostentatious; the pupils study in a quiet, steady way; the studio contains plates in various stages of progress; a press throws off impressions, and thus a summary is presented of the art of etching. The subjects are taken from the neighbouring Museum; they consist of crosses, jewelled caskets, damascened blades, embroidered fabrics, &c. &c. The pupils have placed on their drawing tables the several objects selected, and then etch upon the plates, direct from the originals, the forms, the light, and the shade as seen before them. Thus the execution proceeds from an intelligent understanding of the work in hand; each line is right only when it responds to form, surface, and material. We have seen etchings thus produced by Mr. F. A. Slocombe, Mr. A. R. Bradbury, and others, which scarcely suffer under comparison with analogous works from the Louvre. Such studies are not merely feats of manipulation; they often imply keen and discriminative insight. An etching is instinct with life, while a photograph of the same object has the shadow as of death. Assuredly between amateur etchers and amateur photographers there can be little comparison, though of late photographers have arrogated to themselves the title of "artists." Etchers deserve, as they need, encouragement; they have committed themselves to a tempting and exigent art, wherein small successes are easy, but high attainments hard. Etching has been compared to the writing of poetry, in which the aspirants are many, the proficient few; or, again, the art has been likened to playing on the violin, wherein merit may range anywhere from the street fiddler up to Joachim. And yet a true student, an honest worker, can scarcely fail of his reward.

THE COINAGE AND THE MINT.*

THE Report before us adds one more to the number of those productions which appear to be the corollary of modern legislation, and, like most first-born, it is ushered into the world with more ceremony than will probably be the lot of its younger brethren when the charm of novelty has worn off. One result of the Treasury Minute of the 7th of January, 1870, as is well known, was to transfer the Mastership of the Mint to Mr. Lowe, as Chancellor of the Exchequer. Whether this change was in any way influenced by the historical fact that the Barons of the Exchequer held that office after the Conquest, we will not venture to speculate; at any rate, the practical duties, which in times past have occupied men like Sir Isaac Newton, Sir John Herschel, and Mr. Graham, have since devolved upon the Deputy. We have all the more reason for congratulating Mr. Fremantle on the careful and industrious sponsorship to his first literary infant.

The privilege of coining, we need hardly observe, is inherent in the Crown—in ossibus principum, as the old legal maxim quaintly runs. Archbishops and bishops once gladly acted as delegates; and cynics may discover some lurking attachment to filthy lucre on the part of more modern clerical dignitaries in the fact that the two chief authorities on the coinage are Archbishop Sharpe and the Rev. Rogers Ruding. We have already expressed our views on the decimal coinage; but the advocates of the present system may be well content with its practical utility, in preference to the plea of antiquity, which traces its historical existence to the Conquest, and its supposed origin to Charlemagne. A national gold coinage seems to have begun with Henry III., but foreign byzants of 10s., coined at Constantinople, and gold "florences"—so called from their Italian birthplace, and the gold prototypes of our florins—had been in use before. "In the reign of Edward III.," says Mr. Fremantle, quoting the standard authorities, "the noble, and in the reign of Edward IV. the angel and rose-noble or rial, were followed by the double rial or sovereign of Henry VII., which was to pass for 20 shillings, and by the laurel of James I., of which the current value was to be the same" (p. 5). This was the original of the guinea, first adopted by Charles II. as a 20s. piece, and which, after reaching its maximum value of 30s. under Queen Anne, was fixed at 21s. in 1718. It is probably unnecessary to remind any but doctors and lawyers that this abnormal coin was practically superseded by the sovereign in 1817. Five-pound and two-pound pieces are still nominally included in the currency, and are legal tender, though none have been coined in the present reign. Gold was constituted in 1816 the sole standard of value, and silver converted into the subsidiary currency of a token coinage, passing at its nominal instead of its real value; an arrangement which will probably form the basis of any practical system of international coinage.

The history of the silver coinage is simple. Silver halfpence and farthings appeared under Edward I., shillings under Henry VII., threepenny and sixpenny pieces under Edward VI., and half-crowns under Mary. Maundy moneys are coined annually for Royal bounty. They consist of fourpenny, twopenny, and penny-pieces, of the respective numbers of 4,569, 5,347, and 9,002, amounting in value to 158l. 4s. 4d. We are not aware whether this item forms part of Sir Charles Dilke's indictment against the Crown, but we quote the official figures because a certain amount of accuracy in such matters may appear desirable. The Bank of England is the medium which determines the supply of silver required; and apropos of Mr. Toulmin's still pending controversy, Mr. Fremantle remarks that "no obligation is imposed by the Coinage Act of 1870 upon the State to coin silver for the public;" and "the low average price of silver bullion has rendered it impossible for a long time to allow the unrestricted importation of silver into the Mint." The copper coinage came in with Charles II., who introduced also tin farthings. Lead tokens had been sanctioned by Henry VIII., and James II. treated his Irish subjects to a composition of old guns and pewter pots. The recent bronze coinage, consisting of 95 per cent. of copper, 4 per cent. of tin, and 1 per cent. of zinc, has been chiefly taken since 1861 from the stock of old copper money called in, no less than 236 tons of which still remain in store. The nominal value of this coinage is difficult to determine, from the somewhat inconvenient circumstance that, "in order that the penny might not be too large, or the halfpenny and farthing too small," the latter coins were ordered to be of greater fractional weight than their titles indicate.

The present standard of fineness for "Crown gold" dates from Charles II.; that of silver is attributed to the Saxons. Both, however, have undergone a succession of changes. The insufficiency of the supply of the precious metals to meet the growing demands of trade has in most countries subjected the coinage to rapid and repeated depreciations. These may take place, as Lord Liverpool remarked, in three different ways—(1) by diminishing the quantity or weight of the metal of a given standard, (2) by raising the nominal value of coins, (3) by increasing the quantity of alloy. It is enough to say that each method has been resorted to by the Crown in England. Such debasements almost invariably mark epochs of internal discontent, and amply explain the unpopularity of the old "noble." Their chief effect is a general unsettling of contracts; they could only answer the momentary exigency of the monarch at home, and inevitably led to an increase of the nominal taxation. It was the use of paper money in addition to our metallic currency which alone saved us from such a deterioration of the coin during the last century as took place at earlier periods of our history. Three tests are employed in assaying gold to ascertain the fineness of the metal, by which accuracy is secured at the Mint to the "minimum of one-tenth of a milliema." They are fully described by Mr. Roberts, the Chemist of the Mint; the first is by a simple addition of the requisite alloy of copper to the raw metal; the second takes place after fusion; and the coined work is subjected to a final ordeal before issued. By a seeming paradox the gold-copper alloy must be pure, and even minute particles of lead, arsenic, or antimony make the mixture brittle and unfit for coinage. Silver is assayed more simply by the ancient method of cupellation, by which the alloy is mixed with a certain quantity of lead, and the "weight of silver which resists oxidation at once indicates the amount of precious metal originally present in the assay piece" (p. 104). Usage, however, has charitably conceded a margin to Mint Masters in the shape of the "remedy of fineness," fixed at two parts per thousand for gold, and four for silver; but the extreme accuracy of the automaton weighing-machines, which appear to reject 20 per cent. of sovereigns, has restricted the "remedy of weight" to 1·6 per thousand parts. The well-known "Trial of the Pyx"—an important security while coinage was a direct source of profit—is regarded too often nowadays as an obsolete ceremonial of antiquarian interest; but the recent Coinage Act wisely estimated its possible utility by guarding it against abuse. The coins in future will be weighed singly, instead of by the pound; they are set apart and chosen for the purpose at a preliminary trial held thrice a week at the Mint from the "journey-weights"—i.e., the weight of coined work executed each journey, amounting to seven hundred and one sovereigns, delivered by the Operative Department.

For a long time the Mint performed one of the chief functions of the Bank of England, a circumstance not referred to in the historical portion of the Report. Previously to 1845 it received large quantities of bullion from private owners for security, until the practice was discontinued from the free use which Charles I. made of the deposits. Light gold coins have been taken back for re-coining.

* The Annual Report of the Deputy Master of the Mint, 1870. London, March 13, 1871.

since August 1870, in parcels of not less value than 100*l.*, on condition that they have been previously defaced, and the importer receives the full Mint rate of *q*l. 17*s.* 10*d.* per oz., without charge. Worn silver pieces are "garbled" or sorted at the Bank, and the Mint estimates include a charge of 15,000*l.* a year for the loss on their re-coining. It is satisfactory to find that the gold coinage is "not counterfeited to any serious extent in this country." The density of the metal, in fact, renders detection easy; the only successful imitations appear to be "composed of platinum, covered with an electro-deposited film of gold." The action of a galvanic battery has been found of service in the interests of fraud, and American ingenuity seems to have lately been enlisted in its aid. Silver is more easily counterfeited; the spurious coins consist of a "fusible alloy, of which lead is the principal constituent; but in order to secure the 'ring' of the counterfeits, it has been the practice to make them also of iron" (p. 26). At all events, the appointment of a professional chemist to the Mint is a source of congratulation to the public.

The Report gives an interesting peep into the Operative Department, but we have not space to follow in detail the processes of manufacture comprised in melting, rolling, cutting, annealing, blanching, and coining. We recommend this compilation as a preparatory handbook to intending visitors—whose numbers only reached 1,414 last year—since the ordinary fate of the amateur sightseer, including those gifted few who go for instruction, is usually to emerge in the same state of chaotic wonder which we can conceive to bewilder the intelligent foreigner after a visit to Woolwich Arsenal or the Elswick Manufactory. Fortunate as we are above other nations in possessing in our coinage a series of historical portraits, quantum valent, of our sovereigns, almost since the monarchy began, we certainly want a Benvenuto Cellini to teach us artistic design. Mr. Fremantle complains with reason of the poverty of invention displayed by the reverse of our modern coins; and Simon in the seventeenth century was the best engraver the Mint has yet boasted. The effigy of the King standing on a ship, which owed its origin to the naval victories gained by Edward III. over the French, was continued for two centuries and a half. The florin with its Royal coat of arms is, to say the least, an attempt at originality; though the first batch issued in 1849 strangely omitted the important D. G. Pistrucchi's lately resuscitated design of St. George and the Dragon was well known in the reign of George IV., but was discontinued in 1823, and has only recently been revived.

The operations of the Mint include the nickel coinage of Jamaica, and the bronze coinage of Jersey, besides those of Canada and Newfoundland. 24,339,621 coins in all were struck during the last year, of the aggregate value of 3,182,958*l.* 9*s.* 10*d.* Our gold coinage, which forms the staple of the currency, amounted to 2,769,732*l.*; the value of coined silver was 209,683*l.* 4*s.* 4*d.*; and that of bronze 32,793*l.* 5*s.* 11*d.* No farthings were struck last year from the "absence of demand," but without reference to the intrinsic merits of that particular coin, it is a fair question how far the demand is regulated by the supply. There is no doubt that the paucity of farthings, while adding to their disrepute, is a boon to retail tradesmen, who take care to include such small fractions in their bills, in full confidence that the liberality of their customers will square the total in their favour. Last year's gold coinage was about half the usual average of five millions, but this is explained, according to a rough balance, by the unusually high amount of 9,000,000*l.* coined in 1869, and the increased coinage of 6,500,000*l.* now in progress.

One important change in the Mint remains to be noticed, effected by the Commission in 1848, viz. the abolition of the contract system. The old Masters of the Mint, whose earliest known representative appears to have been one "Godwin Socche, of the Winchester Mint," in the reign of Henry I., were merely contractors under the Crown. Their proceedings were subject to a "Warden" and "Comptroller"; and the names of foreigners, once so frequently found in that post, would lead to the inference that our forefathers felt their inferiority in these matters to the Italians. Five "moneyers" were existing as sub-contractors in 1848, when the office was abolished. They received no salary, but a compensating allowance of 4*ol.* each per annum, under a Treasury Order made in 1793, so long as the annual coinage fell short of 500,000*l.* It is easy to understand what temptations that system offered to peculation or jobbery. Much may be said in favour of Mr. Shiel's proposal to put the work up to public competition; at any rate the contract system, according to Mr. Fremantle, seems to have led to some laxity of practice on the Continent. A salutary reform was introduced in our Mint last year by increasing the regular wages of the workmen and boys, and reducing the payments for piecework. But we have extracted enough from this Report to show the varied character of its contents. It would be a golden age for reviewers if the proverbial dryness of Blue-books were more frequently exchanged for so interesting a repertory.

TWO HISTORICAL FICTIONS.*

THE two books before us belong to the class of mild fiction written for the benefit of school-girls before they have attained the age at which downright novels are considered permissible. At the corresponding period in the life of a boy, he is provided with books of an adventurous and stirring nature, where impossible midshipmen and other heroes of equally tender years engage in terrible combats with alavers or pirates, break in houses with the skill of a professional rough-rider, shoot bears and tigers with the accuracy of a Leather-Stocking, get lost on desert islands and captured by Red Indians, run every peril that can fall to the lot of mortal man, are cheerful and slangy through it all, and on serious occasions express some sentiments of piety. A softer style of literature is supposed to suit girls—a kind of ghost of a novel, where the love-making is judiciously toned down with plenty of religious discourse. Prohibited, as they often are, from reading Shakspeare, Spenser, or the Waverley Novels, average girls are reduced to devour an incredible amount of pretty stories of this nature, and grow up believing the Hair of Rulachyffe, or the Wide, Wide World, to be the finest specimens of literature in existence. Still, great as is the youthful power of consumption, we doubt if many readers will be found capable of struggling through such a long-winded and confused narrative as the Tower of the Hawk, a laborious, but by no means successful, attempt to light up the dreariness of German fourteenth-century history.

The mainspring of the story is the honourable conduct of Frederick the Handsome, of Hapsburg, in returning of his free will to captivity, when he found himself unable to fulfil the understanding on which his captor, Louis the Bavarian, had released him. Great pains have evidently been taken to get together a set of interesting characters. Besides the noble Frederick, there is Agnes of Hungary, first the savage avenger of her murdered father, then the saintly Abbess of Koenigsfelden; John of Luxemburg, the gallant King of Bohemia, who rushed blindly to his death at Crecy; and William, or as our author is pleased to call him, Guillaume Tell, loaded with his mythical honours. The fictitious, or semi-fictitious, part of the corps dramatique consists of equally remarkable people. An idiot boy, whose brain had been affected by the Queen of Hungary's attempt to strangle him in his cradle; a murderously disposed monk whose tongue has been cut out by the Emperor Henry VII.; a good hermit of Protestant tendencies, who presents the heroine with a rosary enclosing texts of Scripture in its beads; a disguised Earl of Ulster, inheriting royal blood "from the melesion kings," are among the most prominent. Hapsburgs male and female, priests, nuns, and sundry charming young ladies and virtuous Swiss mountaineers, fill up the background. John of Luxemburg plays the part of hero, for which he is well fitted, the more so as he is a subject unhacknied by writers of fiction. To ordinary English readers, he is only known as he flashes meteor-like through the mélée of Crecy, to strike his last stroke in front and die. Every one has heard how the Blind King of Bohemia fell; but most people's acquaintance with him begins and ends with his death, and never extends to his life. In competent hands the restless hero of Luxemburg, struggling in vain to rule his wild kingdom according to his own views of right, would form a striking figure. But a certain attention to the dates of his life would be desirable. We are not sticklers for over-minute accuracy in such matters. In the time when Walter Scott could calmly admit that not only had he introduced nuns at Whitby and Tynemouth long after they had ceased to dwell there, but also at Holy Island, where they had never been at all, we perhaps got more vigorous writers than nowadays, when an historic novelist lives in fear of being taxed with inaccuracy. But there are limits to licence, and the author of the Tower of the Hawk has overpassed them without even an apology. The scene of the story is laid at the time of Frederick of Hapsburg's deliverance from captivity—that is to say, in 1325, or shortly after. John of Luxemburg is represented as having been betrothed in early youth to Frederick's daughter, Elizabeth or Bertha; but he has since been elected to the Bohemian throne, on condition of marrying the princess of that country. With this temptation before him he nevertheless remains staunch, travels in disguise through Switzerland to see his betrothed, nearly getting murdered on the road—a fate from which he is saved by the intervention of Tell—and demands the hand of Bertha, who, in the morbid spirit common among the heroines of semi-religious novels, refuses her lover in order to follow the fortunes of her father. John thereupon falls back upon his Bohemian match, while Bertha devotes herself to good works, and Frederick to the study of a copy of the Scriptures, obtained surreptitiously from "a minister of the uncorrupted Church of the Waldenses." Now, unfortunately for this romance, the real John of Luxemburg, at the time of Frederick's release, was incapacitated for playing the young lover at the Castle of Hapsburg by the fact that he and his Bohemian wife had been wedded some fifteen years. Neither was he, as he is here styled, the "yet uncrowned King of Bohemia"; for shortly after his marriage he had been consecrated and crowned with all due solemnity by the Archbishop of Mayence at Prague. This is not all. Alice, a daughter of Leopold of Hapsburg, is represented as marrying a De Courcy, Earl of Ulster, who wanders about disguised in the company of John of Luxemburg; and we have the tale of his ancestor's feats of strength in the days of King John of England, and how they were rewarded by the privilege granted to him and his representatives of remaining covered in the Sovereign's presence, a history which may all be found at greater length in the Peerage. But at the date of the Tower of the Hawk the Earldom of Ulster was held by a De Burgh, and not by a De Courcy; the hero who cleft a block of marble with a hunting-knife having in fact been the first and last Earl of his name. The author is no happier among Popes, as we are told that the Abbot of Koenigsfelden owed his first rise in life to "his melodious voice," which "attracted the notice of Gregory the Eighth." This sounds rather startling at first, as it would make the Abbot over 140 years old; but, later on, we find that the author uses Gregory VIII. as a name for the famous Pontiff Boniface VIII.

The style of the book is much on a level with the matter. "I was obliged to call the Grand Duchess," says a lady-in-waiting, who, one supposes, is not meant to be vulgar in her phraseology; and John of Luxemburg talks about our "mutual hopes of peace below and pardon above." We admit that the moral tendency of the story is unobjectionable, and that sound Protestant theology is inculcated at every opportunity. Whether, except in a Protestant novel, any nun was ever such a fool as to steal a princess's velvet dress for the purpose of decking an image of St. Clare, and to give out that this gorgeous attire had descended supernaturally from Heaven, as is done by Sister Eva, may be doubted.

Isoult Barry of Wynacote, though a tale of the same class, and of the same theological school, is a much more meritorious performance. As a rule, Miss Holt has got up the period she is writing upon only too well. Her story, she tells us, is so strictly historical that the fictitious element in it is little more than a thread on which are strung the facts she has obtained from unpublished MSS. :—

Of the "Lisle Papers" alone there are eighteen quarto volumes, and the extracts from them, which may be found in Mrs. Everett Green's Letters of Royal and Illustrious Ladies (all that have been published), would barely fill one of the eighteen. Fifteen of them, comprising the English correspondence, have been laid under contribution for this little volume.

Miss Holt deserves all honour for her industry; but she would have done better if she could have resisted the temptation, doubtless a great one, to display the full extent of the knowledge thus painfully dug out of MS. quartos, and spared us some of her many details as to parquets, palls, gowns of lion-tawny velvet, kirtles of crimson damask, and other antiquated articles of attire. A genuine letter, written by a damsel of Henry VIII.'s time, has its interest, though she discourses of nought but new gowns and her kirtles; but it does not follow that the same subjects are entertaining when worked into a story. Our authoress cannot refrain from showing that she knows what gloves cost in this year, and hose in that, and hackneys in another; and we do not find an imaginary mediæval bill more amusing than a real modern one, especially if we have to read it in Roman figures, as in the following extract:—

Gloves be now both scarce and dear. Marter Huse, which is about sending of a parcel of iij dozen thereof unto my Lady Lisle, could not buy the same under ix shillings—to wit, ij s. ij d. the dozen, which is a rare price for gloves, as I well know Mother would say an' she heard it. And Venice ribbon (which is little worth) is now iij d. the yard, and Tours ribbon may not be bought under v pence.

Indeed this folly of Roman numerals is irritating. A story is not the more life-like because the narrator is made to write "There were present M persons to see her die." On the contrary, the elaborate and painful imitation of sixteenth-century phraseology only provokes one into asking whether ordinary young ladies of that period kept diurnal books, and made such long and wise entries in them as Mistress Isoult Barry. We doubt whether the following remark upon Henry VIII.'s religious views would have been made by a quiet country-bred girl. That Isoult, after her wits had been sharpened by her residence in Courts, and in the Lord Deputy of Calais's household, might write it in conscious sarcasm is possible, supposing her to be fearless as well as shrewd; but that she should set it down in pure ignorance, at a time when she is represented as so simple that she refuses to believe there can be any place more beautiful than the village where she was born, is inconceivable:—

And, indeed, 'tis not a little hard in these times for a poor maid to know what is hersey; the orders so changeable, that what is pure truth to-day shall be rank hersey to-morrow. Only of course that is needs the true faith which it pleaseth the King's Highness for to put forward to be holden.

Mistress Isoult Barry, who makes this sharp observation, is a waiting-gentlewoman to Anne Basset, the step-daughter of Lord Lisle and one of Queen Jane Seymour's maids-of-honour. She is, so Miss Holt tells us, a real person—indeed, almost all the characters are real, and when not, the reader is solemnly warned of the fact—and she is made, as already intimated, to tell her own history by means of her diary, a device of which we are rather weary. At Court she attracts the notice of Lady Latimer, the King's future wife, who gives her Tyndale's translation of the Gospels to read. She afterwards goes to Calais as one of the household of the Lord Deputy, and there the work begun by Lady Latimer is completed by the sermons of George Buckler, alias Adam Dampier, the history of whose preaching and death may be found in Foxe's Martyrs. In this there is nothing very novel. Most Protestants have been surfeited in their youth with stories in which the hero or heroine is converted from Romanism, and are familiar with every detail of the process; so we shall only say that Miss Holt treats the subject gracefully and in good taste. To draw a religious conversion really well, to let us into the working of the convert's mind so that we should see that the change of opinion or feeling was the natural result of the mental process he or she had passed through, instead of being merely brought about because the author so willed it, would require talents such as are given to few. In many respects Isoult is well sketched. The way in which experience of the world changes her from a simple, merry girl into a grave and thoughtful woman; her childish dislike of George Buckler as a troublesome boy turning to enthusiastic worship when, after an interval of some years, she meets him as the great preacher of the new doctrines; her dread of Master John Avery, whom she has been contracted to in childhood, but has never seen, are well brought out. She has no romance about her, never thinks it possible that she can break off the advantageous marriage her parents have been at great pains to secure for her, but lives in terror of the day when John Avery shall claim his bride. Yet she feels a sense of insult when he appears to hang fire; "for truly (though I little desire his coming) it doth seem somewhat strange that he hath never so much as come to give me good day." But as John Avery turns out to be gifted with all virtues and charms, Isoult is made happy in the end. The dry business-like way in which the matter is treated is an agreeable change from the ordinary sentiment of fiction. The episode of a poor girl who marries a priest, and is subsequently separated from him by the passing of the "Six Articles," is pathetic; and the contrast between Lord Lisle, morbid, gentle, and irresolute, and his quick, shrewd, affectionate wife, who half forces him, half tricks him, into measures of which his conscience disapproves, is effectively drawn. But we protest against being required to remember all Lord Lisle's children and step-children, particularly when they begin to intermarry. No one likes having to get up a pedigree, even though it is neatly drawn out in a note at the end of the book. It should be considered that people read stories for amusement, and Isoult Barry, though not uninteresting when one knows what it is about, is too complicated in construction to be read with pleasure at first.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

IN scientific, at least as fully as in any other branch of literature, America holds her own. Whatever justice there may be in the proverbial imputations, quite as ripe in their own mouths as in those of any European detractors, which ascribe to the citizens of the Transatlantic Republic an absolute and universal devotion to the worship of the dollar, it must be borne in mind that in a country where, despite the judicious liberality of rich men who are able and willing to divert a much larger portion of their wealth to public purposes than Englishmen can commonly afford to do, endowments are comparatively few and small, there is no lack of men of ability, and even of genius, who are willing to devote their lives to the pursuit of unremunerative studies, and who deliberately prefer a small stipend as professors or scientific observers to the temptations offered by all the manifold avenues to wealth open in a yet young and uncrowded community. It is clear that the love of knowledge for its own sake, the literary and scholarly tastes which have given us the works of a Hallam, a Mackintosh, or a Coleridge, the generous enthusiasm which has rendered a Davy or a Faraday proof against all inducements to turn their talents and acquirements to pecuniary profit rather than to the pure advancement of science, are not less prevalent or less powerful in the land which has produced a Maury and a Motley. American opinion is at least as prone as our own to the encouragement and recognition of such services to mankind. While in this country there is a powerful political party which grudges the application of public money to scientific uses; while the economic school which has attained at all events a temporary and accidental preponderance among official men can hardly be induced to continue the favours accorded by a former generation to science, and is for the most part deaf to all applications for further aid in an age when the means and appliances of scientific investigation are growing daily more costly and less within the reach of the modest fortunes of private students, the publications which emanate from the official presses of the Federal, and even of the States Governments, bear witness to the liberality of the American people, as well as to the diligence and devotion of American investigators. Some of these works have direct reference to practical purposes and pecuniary results—as those, for example, which deal with the mineral and agricultural resources of the country, and particularly of the scarcely settled regions west of the Mississippi Valley; but even in these a large space is given to questions purely scientific. And other books are printed at the public expense which would seem to have little or no interest for any readers but those who have made science a subject of special study. Others, again, published at the cost of private Societies or individuals, bear witness to the existence of a by no means insignificant or confined scientific culture, and a yet more diffused interest in scientific subjects. We have before us at this moment several volumes of special value and interest, some of them executed in a style which certainly suggests a Minister "regardless of expense" to a degree which would startle an English Chancellor of the Exchequer. The manner in which the authorities of the Survey of the Fortieth Parallel have got up the third volume of their series* and its accompanying Atlas certainly implies that they thought efficiency and thoroughness of more account than economy either of time or money, and spared the nation's purse no more than their own labour. Four other volumes are to deal with the more strictly scientific aspect of the inquiry; this, the first published, but the third in order, describes the mining industry of Nevada and Colorado. The thick quarto volume which contains the letterpress is printed in such type and on such paper that the reader will be spared the necessity of stooping over the desk on which the book, far too ponderous to be held, must of necessity be laid. It contains a detailed description of the principal lodes, and of the regions in which they are found, with an equally minute account of the mining processes and the machinery employed, profusely illustrated with plates and diagrams showing every part and aspect of each apparatus. The Atlas contains plans on the scale of 100 or 300 feet to an inch of extensive mining districts. At least half of both is devoted to the great silver-bearing bed of Nevada, whose place among the geological strata is clearly indicated by a map, more aptly coloured than geological maps are wont to be. The gold-mining industry of Colorado, and the coal basin of the Green River, are the subjects of separate chapters. It is plain that the processes employed in gold and silver mining, both for the extraction of the ore and the separation of the metal, have been rapidly developed and improved of late years, though both scientific and ordinary skilled labour are still in request; and we should think that Nevada offered as good a field to the enterprise and industry of an English emigrant from the mining districts as his heart could desire.

Next to this imposing work, though of much smaller dimensions and less imposing appearance, are the Reports* of the United States Expedition sent to the Mediterranean to observe the great Solar Eclipse of December 1870. The Observatory is subordinate to the Navy Department, and it is accordingly to that department that the Report is addressed. It contains separate records of their observations, as well as an introductory paper summing up their general conclusions, from each of the observers employed; elaborate tables of the observations taken in order to determine the exact longitude of the observing stations; notices of the results obtained both with the telescope and the spectroscope, and most interesting facts and inferences with respect to the great subject of present curiosity—the corona. That the corona is a solar appendage—that is, that it does not belong either to the moon or to the terrestrial atmosphere, and that it does not lie, as the matter reflecting the zodiacal light is supposed to do, in the intermediate region between sun and earth—the American observers seem to agree. They note, however, that some of those who took sketches of it by eye were not well practised observers of such phenomena, and seem to have been dazzled and somewhat misled by its radiance. One writer infers that it is a species of solar atmosphere, perhaps composed of incandescent vapour of iron, external of course to the "prominences" or chromosphere; and some such idea seems to prevail among the rest. We should greatly like to see their rejoinder to Mr. Proctor's comment on this theory—namely, that any such atmosphere must, from its enormous weight and the vast force of gravity at the sun's surface, exercise a pressure on the lower strata (the chromosphere included) incompatible with their existence in the gaseous, perhaps even in the liquid, state, whereas we know that the chromosphere at least is gaseous.

Another sub-bureau of the Navy Department, the Hydrographic Office, translates and publishes for the public benefit, primarily of course for the information of naval officers, and to assist them in testing and verifying the theory involved, an interesting series of Papers on the Eastern and Northern Extensions of the Gulf Stream, written by several German hydrographists, and embodying accounts of recent German expeditions to the Arctic Seas, and the results of their experiments. That the Gulf Stream in particular, and the ocean currents in general, are mainly responsible for the various climates of the continents and islands washed by the Atlantic, is a doctrine pretty generally received; but the last papers we had read on the subject did not at all lead us to expect the conclusions to which the German experts have come respecting the depth, width, warmth, and extent of the Gulf Stream itself. That it carries along a sufficient body of water at a sufficient temperature to make the difference between the climate of England and the climate of Labrador is so generally assumed, that some recent suppositions as to its shallowness near our shores were a little puzzling; but it is startling to find it here set down as having a depth of several hundred fathoms, and a temperature of 66° in mid-Atlantic, as extending, with diminished depth and warmth, to and beyond the Faroe Islands, and finally circling the Pole itself. On the Polar counter current, which is supposed to cross underneath the Gulf Stream, which undoubtedly kills the northern coasts of the United States, and which the writers trace into the Equatorial Seas, as well as concerning an Antarctic current supposed to find its way into the Northern Temperate Zone, these papers contain some curious dissertations. Perhaps the suggestion which will have most interest for the general public is that the Polar current, and not the Gulf Stream, governs the direction in which there is the best chance of our one day finding an open water-way to the North Pole.

To these works we may add the "Transactions of the American Association for the Advancement of Science," at its Nineteenth Annual Meeting, held at Troy, N. Y., in August 1870. The sections are differently divided and subdivided from those of its British prototype, but the distribution of the papers is sufficiently distinct and logical, and the volume contains the usual number of essays, more or less striking and original, more or less sound and valuable. One paper, by its title, "The Discovery of the Force which originally imparted their Motion to the Stars," may be expected at least to attract curiosity—how far it will repay attentive study we cannot here pretend to decide. The Report of the Commissioner of Patents† contains a list of some 12,000 or 13,000 patents granted during the year 1870.

A curious work on Americanisms‡, by Dr. Schele de Vere, contains a large amount of really interesting and amusing information and speculation regarding the origin of a variety of phrases and words with which the English reader is gradually becoming acquainted through the popularity acquired by the writings of the American humorists of the day. Its chief defect is that it does not distinguish between words which can really be said to form a part of the spoken language of America, and those which are mere slang terms, either peculiar to the uneducated and vulgar, or to particular trades or particular districts; as also that, for want of intimacy with English as spoken at home, the writer often sets down as Americanisms words and forms of speech which are older than the American colonies, either as colloquial idioms or as provincial peculiarities. The chief merit of the book is that it diligently traces the different Americanisms to their origin; some, as "vamosé," through the Texan borderers and Californian settlers to the Spanish; some, through the Western pioneers, to the Indian, as "coyote" to burrow, to sink a small shaft; some to the Dutch of New York, as "Overslaugh," originally the overflow of a river; "cookeys" (also found in Scotland), for small cakes, and "dough-nuts." Prairie is French. Loafer is said to be German. A large number of colloquial Americanisms are of course simply the phrases of a particular craft or trade, metaphorically applied, and some of these, whose original sense was not exactly self-evident, are ingeniously traced home by Dr. de Vere. Altogether the work is worth dipping into, if not reading through; and it is rendered the more serviceable by a regular glossary of what the author considers as "cant and slang" terms at the end.

Some English readers may remember the name of the Hon. G. W. Julian as an active Radical politician of the second or third rank; but we certainly should not have supposed that his speeches§ were of sufficient importance to be collected and published during his lifetime, with a memoir of the orator, unless as a means of recalling his services to the memory of an ungrateful people. Having read some of them, we are yet more at a loss to understand that in 1871, and under the Presidency of General Grant, an American politician should desire to remind the public that in 1865 he called in terms of frantic abuse for the blood of the Confederate leaders, military as well as civil; that he reviled General Lee in language such as the Attorney-General would hardly venture to use in speaking of "the Claimant," and bitterly complained that the General who had for four years stood between the devastators of his native State and the reprisals justified by the laws of war had not, in violation of every law of honour and of civilized warfare, been hanged as a criminal.

We have on our list two biographical works of very different quality. The Life and Letters of Catherine M. Sedgwick|| is a well-edited volume, in which the materials supplied by the autobiographical recollections and profuse correspondence of the subject are pieced into a quasi-continuous whole by the introduction of as little adventitious matter as possible. As Miss Sedgwick's life was utterly uneventful, and the whole interest of the book centres in her lively, graceful, and sensible letters, this mode, defective as it would be for narrative purposes, is excellently adapted to the editor's particular objects. "A Woman's Mission"¶ is simply the story of a missionary school maintained by an American lady at Corfu, where it was perhaps as much wanted as in India or Natal, but where, as in a Christian country, the idea of a "mission" seems not a little impertinent.

Woman's Worth and Worthlessness*, by Gail Hamilton, is a curious attempt to hold the balance between the old and new ideas of woman's position by outraging both. The authoress denounces woman's suffrage, not because woman is not equal to man, but because she is infinitely superior. She ought to bear rule over the man at home, and he ought to be her supporter and agent abroad. At the same time, the writer's honesty compelling her to admit that women are disqualified from active competition with men by inferiority of intellectual as well as of physical strength, her claim to domestic supremacy somewhat conflicts with her admission that the strongest must rule, all laws to the contrary notwithstanding. In short, the book displays, from the first page to the last, an internal conflict between the instinct and experience which force on the woman the conviction of woman's weakness, and the modern temper, fostered in America by democratic education, which cannot bear to acknowledge a superior authority or an obligation of obedience. We fear the "shrieking sisterhood" are beyond the reach of Gail Hamilton's arguments; and to ordinary Englishwomen, and in ordinary English homes, she who is a preacher of peace and decency to the sexual revolutionists of America would be a firebrand of discord and rebellion.

A Russian Journey†, by Edna Dean Proctor, is chiefly occupied with brief but clear descriptions of the principal cities and buildings—"the sights," in short—of a journey which extended from St. Petersburg to Moscow, and from Moscow to Kazan, the Volga, the Euxine, and Sebastopol. The memories of the latter seem to have suggested to the writer the moral of the book—that Russia is destined to take Constantinople and reign supreme in the East as the United States in the West; and that no Power can then pretend to compete with either of them. Of the British Empire not a word is said; by that time of course it will have vanished into thin air. That the said Empire might make any difficulty about vanishing, or might interfere in the least with the realization of the Russo-American dream, Edna Proctor, who of course is well up in the Treaty of Washington, does not contemplate as an hypothesis worth even a word of refutation.

Japan in Our Day‡ is intended to form part of an illustrated library of travel, at once instructive and entertaining; consequently it is neither quite one thing nor quite another. It is not the record of a journey; it is not the description of a country taken from several travellers; it is not a history; but it is a sort of mixture of all three. On such a plan no writer could construct a really readable book; but Mr. Bayard Taylor has done his best.

Border Reminiscences§ is the misleading title given to a collection of anecdotes of West Point, of military life, of pioneering, of Indian adventure—a medley, in short, of amusing recollections such as a man who has roughed it in all parts of the Union, and mingled in all the society of the frontiers, could not but be able to produce in his old age for the benefit of his grandchildren. If the stories are not very good, they are quite good enough to provoke a laugh; and no one who takes up the volume will regret spending a leisure half-hour over its pages.

We have several collections of poems, none of them without merit. Bret Harte's East and West|| contains, we think, few or no pieces which were not contained in volumes already mentioned in these columns. Mr. Leland's¶ poems are such as might be expected from those who have read both his translations and his Breitmann Ballads; they have neither all the flavour which the latter derive from their peculiar dialect, nor all the power which in the former belongs to the original; but they are far from being weak or worthless. The Last Knight** is a translation from the German into a species of loose and somewhat jingling ballad metre, but by no means wanting in spirit or vivacity.

THE ALABAMA ARBITRATION.

SOME weeks ago it was announced that the Lord Chief Justice had visited Geneva for the purpose of meeting his colleagues, in order that the Tribunal of Arbitration might be formally constituted. Little attention was paid to a statement that the English Government had proposed to waive the ceremonial proceeding, but that the Americans, in the exercise of their undoubted right, required that all proceedings should be taken in regular order. It is perhaps not hypercritical to suspect that a practical motive may have induced the Government of the United States to insist on the strict observance of form. It may perhaps have been foreseen that the publication of the American Case would cause a revulsion of feeling, and that the English Government would hesitate before proceeding with a reference to the Tribunal of claims which, as the Americans well knew, had been supposed by the English Commissioners to have been finally abandoned. It really matters little by what means the formation of the Tribunal has been completed, since no objection could be made to the competence of the arbitrators before they were ready to commence their duties. By the First Article of the Treaty "all the said claims growing out of acts committed by the aforesaid vessels" (i.e. by the Alabama and other vessels which escaped from British ports), "and generically known as the Alabama claims, shall be referred to a Tribunal of Arbitration." It is clear that the English Government is not bound under this head to refer to the Tribunal claims on account of the Sumter or other vessels which never escaped from British ports. According to received rules of interpretation, the mention in the First Article of specific claims would overrule or interpret the vague language of the Second Article, which directs the Arbitrators "to examine and decide all questions that shall be laid before them on the part of the Government of Her Britannic Majesty and the United States respectively"; but the American counsel will necessarily contend that the reference is open and unlimited, and that the word "questions" in the Second Article is equivalent to the word "claims" in the First Article. In municipal litigation a difference as to the scope of a submission to arbitration would be determined in the last resort, not by the arbitrators themselves, but by some Court of competent jurisdiction. An arbitration between sovereign Powers is controlled by no superior tribunal, and consequently either Government must exercise its own discretion as to withdrawing from the arbitration in preference to acquiescing in any usurpation of authority. Many years ago the settlement of the boundary line between Maine and Canada was referred by both Governments to the King of the Netherlands, who, in excess of his powers, awarded an arbitrary line as a compromise, instead of adjudicating on the evidence. The American Government consequently rejected the award, and the English Government acquiesced in their decision.

The extreme carelessness with which the Treaty was drawn renders the position of the Government in the highest degree embarrassing. If the Treaty is construed together with the Protocols which record the proceedings of the High Commission, it is clear that the arbitrators are precluded from entertaining a claim for indirect damages. The demand was expressly waived on the part of the American Government, in the hope of attaining the amicable settlement which was immediately afterwards effected by the English tender of an apology, and by the admission of a new standard of international right to be retrospectively applied. The American Commissioners must have been fully aware that their English colleagues concluded the Treaty on the distinct understanding that the only question submitted to the Tribunal was the liability of England for the actual damage done to American merchants and shipowners by the operations of certain cruisers; yet it is probable that the Government of the United States will rely on the vague and elastic terms of the Treaty itself, to the exclusion of all preliminary documents. Under the Second Article, if it is considered without reference to the First, any claim whatever, even if it had not reference either to the Confederate cruisers or to the civil war, might be preferred by the American agents before the Tribunal at Geneva; and the audacious demand for reimbursement of the cost of two or three campaigns, although it involves a grievous violation of good faith, is not inconsistent with the letter of the clause. The English Commissioners, or rather the Government from which they received daily instructions, consented almost without protest to waive all counter-claims for the damage caused by the open connivance of the American authorities at the Fenian invasions of Canada. Mr. GLADSTONE and Lord GRANVILLE perhaps wished to offer even excessive facilities for the recognition of the genuine Alabama claims, in the well-founded belief that nothing less than the concession of their right to compensation would thoroughly satisfy the Americans. The excessive anxiety of the English Government to conciliate the other party to the controversy, though it has been proved by the result to have been impolitic, was substantially approved by the great majority of English politicians. Until the publication of the abstract of the American Statement, not even the severest critics of Lord KIRON's diplomacy suspected the possibility of the sharp practice which has been rendered possible by extreme friendliness and unfounded confidence. Although it may be deemed impossible that any body of jurists should admit the extravagant and dishonest claims which have astonished Europe, England cannot afford a second time to incur by negligence a risk of miscarriage. If the highest legal authorities hold that the scope of the Treaty is governed by the Protocols of the High Commission, the English Government ought to insist on the rejection of the claim for indirect damages before the commencement of the arbitration. The American Statement recites, as a material document in the litigation, the Protocol which is fatal to the claim. If the objection to the admission of the claim for indirect damages is taken and overruled, the English arbitrator and counsel will probably withdraw from further proceedings. Successive English Governments have done their utmost to satisfy American feeling by the REVERDY JOHNSON Treaty and by the Treaty of Washington. Every advance that they have made has been rewarded by a fresh outbreak of animosity; and the American Statement is more deliberately offensive than Mr. SUMNER's speech, Mr. Fish's despatch, or General GRANT's first Message to Congress. Any one of these public declarations might have served as the preamble to a declaration of war; and now Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS and his colleagues have done their worst. If the Americans wish to express still more hostile feelings, they must discontinue verbal controversy; and perhaps, instead of permitting Fenian incursions, they will themselves undertake an unprovoked invasion of Canada.

One consideration of the highest importance has perhaps been overlooked in the just irritation caused by the publication of the American Statement. The policy of the Government of the United States has not yet been sanctioned by public opinion. The abstract of the claim appeared in the New York Times a few days before Christmas, and it was not till the end of the first week in January that its contents were generally known in England. The extravagance of the claim was immediately noted by writers who were not committed to approval of the Treaty, but several days elapsed before the majority of English journalists could persuade themselves that the American Government was in the right. The comments on the Treaty and the claim which have since followed in rapid succession must by this time have been generally read in the United States; but the impression produced there is not yet known; and it may be confidently asserted that Americans in general will be as much surprised as Englishmen. For three weeks after the publication of the summary of claims the subject scarcely attracted the slightest notice in the United States, although the New York Times accurately described the Statement with its violent invectives as an indictment against the English Government. The Nation soon afterwards expressed an opinion, which may perhaps be generally entertained, that the enormous demands of the United States would probably result in an award of a few millions of dollars. It would not be in the nature of an American journalist to express disapproval of an exaggerated claim, or to comprehend that there was any impropriety in a series of violent attacks on the English Government and nation. A Correspondent of the Times has stated that in a recent visit to the United States he had not met with a single American who contemplated as possible the claim for indirect damages which forms the sting of the American demand. It is certain that in America, as in England, the Treaty and the reference to arbitration were regarded as an amicable settlement of all causes of difference; nor can it have been thought that friendly feeling would be compatible with the exaction of a penalty representing the cost of one or two years of the civil war. Thus far the people of the United States are not responsible for the hostile proceedings of their Government; but there is too much reason to fear that, when they understand the nature and extent of the claim, they will adopt a policy which must necessarily render the Treaty abortive. The President, Mr. HAMILTON FISH, Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS, and Mr. CALLEB CUSHING cannot but have supposed that acrimonious declamation and litigious extortion would be agreeable to their countrymen. If it had been their object to attain an establishment of friendly relations with England, the professed object of the Treaty, they would not have indulged in the offensive charges and imputations which form the bulk of the Statement. Even if they had in good faith thought that the terms of reference included a claim for indirect damages, it would have been easy to use courteous and temperate language. The tone and temper of the Statement preclude the supposition that it can have been framed in an amicable spirit.

It is satisfactory to observe that, for the first time in eleven years, all parties in England are absolutely of one mind on the merits of a controversy with America. The most enthusiastic supporters of the cause of the North during the Civil War, the most devoted admirers of Republican institutions, concur in the determination to resist pretensions which can only have been advanced for the purposes of injury and insult. Only a few politicians are perhaps aware how entirely the English Government had the best of the controversy from the days of Lord RUSSELL and Mr. ADAMS downwards. Even if the arbitration proceeds, it will be difficult for the Tribunal to find a pretext for awarding damages on account of the escape of the Alabama. The persistent assertions and the resolute diplomacy of the American Government have probably persuaded the majority of Englishmen that the duties of neutrality were at least imperfectly discharged; yet it is absolutely certain that the Government of the day intended in good faith to maintain perfect impartiality between the belligerents. The concessions which were involved in the Treaty of Washington were dictated by the anxiety of the Government and the nation to obliterate the unfriendly feelings which had their origin or their pretext in the conduct of England during the war. The American Government has since repeatedly taken credit to itself for obtaining an apology and a retrospective admission of new doctrines of international law; and, having received full consideration for modifying its hostile demeanour, it now takes advantage of the careless good faith of the English representatives to combine vituperation, hitherto unprecedented in diplomacy, with a claim for a tribute equal in amount to the demands of Germany against France.

THE TREATY OF COMMERCE.

THE French Assembly has reached the point at which it becomes necessary that it should consider whether it will authorise the Government to put an end to the Treaty of Commerce with England. The Commission selected to report on the matter was composed of members ten of whom were known to be in favour of the Treaty being terminated, while only five were in favour of its being kept in force.

The Report, therefore, as might have been expected, was in harmony with the known opinions of the majority of the Commission. Their views are also those of the majority of the Assembly; and the Assembly has shown, by decisive votes against preliminary proposals to let the matter stand over for the present, that it will give the Government the authority for which it so vehemently implores. For many months negotiations have been going on between the English and French Governments as to the Treaty, and both the Commission and the Assembly were very anxious to have a copy of the correspondence laid before them; but the Government declared that it was unusual and impolitic to publish correspondence belonging to negotiations still going on. Sufficient, however, was revealed by the Government to make it intelligible what has been the line adopted by the English Cabinet; and the course taken has been, so far as we can gather, a very proper one. The Treaty can be terminated by notice given a twelvemonth before the time of expiry; and some doubt existed whether this notice must be given before the 4th of February, the date of the Treaty. The English Government, willing to avoid all difficulties, has declared that it will accept a year's notice at whatever date it may be given. Then, again, the Treaty has always been regarded as having a political and social bearing as well as an economical bearing, and as conducing to promote good feeling and constant intercourse between the two nations. The English Government has stated that, if France chooses to terminate the Treaty, England will recognize this as solely caused by the financial difficulties of France, and not as betokening any diminution of cordiality towards this country. Further, the English Government, it may be inferred, has, without giving any distinct and embarrassing pledge, allowed it to be understood that we shall not commence a new war of tariffs; or, in other words, that we shall not preclude ourselves from enjoying the imports from France that we want because France will not take as much from us as she has done. The whole basis of Free Trade, a basis which we may almost say no nation but England really comprehends, is that the way to make a nation rich is to get as many foreign products as it can for its consumption or use at the very lowest cost possible. It would be Englishmen, not Frenchmen, who would suffer most if we made our claret dear. Therefore the French are quite welcome to terminate the Treaty if they think fit, although we should have cause to regret that they should do so; for it would check the increasing intercourse between the two nations, it would throw France out of the rank of progressive countries, and it would, no doubt, inflict considerable injury on some important branches of English trade. The effect of the new commercial policy of France, will be, we believe, to increase English trade on the whole, for in the markets of the world the languor of Protectionist countries cannot compete with the energy of Free-Trade countries, and we should probably gain most of what France lost. But still there are branches of English trade which would, temporarily at least, suffer from the abrogation of the French Treaty; and this would be a subject of regret, although not perhaps of so much regret as the spectacle of a great nation like France setting itself to go back from the paths of economical wisdom.

But even the majority of the Assembly does not like the notion of the Treaty being wholly terminated. It would like to have it recast, so that it might exist and produce its good effects, while it allowed France to put on exactly what tariffs she pleased. M. THIERS and M. FOYER-QUETIER honestly avow that they hate Treaties of Commerce altogether. They think the policy of the Emperor in concluding such treaties entirely wrong, and positively injurious to France. But these extreme opinions are shared avowedly by very few. Most of those who are now engaged in voting that notice shall be given to terminate the Treaty think, or at least adopt the language of those who think, that the Treaty has been very beneficial. They even say that Free Trade is a good thing in itself, but that France is in great difficulties, and must be placed in a position to do freely what she thinks best for herself. The Government itself tries to borrow this style of talking as well as it can, and vows that it is not from any bias towards the system of Protection that it thinks that the Treaty should be terminated. M. THIERS does not, of course, for a moment conceal that he is as staunch a Protectionist as ever; but he says that he is willing to waive the abstract superiority of Protection, and to take his stand on the ground on which the majority of the Assembly resolve to stand—that the termination of the Treaty is necessary to give France fiscal freedom. The Commission selected to draw up the Report was strongly pressed by the Free-Trade minority in its ranks to insert a definite statement that the termination of the Treaty was not to carry with it a return to Protection. But it would not go so far as this. All it would do was to advise that the Assembly should state, in adopting the proposed Bill, that it did so without wishing to return to the fiscal system obtaining in France before 1866. This means very little, and was meant to mean very little. The Assembly in fact is quite at home about Protection. It is not capable of asking itself what it means by a modification of tariffs which shall not involve a return to Protection. The Government stated that it has repeatedly asked the English Government whether it will consent to modify the Treaty instead of having it terminated; and the English Government has always declared itself, and still declares itself, quite willing to discuss any proposals for a modification of the Treaty which do not involve a return to Protection in France. But there are no modifications on which the French Government sets any value which do not involve such a return. Directly the vague term "modification" is translated into plain language, it is found to mean schemes for protecting certain favoured kinds of French produce. The recent debate on the taxation of raw materials amply showed this. One of the chief objects on which M. THIERS had most set his heart was an import duty on wool, and he wanted this mainly because he declared that, without a differential duty in their favour, French wool-growers could not compete with the wool-growers of English colonies. If he had chosen for mere revenue purposes to tax French wool and foreign wool alike, the Treaty of Commerce would have interposed no obstacle. It is quite open to France to do this to-morrow if she pleases. But this would not at all have suited him. It is true it would have been of much more use to the French Treasury, in the interests of which the whole subject of the Treaty is supposed to be discussed; but it would have given no bonus to French wool-growers, and therefore the Government wishes the Treaty modified, so as to let the French wool-growers have their bonus; and the Assembly in its innocence pronounces such modifications highly desirable, and not involving any approach whatever to Protection.

But the real tendency of the majority of the Assembly may be judged otherwise than by looking in what direction M. THIERS is guiding their bewildered minds and feeble purposes. They have just done something all by themselves, and a pretty piece of work it is that they have done. They have passed, in the shape of a Bill for regulating maritime commerce, one of the most ineffectual and silly measures ever passed by a legislative body. It cannot come into more than the most limited operation for five years, as during that time France is bound to Austria, and through Austria to nations that can claim to stand on the same footing with her, by treaties creating reciprocal freedom of navigation. While the Bill was being passed so many exemptions were introduced that, even if it could operate, little revenue would be derived from it. The object of raising a revenue, which is supposed to be the only object the Assembly has in view in its discussions on the Budget, was avowedly left out of consideration. It was allowed that the Treasury would receive no benefit from the Bill worthy of notice; but it was said that the Bill was necessary to keep up the French navy. The French cannot build iron ships, it was urged, and they cannot build wooden ships so cheaply as foreigners can. What then is to become of the French navy if the commercial fleet, which ought to be its nursery, goes to decay? An officer of high rank in the navy pointed out that what the Bill really came to was an attempt at this period of the nineteenth century to get the carrying trade of France done by wooden sailing-ships, while other nations did their carrying trade by iron steamers. A member of the Ministry allowed that this was so, but argued in reply that this would be such a wonderful advantage to the French navy that patriotism bade every other consideration sink out of sight. While the Treaties now existing endure, it was conceded that the Bill could not do much good or harm; but the Government suggested that, as England was willing, if France wished it, to see its Treaty of Commerce of 1860 terminated, a successful appeal might be soon made to Austria and other nations to follow the example of England. It certainly sounds odd that France should go to Austria and ask Austria to give up a pecuniary benefit, not that France may be helped in its difficulties, but that a nursery for the French navy may be artificially created. The experience of the United States certainly supplies almost incontestable ground for believing that, if Austria agreed to terminate its treaty, and the French Government had its way and protected its commercial fleet of France as much as it wished, this nursery of the navy would wither away altogether. But this only leads to Austria being invited to sponsor an advantageous treaty in order that France may effect an object with which Austria has nothing to do, by a system of legislation which would produce exactly the reverse of what it was intended to produce. The views of the majority of the Assembly are not, however, to be judged only by the general scope of the Bill. One of the exemptions which it allowed is equally indicative. Some one pointed out that one effect of the Bill would be to increase the price of guano by twenty francs a ton. The majority was seized with instant horror. Agriculturists would not like this at all, and agriculturists have to be considered as no other class has. The special friends of the peasants found themselves on the brink of putting the peasants on the level of other consumers of imports, and they recoiled at once from so terrible an abyss. They voted that guano should come in without paying any tax whatever. Fertilis minimus agricola. The peasants, and the peasants alone, are to be favoured in a Bill for regulating maritime commerce; and yet the Assembly half believes that it does not wish to see the English Treaty terminated, but only wishes to see it modified without any return to Protection.

THE COMING SESSION.

THE plan of the Session, so far as the Government can control it, is definite and unambitious. Mr. BAUX lately informed a deputation that the error of bringing forward too many measures would not be repeated. This time Temple Bar will be passable, if only there is no traffic coming the other way. The Ballot Bill, with the improvements announced by Lord HARTINGTON, ought not to occupy any considerable time. The opponents of secret voting may fairly submit to the majority, finding any consolation which they may require in the knowledge that they have given the Government an opportunity of modifying or completing an imperfect measure. If the House of Lords desires to relieve the Ministry from its numerous difficulties, it cannot do better than once more reject a Bill which it will ultimately have to pass. Mr. GLADSTONE and his colleagues would wish for nothing better than to rest their continuance in office on the issue whether the Lords are to determine the mode of electing the House of Commons. Mr. DIXON of the Birmingham League is also Mr. DIXON of the Association for Reforming the House of Lords, and the malcontents in general would engage in the struggle with the House of Lords as heartily as the mutineers of the Nore returned to their allegiance when they were hurried off to fight the battle of Camperdown. It is more probable that the Ballot will be practically disposed of when the Bill leaves the House of Commons; and the QUEEN'S Speech has been anticipated by the official declaration that the Scotch Education Bill and the Mines Regulation Bill are to follow next in order. The fourth place must be assigned to Mr. STANSFELD'S Local Government Bill, which will be favourably considered if its provisions are confined to the primary object of sanitary improvement. Arbitrary redistribution of taxation would produce strong opposition; and it may be hoped that Mr. STANSFELD will abstain from reproducing Mr. GOSCHEN'S cooked statistics as a pretext for unjust legislation. The Mines Regulation Bill, though it will be introduced by the HOME SECRETARY, also relates to a sanitary question. There can be but one opinion as to the expediency of protecting colliers from foul air and firedamp, and the House will have every disposition to support a well-considered measure. The inquiries of Committees and Commissions have supplied some of the materials for legislation, and the Government can command all the professional assistance which may be necessary.

In ordinary times a Scotch Education Bill would excite but little interest among the majority of members. The wholesome tradition of leaving Scotch matters to the management of Scotch members has given equal satisfaction on both sides of the Border. No reasonable Englishman pretends to understand questions which are even remotely connected with the ecclesiastical concerns of the Presbyterian Church and its numerous schismatic offshoots. From the singular coincidence of diversities of opinion on Church government with unity of theological doctrine, it has happened that sects which are habitually engaged among themselves in internecine warfare are always ready to combine against the rest of the world. It may be collected from the LORD ADVOCATE'S recent speech that the Government has, against its inclination, recognized the force of some affluence of the kind in preparing the Scotch Education Bill. Any oppression of a minority which may be contemplated by the Ministers and their Scotch supporters would have been easily effected if the English and Irish members could have been induced to adopt their usual policy of abstention; but at present the question of education is in a combustible state, and an explosion commencing in any part of the United Kingdom will inevitably spread. The militant English Nonconformists have already announced their intention of attacking the Government on the Scotch Bill; and on the other side the Irish will eagerly join in the fray; nor can the remainder of the House of Commons be expected to shrink from the discussion. The faction which lately assembled at Manchester probably overrates its strength, for it was remarkable that only half-a-dozen obscure members of Parliament could be induced to take part in the Conference. The narrow bigotry and the arrogant intolerance of the speakers will not have rendered their cause more popular; but the more turbulent Dissenting ministers command a certain number of votes in almost every borough; and a not inconsiderable section in the House itself is pledged to attempt the repeal of some important parts of the English Education Bill. The Government is undoubtedly alarmed at the threatened secession; nor can it at present foresee the results of the contest which will arise on the discussion of the Scotch Education Bill. Attempts will be made at the same time to extort a disclosure of the Ministerial policy with respect to Ireland; and it may happen that a casual combination of hostile parties will precipitate a crisis. It would be impossible to obtain a majority in support of any common theory of education to be indiscriminately applied to all parts of the kingdom. A more skilful tactician than Mr. GLADSTONE might perhaps contrive to play off his various adversaries against one another, and especially to make the North and South, like Austria and France, shoot in each other's mouth. The Dissenters and Secularists will not be well advised if they insist on forcing their favourite nostrum on the unwilling Scotch. It is not impossible that the casual struggle on a point of secondary importance may accelerate the impending disruption of the Liberal party. The adhesion of some of the moderate Liberals of the last general election to the Conservative candidate in the Northern Division of the West Riding is significant of a coming change; but cautious politicians would deprecate the separate organization of an extreme party with Mr. GLADSTONE for its probable leader.

It is unfortunate that the first debates of the Session can scarcely fail to damage Mr. GLADSTONE and one of his principal colleagues. On no question has there been greater unanimity of judgment than on the impropriety of the judicial appointment which has been so fully discussed. Mr. GLADSTONE has further gone out of his way to advertise his contempt for Acts of Parliament by his wanton disregard of recent legislation in his disposal of the living of Ewelme. It was expressly provided that the benefice should be held by a Master of Arts of Oxford; and Mr. GLADSTONE, who would probably otherwise have given the preferment, according to his usual practice, to a member of his own election Committee, capriciously selected a Cambridge graduate who had merely gone through the form of being admitted ad eundem at Oxford. The object was perhaps rather to enjoy the intellectual gratification of a quibble than to evade the law; but when such eccentric tastes are repeatedly indulged, Parliament cannot be expected to approve of a virtual illegality merely on the ground of its sophistical ingenuity. The question is nevertheless one on which a vote may be justifiably given on party grounds; and it would be better to elicit a general condemnation of the appointment than to force a division. In the House of Lords it is thought that personal respect and regard for the LORD CHANCELLOR will prevent the adoption of a hostile vote; but the over-zealous admirers who defend his occasional abuse of patronage on the ground of his superhuman virtue are not the most judicious of advocates. All the world admits that the LORD CHANCELLOR is a good man, but he would be none the worse if he were to make good appointments of County Court Judges. Cynical suggestions that conscious virtue is sometimes unscrupulous ought not to be too literally construed.

It is at present impossible to determine whether the Ministers will be compelled to defend their conduct in a far graver matter. The uneasiness which has been caused by the American indictment against the English nation will unavoidably be expressed in the form of anxious and urgent inquiries. The Ministers might indeed contend that their conduct in concluding the Treaty of Washington was virtually approved by Parliament, because it was never discussed or criticized; but the Executive Government is properly held responsible for its own miscarriages, even though the House of Commons or the country may have shared its errors of judgment. With blameable carelessness, politicians of all parties looked only to the assumed fact of a reconciliation with America, instead of examining the terms of the Treaty to discover the loopholes which were left for the sharp practice of a litigious adversary. The disregard of the wholesome rule of employing in confidential transactions only the partisans of the Government was not sufficiently noted at the time. If Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE had not been invited to take part in the Commission, or if he had refused the appointment, the regular Opposition would perhaps have exercised its proper function of watching and criticizing the Ministerial negotiations. Mr. DISRAELI, having formally assented to the acceptance of the office by his colleague, became indirectly a party to the Treaty; and Mr. GLADSTONE, though it is but fair to acquit him of any selfish purpose in the arrangement, finds himself relieved from the necessity of defending the Commission in the House of Commons. When the question is raised, any demand for reserve or postponement which may be preferred by the Ministers must in common prudence, and in accordance with Parliamentary custom, be conceded; but it is not impossible that the Government itself may wish to be strengthened in resistance to extravagant pretensions by an expression of Parliamentary opinion. One of the minor consequences of the threatening attitude of the American Government will be the difficulty or impossibility of adjusting the Budget. The great prosperity of the past year may fail to produce any fiscal relief, if it becomes necessary either to pay a heavy fine for peace or to prepare resistance to insufferable aggression. Mr. BRUCE may repair past miscarriages by the easy process of leaving the publicans alone; but Mr. LOWE may probably have been anxious to retrieve the exceptional discredit of last year's financial arrangements. Mr. GOSCHEN will perhaps undertake to correct the administrative anarchy which has been disclosed by the Megara Commission. On the whole, the prospects of the Ministers are not remarkably cheerful, but some of the obstacles which apparently await them may possibly dissolve as the Session advances.

FRANCE.

THE forced reconciliation between M. THIERS and the Assembly has had the effect which forced reconciliations usually have. The Assembly feels even less love for the PRESIDENT than before, and the PRESIDENT shows no disposition to treat the Assembly with greater consideration. If M. THIERS had wished to make his peace with the Chamber, there was an obvious means of doing so open to him. He might have hinted to M. POUYER-QUERTIER that the proper course for a Finance Minister whose Budget has been rejected is to retire from office. It is true that M. POUYER-QUERTIER's plans were really the plans of M. THIERS, but here was an opportunity of making a show of deference to the majority, by assuming for the moment that constitutional impersonality to which they are anxious to see the PRESIDENT reduced. Without abandoning the essentials of his scheme of taxation, M. THIERS might have made it less offensive by committing the further exposition of it to a Minister who was understood to accept it from financial necessity rather than from choice. The resolution adopted by the Assembly to try every other means of raising money before resorting to a tax on raw materials gave just the opening which such a Minister might have turned to account. He must be a very poor financier who cannot convince a Committee that this or that proposal is inadmissible when he has himself to supply it with the means of forming a judgment. M. THIERS's view of his own position seems to resemble that of a lion-tamer who thinks it prudent to rule his beasts by fear, even when to all appearance he could make them do what he wishes by coaxing. What the wire whip and the heated irons are to the one, M. POUYER-QUERTIER is to the other.

There are signs, however, that the submission of the Assembly is not without its limits. There has been some serious talk among the majority of appointing a Vice-President of the Republic, and overtures have even been made to Marshal MACMAHON in order to ascertain whether he will accept the post. The wish to give the proposed second place in the State to a soldier is sufficiently significant of the purpose with which the new office would be created. The Assembly is very much afraid of letting M. THIERS go, but its alarm has nothing in common with any real desire to retain him. It dislikes him because, in spite of many faults of character, he is at bottom a Parliamentary statesman. He will bring a great deal of illegitimate pressure to bear on the representatives of the nation, but he wishes, notwithstanding, to rule through them, not without them. In the eyes of a part, at all events, of the majority this desire seems altogether out of place. For more than twenty years they have been disused to Parliamentary government, and even before that time the traditions with which Parliamentary government is associated are for the most part traditions of weakness. The deputies of the Right do not trouble themselves about political philosophy, or the injury which a nation sustains from the loss of the habits and instincts which only self-government can give. But they do care about being protected against revolution by some one stronger than themselves. They have no special love probably of military despotism, and for this reason, among others, they were glad when the work which had heretofore been done by the NAPOLEONS was taken in hand by a civilian. But M. THIERS has an unfortunate preference for Republican forms, and his reactionary tendencies take for the most part a financial direction. It is true he maintains the state of siege here and there, but he does it as though it were only an exceptional expedient to be resorted to in extreme cases. He does not deny that he wishes to see the Assembly back in Paris, which to many of the Deputies seems a desire almost murderous in its malignity. Those and similar faults have pretty well disgusted them with M. THIERS, and yet so long as he is without any recognized lieutenant it is impossible to send him about his business. M. THIERS has told a deputation that, in the event of his resigning, his patriotism will ensure his continuance in office until such time as his successor is appointed, or that, supposing him to be unable to do this, the supreme executive authority will be worthily exercised by M. GRÉVY. But this picture of a future which they are more than half inclined to turn into a present has no charms for the Right. It is one thing to elect a soldier to reign over them, and another to provide for his exercising temporary powers by a devolution of authority which has been arranged for beforehand. The former might be impracticable without a revolution, the latter would give rise to no excitement, and if it had been acquiesced in during M. THIERS's term of office could hardly be repudiated after his retirement. The thought of having M. GRÉVY for a protector is even more distasteful to them than the thought of retaining M. THIERS. M. GRÉVY's Republicanism is of a more decided hue than the PRESIDENT's, and his character, as displayed in the chair of the Assembly, is certainly not less resolute. The appointment of a Vice-President would give them precisely the opportunity they are seeking. They could put a creature of their own into the post, and thus make the retirement of M. THIERS a positive gain to the Monarchical cause, instead of, as now, the signal for an outbreak of anarchy. It is one of the few bits of good fortune that have fallen to the share of France of late years that Marshal MACMAHON seems to be superior to personal ambition. He is in a position which might well tempt a man to play the part of a MONK or a BONAPARTE. If he would consent to be the first Vice-President, the post would probably be at once created for his occupation. But Marshal MACMAHON steadily refuses to take any part in politics, and though something has been said about appointing another General, there is no certainty that any one except the Commander-in-Chief will possess that influence over the army which would constitute the best weapon at the Vice-President's disposal. For the most part when a nation or a party wish to sell themselves into slavery they have no difficulty in finding a purchaser. Marshal MACMAHON's determination not to make a tool of the majority, even when the majority ask to be made a tool of, will probably be fatal to the scheme.

The fresh manifesto from the Count of CHAMBORD makes it additionally difficult to obtain a Monarchical Government, except by something in the nature of a coup d'état. Orleanists of the school of M. GUIZOT may admit the hopelessness of a fusion between the older and younger branches, and acquiesce in the conclusion that there is no Government possible but a Republic. There are other Orleanists, however, who have become so, not from political conviction, but simply from a belief that in no other way are they so likely to secure a Government which will keep down Communism, Socialism, and every other heresy which makes light of the sacred institution of property. To the accomplishment of these hopes a fusion seems indispensable. The French Conservatives are a strong party numerically, but they are greatly divided on the question what form their Conservatism shall take. While the Empire lived and prospered they were willing for the most part to give it a general support. But now that the Empire is gone they have no similar agreement as to what shall be put in its place. Legitimist, Orleanist, Imperialist Restorations have each their advocates, and there are times when the mutual hatred of the three parties almost overpowers their common hatred of the Republic. Still a union between any two of them would render the cause of the third hopeless, and would thus in all probability win over the majority of its adherents. Such a solution is impossible, except between the Legitimists and the Orleanists; between them it might be possible if it were not for the Count of CHAMBORD. So long as he will neither abdicate in favour of the Count of PARIS nor consent to a Legitimist restoration conducted on Orleanist principles, there seems but a small chance that either of them will be King of France. The history of the Monarchy of July shows that the only hope for Royalty lies in the perfect accord of its natural supporters. Legitimists and Orleanists working together might possibly build up a throne strong enough to hold its own against the Republic. The announcement that the Count of CHAMBORD will not desert his subjects, coupled with his refusal to become the legitimate King of a Revolution, has again scattered all these expectations. The next Sovereign of France may be legitimate or illegitimate as regards his relationship to CHARLES X., but unless the French people are suddenly converted to a belief in divine right, he must be equally the King of a Revolution.

THE DISSENTERS AND THE EDUCATION ACT.

THE Nonconformist Conference has transferred the controversies arising out of the Education Act from the sphere of amendment to that of absolute repeal. It is not meant, of course, that, if the Dissenters carry their point, no part of the existing Act will be reproduced in its successor. There are some features which are necessarily common to all legislation on the subject, and which would be equally included in an Education Bill whether the draughtsman were Mr. DIXON or Archdeacon DENISON. But though many of the details might remain after the programme of the Education League had been adopted as the basis of legislation, the principles of the Act would have undergone a decisive revolution. The object of the educational policy with which Mr. FORSTER's name was identified was, first, to clear the Denominational system of everything that can operate as a practical grievance to Dissenters; secondly, to make the fullest possible use of the Denominational system thus modified in the promotion of primary education; and, thirdly, to provide a machinery by which the defects incident to any voluntary system may be corrected and supplied. This in brief is the aim of the Education Act of 1870. It is open to any one to say that this aim is a mischievous one, and that the Act must give place to one designed to answer a totally different purpose. But it is not open to any one to say with candour that the introduction of changes having for their object the exclusion of the Denominational system from all recognized share in the work of primary education is merely such an amendment of the Act as the Government may fairly concede by way of compromise. Unless Denominationalism and Secularism are identical, there is a radical difference between the Education Act as it stands and the Education Act as the League and the Nonconformist Conference wish to see it. What the Government is really asked to do is to make a clean sweep of the educational legislation of 1870, and to take up the question afresh with a determination to settle it finally in the exclusive interest of one of the parties in the controversy. Such a measure as that suggested by the Education League and the Nonconformist Conference is in no sense a development or an adaptation of the existing Act. It is a measure founded on a different principle, conceived in a different spirit, and aiming at a different result.

It will be quite reasonable to refuse to entertain this demand on the ground that the question is for the present outside the range of legitimate discussion. The arguments now advanced by the Secularists were all fully considered during the progress of the Education Bill through the House of Commons. The purport and object of the Bill was as well understood then as it is now. It was urged as a reason for rejecting it that it would do the very thing for doing which Parliament is now asked to repeal it. Is there any reason to think that the opinion of the country has undergone such a change as to make it expedient that the case should be re-heard? We know of none. It is true that the Secularist party has since been reinforced by the unsectarian party. But it by no means follows that the strength of the coalition is to be estimated by a sum in simple addition. The unsectarian party comprised a large number of persons who were genuinely anxious that religion should be taught, and who believed that it was possible to teach it without going beyond the ground occupied in common by every denomination of Christians. As a basis of national education this system would have been theoretically imperfect, since it would have taken no account of Jews or Unitarians; but as neither of these bodies is in a position to make any heavy demands upon the State in the matter of elementary schools, it might have served the purpose if the English people had included neither Roman Catholics nor High Churchmen. The presence of these two forms of belief was fatal to the unsectarian theory, and has led more than anything else to its abandonment by the very men who formerly constituted themselves its prophets. But though unsectarianism has passed away as a formal organization, the particular form of religious sentiment on which it was founded may not have passed away with it; and, so far as it remains, it may lead unsectarians to prefer Denominationalism to Secularism, provided that the Denominational spirit can be subjected to sufficient restrictions. No one has attempted to show that, in this last respect, the Education Act is a failure; and if it had been in the power of the Nonconformist Conference to adduce evidence on this point, it may be taken as absolutely certain that they would not have let the opportunity slip. There is great room for doubt, therefore, whether the moderate unsectarians will not now be inclined to make common cause with the moderate Denominationalists. In that case there can be no such revolution in public opinion as to necessitate that the Education question should be reopened within eighteen months after a settlement which was intended to dispose of it for years to come.

This, in all probability, will be the line adopted by the Government. They may declare themselves willing to introduce any modifications and additions of detail which experience has shown to be desirable, while announcing their intention to stand by the main lines on which the Act was framed. Since the close of the Conference two subordinate members of the Administration have stated their views on this question, and the tenor of both their speeches points to this conclusion. Mr. KNATCHBULL-HUGHESSEN looks at the matter as an avowed Churchman. Mr. WINTERBOTHAM approaches it as an ardent Dissenter. The one thinks the settlement arrived at in 1870 ought to be retained for its own sake; the other thinks the country would be well rid of it. But both agree that it must be retained. Mr. WINTERBOTHAM does not profess to have become a convert, since taking office, to the merits of the measure which he opposed as an independent member. On the contrary, he declares that the opinions he expressed in 1870 are the opinions he holds in 1872. His objections to the Denominational system are unaltered; he still deprecates the decision with regard to it to which the Government came. But he urges the Nonconformists to bear in mind that to prevent an Act being passed is one thing, and to repeal an Act after it is passed is another. In the former task, had the Dissenters listened to him, they would, he thinks, have succeeded. In the latter, his "deliberate judgment" is that they must fail. It is natural that Mr. WINTERBOTHAM should believe that if in 1870 his efforts had been seconded by all who have since come round to his views, they would not have been so barren of results. It is not easy to see, however, how the victory which Mr. WINTERBOTHAM looks back to as within the reach of a united Nonconformist opposition could have been gained. It requires but little knowledge of Mr. FORSTER to feel sure that no amount of pressure on the part of the Secularists would have induced him materially to alter the Bill; and unless the Government had been deserted by the whole body of its supporters, it would still have triumphed by the aid of Conservative votes. But it is quite certain that it would not have been deserted by all, or nearly all, its supporters. Mr. KNATCHBULL-HUGHESSEN is a sufficiently good Liberal, but he tells his constituents plainly that though, to avoid a schism in the Liberal party, he would go great lengths in yielding points of detail, he will not give up Denominational education. "Party," he says, "is after all a combination of men to carry on the government of the country on certain principles; and if agreement upon principles ceases to exist, there is no legitimate or honourable tie by which a party can be held together." The Nonconformists at Manchester seemed to suppose that it was only by their secession that the Liberal party could be broken up. They forget that it is at least equally possible that it should be broken up by the secession of the opposite wing of the party. The action of certain Liberals in the North-West Riding is an example of this danger, and though Mr. ACKROYD may, in the opinion of Radical members, have no claim to be called a Liberal, he has been a unit in the Ministerial majority, and his defection counts in a division as much as that of anybody else. Mr. KNATCHBULL-HUGHESSEN is quite right in assuming that, if the old distinction between Liberal and Conservative is done away with, and a new division into Church and anti-Church put in its place, there will be a considerable redistribution of party strength. There is a third element in the calculation which Mr. WINTERBOTHAM does not take into account in his estimate of what might have happened if the Dissenters had known their own minds as clearly two years ago as they seem to do now. It is one of their chief complaints against the Education Act that in many parishes it leaves the education of the people to be carried out by voluntary agency. Is it not possible that, if it had been proposed to supersede this voluntary agency by schools provided by School Boards, and maintained out of school rates, the ratepayers would have had a word to say on the question? There are so many things which can only be paid for by taxation that it would hardly have been prudent to resort to this mode of raising money to meet expenses which are at present borne, and borne cheerfully, by private persons. The question of rating was not raised, at least to any serious purpose, in the debates on the Education Bill. But if there had been any question between accepting the Ministerial Bill and superseding it by one which should throw on the ratepayers of England the whole burden now sustained by the subscribers to voluntary schools, a good many Liberal members might have found that their re-election absolutely depended on their being true to the Government measure. A sense of the value of education must be far more generally diffused than it is at present before there will be a universal willingness to pay the price of education.

MR. CHILDERS AND THE ADMIRALTY.

MR. CHILDERS has had, as a witness before the Megara Commission, an opportunity which must have been very welcome to him of explaining and justifying the reforms he initiated when he was First Lord of the Admiralty. He could throw little or no light on the loss of the Megara, but the whole question of navy administration had come before the Commission, and on this question he was competent and eager to speak. He first gave an account of the system of administration which he found existing when he took office, and no one can doubt that he succeeded perfectly in showing that this system was a very bad system. He may have been right or wrong in deciding that the Admiralty shall not be governed by a Board, but the form of government by a Board which he found in existence was thoroughly bad. If an Admiralty Board is to be praised, or pronounced desirable or necessary, it must be some imaginary, possible, and future Board, and not such a Board as Mr. CHILDERS displaced. The Board did not in the least produce unity of action, or good administration, or practical economy, or superintendence of subordinates, or intercommunication of knowledge between departments. If letters are lost now, and reports are sent in to be forgotten even by their authors, much worse was the case before the CHILDERS period. Instructions to dockyards, for example, were sent sometimes by the Board, sometimes by the Controller acting under the Board, and sometimes by the Controller without his consulting the Board at all. At the dockyards there was no one who could be called the manager of the work of the yard. In the Controller's Office there was a most extraordinary division. Business relating to the construction of a ship was transacted in Whitehall, and business as to the engines of the same ship was transacted in New Street, and the two offices kept corresponding with each other as if they were independent bodies. The then Secretary was very unlike the present Secretary; for he thought his system perfect; but Mr. CHILDERS could not quite agree with him, for there was no registration of letters inwards, and there was a very cumbersome system of copying, as copying-machines were unknown at Whitehall, and no use was made of the printing-press. Still less was there any control over the expenditure of the navy; and with regard to this point Mr. CHILDERS related some somewhat personal to himself, which furnished a curious illustration of how very far it is a matter of accident whether reforms of the most obvious value are practically made under the English system of government. In 1864 Mr. CHILDERS was Junior Lord, and he then pointed out to his chief, the Duke of Somerset, that each of the great spending departments of the navy was placed under the superintendence of a naval officer of high rank, without any direct check on the part of the civilian authority. The Duke was struck with the truth of this statement, and asked Mr. Childers to take the post of Financial Lord, in which capacity he was to have a check over all the spending departments. Mr. Childers accepted the offer, but before he completed his arrangements he received promotion, left the Admiralty, and became Financial Secretary. What happened? From that day to the time when he was made First Lord no attempt had been made by the Duke of Somerset or any one else to appoint a Financial Lord at all, or to provide any machinery by which there should be a check on the expenditure.

Mr. Childers has been much attacked and abused, and it is not to be supposed that he could have, shown himself so quick and eager a reformer without making some mistakes which laid him open, not only to captious, but to calm and impartial, criticism. But it ought never to be forgotten that, when he came into power, he found three great incontestable evils in the administration of the navy, two of which he cured, and the third of which he at least set himself to cure with great boldness and activity. In the first place, the business of the Admiralty was conducted in buildings widely apart from each other, so that a great waste of time, and of money for unnecessary clerks, was caused; and not only the departments did not know what each other did, but different branches of the same department treated each other as if one had been placed in London and another in Edinburgh. Mr. Childers swept away this nuisance altogether, and got the whole administration under the same roof at Whitehall. Secondly, there was no control on behalf of the taxpayers over the expenditure of the navy, although Mr. Childers had shown nearly five years before, to the satisfaction of the responsible head of the Admiralty, that such a control was absolutely necessary to prevent a waste of public money. Mr. Childers swept away this abuse also. He appointed a Financial Lord, and gave him such power as has resulted, in Mr. Childers's opinion, in making the control of this official over the expenditure effectual. Lastly, he found that no one knew whose business it was to do anything, that there was an incessant collision of authority, and that a great amount of necessary business was never done at all. This was an abuse far more difficult to deal with, for it was on a far larger scale, and it was deeply rooted in the whole traditions of the office, and in the habits of every official he had to employ. But he set to work vigorously, made some sweeping changes, good or bad, and would perhaps have succeeded in setting up a new system of a useful and practical kind, when unfortunately his health broke down after he had been two years in office; and apparently since Christmas 1876 everything has remained at the Admiralty as it was then, and all has been in the exact state of confusion, transfusion, new activity, old obstruction, and general chaos in which it was at the moment when Mr. Childers was arrested in his labours by illness.

Mr. Childers was not satisfied with defending the changes he had made in the administration of the navy, but justified himself against other charges that had been made against him. More particularly he was anxious to establish that he had never been on the side of false economy, and that he had been very active in selling ships. He had, as he stated, been in favour of building ships of a larger and more expensive class than had been recommended to him. He first got an Act of Parliament passed repealing a cumbrous and obsolete statute, by which the sale of ships had been obstructed; and then he sold no less than sixty-nine ships. It is due to him that the defence he made on these heads should be stated, but it is only with his reforms in administration that we are now concerned. The root of all the mischief that pervaded the administration, such as he found it, lay, in his opinion, in the existence of a Board, which wasted an infinity of time and destroyed responsibility by dividing it. He accordingly broke up the Board for all practical purposes, although he still retained it for two special objects—for the promulgation of general rules and orders, and for the punishment of grave offences. He substituted a system by which heads of departments should each preside over their own sphere, and be responsible only to him. The main good of a Board, that of an interchange of information between administrators, he considered he sufficiently secured by having all the minutes of proceedings in each department printed daily, and copies given to the heads of all departments. When a matter came before him which concerned the head of more than one department, he called all whom it concerned into consultation with him. When there was a difference of opinion between the head of a department and a subordinate in that department, he heard what both had to say and made up his mind which was right. He looked as much as possible the number of branches into which the departments were subdivided, and brought each branch as much as possible under the control of the head of the department. He placed the dockyards under the administration of a civil manager, and tried to make the civil manager responsible for everything in the dockyard to which he was attached. He endeavoured to free the professional officers in the dockyards from the duty of filling up useless forms and making useless returns, which previously had absorbed a great portion of their time. He made some faint approach to a reform of the Secretariat, and to introducing order and method in the receipt, despatch, and registration of correspondence; and he appointed a Committee to report on the changes that would be desirable to effect this object. But before he could make any real progress in this direction his health broke down, and his whole scheme was only just beginning to be established when he had to retire from office. He is obliged to own that he could not get on so fast or so well as he could have wished. He could not put new wine into old bottles. The officials, and especially the minor officials, with whom he had to work, did not understand what he was at, and the silent obstruction of discontented, apprehensive, and irritated minor officials is an enormous obstacle in the way of ardent Ministerial reformers. He was obliged to allow a latitude to those under him which was practically inconsistent with the efficiency of his system. He was asked, for example, by the Commissioners whether he could account for the Megara being placed in 1870 in the First Reserve instead of the Fourth. He answered that, in his opinion, the real reason was, although the officials who gave the order may not now be alive to the fact, that they were influenced by what was happening at the time. The war between France and Germany had then recently broken out, and it was not certain but that England might be dragged into it and want every ship she had got. Application had also been made to take a party of astronomers in a Government vessel to see an eclipse, and the Admiralty was anxious to oblige these men of science if it could. In their eagerness to have ships ready under these circumstances, Captain LUARD and his colleagues put the Megara into the First Reserve, never thinking or heeding whether she was really fit to go to sea. This may be the true explanation or not, but at any rate it is Mr. Childers's explanation, and it shows in what a very incomplete shape his new system had been worked out, if indeed it does not point to a defect in this system itself. Here were certain officials, in the lightness of their hearts and under the pressure of excitement, stating that a ship was ready to go to sea, as to the readiness of which they knew nothing; and the only check on them was the control of a political civilian who might be in office one day and out of it the next. Scarcely anything that Mr. Childers undertook to reform was worse than the possibility of such a thing happening as in this case did happen, according to his own views of what is probable, under his own administration, and after he had been nearly two years in office.

It is perhaps unfair to pronounce any opinion as to what the value of Mr. Childers's work of reform would have been had it been in his power to complete what he began. So undoubted are the mischiefs with which he did away, and so energetic and bold was his method of reform, that he must always be remembered as a star in the not very shining order of navy administrators. But, after all that has been said in his favour has been said, there were, no doubt, weak points in the system he introduced. In the first place, it appears to be a system which, in the usual course of Parliamentary changes of the First Lord of the Admiralty, can scarcely be expected to be continued. It is now nearly a year since Mr. Goschen replaced Mr. Childers, and yet neither Mr. Childers nor any one else speaks as if there had been any First Lord of the Admiralty to carry on Mr. Childers's reforms since he himself ceased to be able to guide them. What Mr. Childers left undone is undone still. Where he stopped, there everything has stopped since he left. This may not be at all the fault of his successor. Mr. Goschen knew nothing whatever about the navy a year ago, and it is something if in a year's time he has learnt to understand how far Mr. Childers had got, without himself trying to go further. It is a great risk in any scheme of reform if its author completely overlooks the fact that, after he has pulled everything down, and before he has begun to build more than a very little up again, his place may, in the curious shiftings of Parliamentary government, be any day filled by a stranger who cannot comprehend in the least what he was doing. In the next place, although a Board as administering the navy may have been a bad thing, there is considerable doubt whether Mr. CHILDERS was right in placing the fortunes of every officer of the navy at the discretion of a single official. He chose the best man he could find; and probably, if there was to be one man in such a position, no better choice could have been made than Sir SYDNEY DACRES. But Sir SYDNEY DACRES himself candidly told the Megara Commissioners that he thought that the feeling of the profession was that it would rather not be at the mercy of one man, and that it preferred a Board—that is, more than one person—to the government of Sir SYDNEY DACRES. But the real blot of Mr. CHILDERS's scheme is, we think, a more serious one. He totally omitted to provide for the existence in the office of any high permanent official knowing the history of the office, able to connect the threads of departmental business, and exercising a general superintendence over the whole system of administration. It was not only that he forgot that he himself was mortal and liable to the afflictions of mortality, but he could not see that, to meet the evils of the constant shiftings caused by Parliamentary government, there must be in every department of State a man of experience and authority, who, if he is the servant, is still more the guide of each successive Parliamentary chief. Mr. CHILDERS found an official in the system of navy administration whom he might have made to fulfil such a purpose, but it never seems to have occurred to him that the Permanent Secretary either was, or ought to be, anything more than a clerk of superior intelligence and amiability. If Mr. LUSHINGTON took a humble view of his duties, he had certainly learnt the lesson of humility from his late master. The Permanent Secretary may or may not have been the official who ought to have been made to occupy the post; but the success and solidity of Mr. CHILDERS's whole plan of reform would have been, we think, far greater if he had realized that there was such a post to be occupied, and if he had secured the services of some one who might have kept things in the right groove, whatever Minister or Government might be in office.

LANCASHIRE CONSERVATIVES AND BIRMINGHAM RADICALS.

TWO meetings held in the early part of the present week may claim the credit of having between them exhausted the political commonplaces of the day. At Manchester the "Lancashire Union of Conservative and Constitutional Associations" assembled "to denounce the policy of the present Government, and to declare the unswerving loyalty of Lancashire to the QUEEN and Constitution." The Town Hall of Birmingham at the same time listened to speeches from Mr. DIXON, Mr. MUNTZ, and several of their more ardent local supporters. If the Government is afraid of hard words, its members may perhaps have been alarmed at the strong language which was applied to its proceedings both by Conservatives and Liberals; but it must be a consoling reflection that, to satisfy either class of assailants, Mr. GLADSTONE must necessarily provide the other with additional materials for invective. The working-men who nominally support the Conservative Associations of Lancashire judiciously left the greater part of the speaking to the members of Parliament who attended their gathering. Mr. ALGERNON EGERTON ventured on the modest prophecy that within a few years there would be a Conservative Government, with Mr. DISRAELI at its head. Mr. GLADSTONE would perhaps not object to compound for a few years of office, and Mr. DISRAELI can scarcely afford to wait so long. A more sanguine opponent of the present Ministry might without rashness anticipate a temporary triumph at an earlier date; but Mr. EGERTON probably thinks, with many prudent politicians, that the Opposition will do more good by checking the Government than by driving it from office. The Liberal majority, though it is partially disorganized, is thus far not seriously impaired. The malcontents may possibly indulge their feelings of resentment by placing the Government in a minority on some incidental question; but Mr. DISRAELI and his allies, if they profited by the opportunity to form a Ministry, would immediately find themselves confronted by a compact mass of reconciled Liberals. The next general election will show whether the reaction which has undoubtedly commenced will counteract the inevitable tendency of the Ballot. In the Northern Division of the West Riding several moderate Liberals have detached themselves from their party, and joined the Conservative ranks; but it is not yet known whether they will be followed by any considerable proportion of the constituency. The experiment of a coalition would have been more advantageously tried if Mr. RIPLEY or Colonel ARROYD had started as Liberal candidates with the support of the Conservative party. The general distrust of Mr. GLADSTONE has not yet assumed the form of confidence in Mr. DISRAELI.

The Conservatives of Lancashire and the Radicals of Birmingham, by an undesigned coincidence, used nearly similar language in discussing the character of Mr. LOWE. One of the few working-class speakers at Manchester asserted that, if the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER had carried his original Budget, he would "have sent to a premature grave lots of the 'unfortunate matchmakers.'" "It was not until a terrible row took place in the House of Commons that Mr. LOWE went back and altered his Budget. If he had been an honourable statesman, what would his course have been? He would either have stood or fallen by his Budget." Perhaps Mr. LOWE may be excused for not insisting on a point of honour which would have caused the death of "lots of 'unfortunate matchmakers.'" A zealous Birmingham Liberal includes in a denunciation of the same character of another malignant conspirator among the present Ministers. "The match tax was just what might have been expected from such a man as ROBERT LOWE, and that abomination, the Trade Association and Criminal Law Act, from the hard-hearted BRUCE." It was candidly admitted that Mr. GLADSTONE is a "first-class workman," but he was warned that unless he found better men to work with him than the hard-hearted BRUCE and the hard-headed LOWE he would lose his place. Another speaker indulged in a philosophical analysis of the causes of Mr. LOWE's delinquencies. "He was so lost in learning that he seemed 'insensible to the difference between right and wrong.'" The orator thought it a great mistake to believe that a man was fitted to be a statesman because he was a scholar. "There were men who knew a great deal about what were called 'the classics and other abominations, about times past and dead men and dead languages, and seemed unconscious of the doings and the wants of the world in which they lived.'" No more interesting illustration of the continuity of English life and history can be furnished than the use, after an interval of centuries, of the same words by persons in the same stage of culture to express the same characteristic sentiments. As Mr. LOWE is accused of familiarity with "the classics and other abominations," Lord SAY was beheaded by JACK CADE, not only because he had caused printing to be used, and, contrary to the King, his crown and dignity, had built a paper mill, but more especially on the charge that he had "men about him that usually talk of a noun and a verb, and such abominable words as no Christian ear can endure to hear." There is too much reason to fear that Mr. LOWE has in his time consorted with men who use these abominable words. There is also much reason to fear that Mr. GLADSTONE himself will not be able or willing to divest himself of his knowledge of the Iliad and "other abominations." The Birmingham brawlers probably fancy that they are themselves anxious to promote education; but they cherish a characteristic jealousy of its results. Resolutions were passed at Birmingham for the extension of the suffrage, the redistribution of seats, and the abolition of the minority clause. The more complete supremacy of those who are free from the abomination of knowledge is not perhaps the most urgent want of England in the present day.

Mr. DIXON and Mr. MUNTZ, both of them men of ability and of independent judgment, may perhaps have been slightly ashamed of the simple utterances of their humbler partisans. Mr. DIXON had the courage to express his dissent from the scheme of a Permissive Bill; and it is not a little remarkable that he spoke of the great lawyers as the proper persons to introduce Bills for Law Reform in the House of Lords. Since the failure of the agitation which Mr. DIXON attempted in the autumn, he seems to have abandoned or adjourned his schemes for the reform of the House of Lords; but he is still uncompromising and intolerant on the question of education. Professed believers in popular majorities are often the first to appeal from the decision of Parliament or of the country. According to Mr. DIXON, the Government has deviated from the path of religious equality, and "he thought that if this policy were persevered in—and he thought it would be—it would end in the great Liberal party being shattered to atoms." A small and compact body of Radicals and Nonconformists is to render a Liberal Government impossible if the just claims of the Nonconformists are disregarded. There is every reason to believe that the mass of the people are opposed to the project of secular education which has lately been adopted by Mr. DIXON and his party; and it is probable that a vote on the question taken among Liberal members of Parliament would produce the same result. But a section of a Ministerial party has often the means of holding the balance of power; and the substitution of a sectarian issue for the questions which have hitherto divided parties may easily tend to break up the Government. The contention of those who threaten to secede is in substance that every Government, or every Liberal Government, ought to defer to the most extreme class of its supporters on all points to which they may attach vital importance. Sir ROBERT PEEL and Lord PALMERSTON led the House of Commons and governed the country with conspicuous success on an entirely opposite principle. If Mr. DIXON and his friends overthrow the Government, they are prepared to offer the fiercest opposition to the only Ministry which could take its place; and they hope that, after a rapid succession of changes, a resolute and disciplined minority will finally attain its objects by forming a coalition with some one of the contending factions. The same mode of conducting political contests has rendered Parliamentary government a failure in almost all Continental countries, and especially in Spain. When no statesman or party can count on a permanent majority, the representative system leads to chronic feebleness and anarchy.

Mr. MUNTZ, while he agreed with his colleague on political questions in general, offered as his special contribution to the unity of the Ministerial party a vigorous attack on the Act for the abolition of purchase in the army. He was, it seems, willing to compensate the officers for the regulation prices which they have paid; but he was shocked at the extravagance and immorality of recognizing in the form of compensation the practice of over-regulation payments, though they have been perfectly well known to successive Governments and to every member of Parliament. Mr. MUNTZ's objection to the Act seems, however, more fundamental; for he is shocked at the prospective jobbery of commissions by the Secretary of War and the Commander-in-Chief, and he holds that it is "fearful to contemplate the men who will be appointed as officers in the army under the system which is now introduced." Of the Megara Mr. MUNTZ neatly remarks that the loss of every soul on board would have been attributed to the act of God, whereas it would really have been caused by the wickedness of men. Not that the FIRST LORD of the ADMIRALTY is, like the hard-hearted BRUCE, more than ordinarily wicked. On the contrary, Mr. MUNTZ believes that Mr. GOSCHEN and Mr. CARDWELL are honest and intelligent men; but unluckily they know nothing of the business of the departments over which they respectively preside. There is always something respectable in a thoroughgoing grumbler, especially as he is often in the right. It appears not to occur to Mr. MUNTZ that he ought to suggest some alternative method of administering the army and navy. Mr. CARDWELL knows at least as much of military affairs as any civilian in England, and probably Mr. MUNTZ would not wish to vest his powers exclusively in the professional authorities at the Horse Guards. Criticism of this kind is on the whole innocuous, if it is too frequently useless, and it has luckily no tendency to dissolve parties into petty factions. Mr. MUNTZ's discontent will probably evaporate in words, for no military measure of importance is likely to be introduced in the ensuing Session. On the Ballot, which has now become inevitable, neither Mr. DIXON nor Mr. MUNTZ was inclined to be eloquent; and for similar reasons the Ballot was passed over almost without notice by the Conservative meeting at Manchester. It is not easy to understand why Birmingham, with its three ultra-Liberal members, should trouble itself greatly about the Minority clause, unless it is influenced by a loyal devotion to Mr. BUTLER. The arguments against the contrivance were forcible, and perhaps conclusive; but as the experiment has been adopted, it may as well be tried a little longer.

CONVOCAION AND THE RITUAL COMMISSION.

THE Archbishop of CANTERBURY has announced that the Convocation of his province will be asked in the Session which begins on the 7th of February to consider the recommendations contained in the Fourth Report of the Ritual Commission, with a view to their being embodied in a Bill and laid before Parliament. Ordinarily speaking, such a notice as this would be a natural and almost necessary complement to the labours of a Royal Commission. It is not so in the present case. The Ritual Commission was appointed in the first instance to answer a purpose which had already passed away before its sittings were concluded. It was designed to shelve the vestment controversy; and by leaving the rubric, round which the strife had raged, unaltered and unexplained in its final recension of the Ritual directions in the Book of Common Prayer, it certainly did its best to fulfil the end of its creation. But before the Fourth Report appeared the question had been carried into the Law Courts, so that there would have been no real inconsistency if the heads of the Church had allowed the subsidiary suggestions of the Commission to be forgotten. It will be said in reply to this that the recommendations of the Fourth Report are good in themselves, and that it is on this ground, and not merely because they have been put forward by a Royal Commission, that it has been decided to take the first step towards incorporating them into the Prayer-Book. There is no need to dispute that the proposed alterations are improvements. The object of the present article is to show that, whether they be improvements or not, the risks involved in giving effect to them are greater than can be incurred with prudence.

The propriety, or rather the necessity, of consulting Convocation before asking Parliament to legislate on matters of this kind is beyond dispute. In the present condition of ecclesiastical parties, any changes in the Prayer-Book not sanctioned by Convocation would be treated as of no effect in at least half the churches in England. Nothing could be gained by reforms which, if allowed to remain inoperative, would bring the Legislature into contempt, and if enforced would make a formidable schism inevitable. Still the reference to Convocation does not altogether dispose of the purely ecclesiastical difficulty. The constitution of Convocation is not such as would long be endured if it were to assume the functions of a working ecclesiastical Parliament. The immense preponderance of dignitaries and capital proctors over the representatives of the parochial clergy is quite unsuited to the present circumstances of the Church of England, and the separation of work between the two provinces may easily give rise to great practical inconvenience. If Convocation is to have a hand in reforming the Prayer-Book, those who maintain that it ought first to be itself reformed will certainly have reason on their side. Yet it would be difficult to reconstruct Convocation without provoking a controversy as to the claim of the laity to sit in Church Synods, and it would be still more difficult to settle that question satisfactorily without reviewing the ecclesiastical position of the Crown and of the Parliament. It is a consideration of smaller importance, but one not wholly to be overlooked, that the clergy may fairly urge that before Convocation is asked to sanction the recommendations of the Ritual Commission they ought to have an opportunity of sending up fresh representatives. At the last ecclesiastical election the Irish Church was not disestablished, and the Judicial Committee had not begun its raid upon Ritualism. It is quite possible that the complexion of the Lower House of Convocation, at all events in the Southern province, will be considerably changed after the next dissolution; and if the clergy should represent this to the Crown, one of two things must happen. Either the Government will disregard the objection, reasonable as it certainly will be, and the unreality of the appeal to Convocation will at once be made clear; or they will recognize it, and the Church will be given over concurrently with the next Parliamentary dissolution to the excitement of an ecclesiastical election upon which an issue of real moment will depend.

In dealing with the recommendations of the Ritual Commission, it may be taken as something more than probable that Convocation will not be called upon, and, if called upon, will refuse to accept any but those on which the great majority of the Commissioners were agreed. The usually conservative and cautious character of the Anglican clergy is a sufficient assurance on this point. But the House of Commons is not conservative, and not always cautious; and though the Bill founded on the conclusions arrived at by Convocation might be extremely moderate, there would be no way of preventing radical alterations from being proposed and discussed. Every recommendation contained in the Report of the Commission, and every expression of dissatisfaction by any one of the Commissioners at the absence of other recommendations, would be a fair subject for an amendment in Committee, and it would be extremely unsafe to predict that none of these amendments would be included in the final version of the Bill. In this case a new dilemma would at once present itself. Would these amendments be sent back to Convocation for approval, or would its acceptance of the original form of the measure be held to imply its acceptance of any changes it might subsequently undergo? If the amendments were sent back and rejected—and Convocation would be almost certain to reject some of them if it had the chance—a very angry feeling would be generated between Parliament and the Church. If they were not sent back, the mischief done would be in all respects as great as if the Bill had been introduced without reference to Convocation in the first instance.

Nor is this the only evil that might arise during the passage of such a measure through the House of Commons. Mr. MIALL's purpose could not be better served than by the opportunities these debates will offer of raising the controversy about disestablishment, not once only, and in the shape of a formal debate on his own motion, but again and again, and incidentally in the course of the debates on the Prayer-Book. For some time past the House of Commons has fought shy of religious subjects, and, except on their allotted Wednesday, the advocates of disestablishment have consequently had but few opportunities of enforcing their views. But a Legislature which has undertaken to remodel a book of public devotion cannot well discourage references to the allied subject of the relations of the Church to the State. Upon such questions as the retention of the Athanasian Creed, and of the phrases implying baptismal regeneration or recognizing the practice of confession, it will be open to any member to ask whether the people of England maintain an Established Church for the purpose, as he will argue, of propagating doctrines repulsive to charity and common sense, and practices which destroy family happiness. Unless Mr. BRAND is very well up in his new work, there is no certainty that a whole night may not be taken up with a debate on the eternity of punishment or the consequences of original sin; and no Speaker who has yet occupied the Chair would be able to prevent Mr. WHALLEY from reading excerpts from the Confessional Unmasked, on the occasion of moving amendments in the Service for the Visitation of the Sick. Nor will this be the only phase of ecclesiastical opinion which will find something to its purpose in these debates. The Comprehensionists will be entitled to plead that, if a Legislature largely composed of Nonconformists is competent to revise the Prayer-Book of the Established Church, there can be no reason why the Established Church, which condescends to avail herself of the services of Dissenters in Parliament, should insist on the maintenance of formularies by which these same Dissenters are excluded from preaching in her pulpits and worshipping at her altars. The fact of a mixed Legislature undertaking to determine such questions as these raised by the Ritual Commission will be equally significant whether the Bill is materially changed in the House of Commons or not.

Even if we suppose these dangers triumphantly overcome, the possible mischiefs of the step which the Archbishop of CANTERBURY proposes to take are not exhausted. At present the Prayer-Book is accepted by both the extreme parties in the Church of England. There are passages in it which neither party thoroughly likes; but they have so long been regarded as unalterable, that each side puts its own glosses on them in the certainty that the correctness of its interpretation is never likely to be authoritatively determined. But if once the process of Prayer-Book making is resumed, it will no longer be open to them to pursue this convenient policy. Convocation and Parliament having once been called in, may be called in again whenever an adequate necessity for their intervention presents itself. Now the worst that can happen to an ecclesiastical party is to have its reading of the Prayer-Book judicially condemned—a misfortune which usually has the effect of making them insist with increased energy that it is the only interpretation permissible. Hereafter it will be their duty, as soon as the Law Courts have pronounced against them, to agitate for a revision of the passages upon which the controversy has arisen. No doubt it may be argued that these possible consequences would be, to say the least, an improvement upon the present state of things in the Church of England. It is not, however, to reasoners of this type that the present warning is addressed. We do not deny that the advantages of a revolution may sometimes outweigh its disadvantages; we are only anxious that the Archbishop's proposal should be recognised as one that may prove the first not in a revolution. Perhaps its author may have in his mind the maxim that a stitch in time saves nine. If so, he will do well to remember, by way of corrective, that the result of putting a new piece into an old garment is sometimes to make the rent worse. In the meanwhile busybodies are at their usual work of making confusion more sorely confounded. We do not so much blame the very miscellaneous knot of Church reformers who are advertising a public meeting under the inevitable presidency of Lord SHAFTESBURY, for if they were not to make themselves heard at this conjuncture they would be nowhere. But we have a right to expect somewhat more wisdom and statesmanship from the Bishop of London than, if rumour speaks truly, he seems to be showing. The accident that he formed one of the select quartet who share the results of the PURCHAS judgment in no way renders him more responsible than any other prelate to see it answered to the bitter end. He may or may not be technically right, as against the fear or five thousand remonstrant clergy, about the proper position of the minister during the Communion service; but he is certainly wrong in policy to confine his public utterances to feeble expostulation, while he has no hesitation in using his utmost powers as patron to squeeze an unwilling compliance out of clergymen who owe their livings to his belief in their general capacity. Such forcibly feeble and exceptional autocracy in face of a respectable and influential section of public opinion can only result in creating sympathy for those who suffer by it, while it will assuredly import irritation into discussions where calmness and conciliation are vitally important.

CHEESEPARING AT THE TREASURY.

AN oninent man who had begun life in straitened circumstances used to apologize for his closeness in money matters by saying that he could never get the chill of penury out of his bones. The Government seems to be suffering from a somewhat similar complaint. Various instances of that miserable kind of thrift which concentrates itself on cheeseparings and candle-ends, which looks merely to the sum saved, and not to the return that might be expected from judicious expenditure, have lately come to light, and would seem to indicate a constitutional incapacity to distinguish between genuine economy and pure niggardliness. One of the worst examples of this infirmity is perhaps that which has just been illustrated by the case of The Queen v. the Lords of the Treasury in the Court of Queen's Bench. It is difficult to imagine a more unreasonable and pernicious parsimony than that which has been displayed by the Treasury in regard to the fees and expenses which are allowed by the Judges of Assize and Justices of the Peace in counties. It appears that, after these accounts have been taxed on the spot by competent officials under the direction of the Bench, they are revised by certain clerks at the Treasury, who reduce or disallow charges according to arbitrary rules which they have laid down for themselves, and apparently without reference to the particular circumstances of each case. One of their decrees is that not more than 1*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* shall on any account be paid to counsel in a Sessions prosecution when there are not more than four witnesses in the case. We do not know whether it is another of these inflexible rules that there shall be no allowance for the assistance of counsel in settling a difficult indictment, but we find that a guinea fee for this service, which has been approved by the Judge in a perjury case on the Northern Circuit, was struck off by the Treasury. Again, in a trial for murder, a guinea which had been allowed to a medical witness, whose evidence in such a case was presumably important, and whose loss of time can hardly have been over-estimated at this modest price, was cut down to half-a-guinea. These are only a few instances out of many, but they are sufficient to show the petty and vexatious interference of the taxing clerks at the Treasury. In the aggregate the sum which is thus saved to the country probably does not amount to very much; but it represents a great deal of annoyance and irritation, as well as some consequences of a more serious kind. The administration of justice touches the welfare and safety of society at innumerable points, and its efficiency is not likely to be promoted by a niggardliness which compels the prosecutors, who represent the public, to keep down expenses at all hazards, without reference to the requirements of each case. The Justices of Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Kent, with the concurrence and support of a large body of Justices throughout the country, lately applied to the Court of Queen's Bench for a mandamus to compel the Lords of the Treasury to repay certain sums which had been disallowed after they had been taxed and paid by the respective counties. The Lancashire case was decided on Monday, and this decision will of course rule the other two cases. The Court had no alternative but to refuse the application, on the ground that it has no jurisdiction over the Crown or its officers. "We are," the CHIEF JUSTICE said, "the Court of the Sovereign, and have no power to command the Crown. The duty of the Treasury is a duty which it owes to Parliament and the Crown, and we cannot enforce it by any legal proceeding." Mr. Justice BLACKBURN, who, with the other Judges, took the same view of the question, added that the only remedy which could be sought in such a case was by application to the House of Commons.

In giving this decision the Judges were careful to limit it to the question of their own power to grant a mandamus against the Ministers of the Crown. They were unanimous in their opinion that the Treasury had committed a breach of duty in overruling the taxation of the County officials, and that they were bound to pay the accounts as settled by the latter. The result is, therefore, that the Treasury has done wrong, but that the courts of law have no means of compelling it either to make amends for the past or to desist from the illegal course of action upon which it has entered. It is probable that the Justices were quite prepared for this decision, and that their application to the Queen's Bench was only a preliminary to an appeal to Parliament. In any case it may be assumed that the subject will be brought before the House of Commons, and that it cannot be allowed to remain on its present footing. There are, it will be observed, several questions at issue. First, there is the legality of the taxation by the Treasury, and on this point we have an authoritative, although informal, judgment against the Government, which has now no choice but to abandon its pretensions or to make them legal by an amendment of the law. Whether it is or is not desirable that the Treasury should have the power to disallow charges which have been passed by the County officials, it has no legal authority, if we may trust the Judges of the Queen's Bench, to do so at present. But is it desirable that it should have this power? In some degree we think it is. Formerly when the counties each paid for their own prosecutions, it was natural that they should exercise an absolute control over the sums expended. Either as a direct consequence, or as an odd coincidence, the expenditure increased considerably when it was transferred from local bodies to the country at large. There seems to be good reason to believe that there were grounds for the interference of the Treasury in 1857, whether that interference was legal or not, and one result was that the charges for prosecutions was reduced from 250,000*l.* to 150,000*l.* in a single year. The scale of fees and other allowances varies in almost every county, some being very liberal and others quite as stingy and penurious as the Treasury could desire. As the nation bears the expense, it is reasonable and necessary that the representatives of the nation should have the power to check the accounts sent in to them for payment.

We now come to the gist of the matter, which is simply whether the plan which has been adopted by the Treasury for revising the accounts is a good one. Most people, we imagine, will agree with the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE that it is "monstrous" and anomalous that, when the Court before which the "criminal actions have been prosecuted thinks unnecessary, "for the due administration of justice, to order particular expenses to be paid, two gentlemen sitting in London "should override the authority of the Court." The explanation of the present state of affairs is, we take it, pretty much to this effect—that when the country undertook to relieve the counties of the cost of prosecutions, the local officers showed a disposition to launch into expenditure somewhat too freely; that the intervention of the Treasury supplied in the first instance a useful check upon extravagance; that the expenses were thus brought within moderate limits, but that the taxing officers attached to the Treasury, instead of being content with this, and holding their authority in reserve for really grave abuses, have felt bound to vindicate the existence of their office by all kinds of petty and vexatious interference. It is one of the weaknesses of human nature that officials of this character should imagine that they would be neglecting their duty if they did not make a perpetual display of busy activity, and that the only way in which they can prove that they are alive and awake is by kicking. It should therefore be the business of their superiors to restrain this superfluous and injurious energy, and to keep it within due bounds. It would probably be found advantageous to revert to the plan which was abandoned some years ago, of placing the Treasury taxing-clerks in personal communication with the County officials, so that they might go through the accounts together. Some attempt might usefully be made, with the assistance of the law officers of the Crown, to draw up a scale of fees and allowances for general use; but it is obvious that prosecutions cannot be efficiently conducted unless the circumstances of each case are taken into account in deciding what amount of expenditure shall be allowed upon it. An absolute rule that the fees of counsel should be measured by the number of witnesses is equally absurd. The legal difficulties of a case, and the degree of forensic ability required to conduct it, bear no relation to the amount of evidence. It is possible that the case may turn rather upon argument than evidence, or that a small

In taxing accounts of this kind, everything depends upon the point of view from which they are regarded. As present the taxing officers of the Treasury appear to ask themselves, not how much money ought to be spent on a prosecution in order to make it efficient, but merely what amount of expenditure is necessary in order to keep up an appearance of prosecuting. As long as the criminal is put in the dock, and somebody in a wig and gown attends to make a speech and examine witnesses, that is enough. There is always a chance that the Judge will prevent the prosecution from breaking down altogether if he thinks there is anything in the charge, or that the looks of the prisoner may decide his fate off-hand with the jury. Some light is thrown on the practical results of this system by the large number of acquittals which take place annually. It is obvious either that a great many people are brought up for trial who should not have been prosecuted, or that a great many are acquitted who ought to have been convicted. Whatever may be said for or against the appointment of a Public Prosecutor, we believe that if the matter were probed it would be found that one of the chief causes of the unsatisfactory administration of the criminal law is simply the want of funds to conduct prosecutions properly. It is probable that in some counties there is a disposition to lax expenditure; but as a rule there is more reason for raising than for cutting down the scale of allowances in criminal trials. Competition at the Bar usually supplies a sufficient number of competent barristers who are ready and glad to accept briefs even with the absurdly small fees which are often marked on them. But attorneys in a good way of business are above such work, and the consequence is that the preliminary getting up of cases is apt to be neglected or mismanaged. A moderate allowance for taking counsel's opinion in preparing a case, and a higher scale of payment for attorneys, would prevent many a shameful miscarriage of justice, the mischief of which is not limited to the acquittal of a rogue or a ruffian in a particular case, but includes the dangerous encouragement which is afforded to roguery and ruffianism in general by the chances of escape which are thus publicly advertised.

CERTAINTY.

THERE has been a controversy between the Spectator and the Dublin Review on the one hand, and a writer in Fraser's Magazine on the other, as to the conditions of certainty. As usual, it tends to branch out into a variety of metaphysical and thirological questions, any adequate discussion of which within the limits of a single article would be altogether impossible. And, moreover, after the various opponents have sufficiently defined and re-defined their terms, it is a little difficult to say what is the precise point at issue. At one moment it appears to be a merely verbal dispute; at others, to involve very deep and important issues. The writer in Fraser, for example, asserted with great force that all belief admits of various degrees of intensity, and thought that he was opposing an opinion held by the Dublin Review. The Dublin Review answers that it implied the "very reverse." It said indeed that certitude, as meaning "the reasonable exclusion of doubt," admits of no degrees; but it added that by certitude may be meant a certain degree, which plainly may be more or less, of adhesion to the truth embraced. It is no wonder that a controversy becomes perplexed when the same word may be intended either to exclude or to admit degrees as it is used in different senses; and, in order to avoid plunging into these labyrinths about "assent" and "absolute certitude," and the rest of it, we shall confine what we have to say to a discussion of the particular cases adduced. The difference of principle, if there is any, will probably appear sufficiently in the course of our remarks.

We begin with an illustration given in the original article of the Dublin Review, and repeated in its reply to the writer in Fraser. A man is certain that his father, with whom he has lived from infancy, is a perfectly honest man. Five years ago a heavy charge was brought against the father, which, as he admitted, he was at the moment unable to explain. Nay at one time "the weight of argument" was against him. Ought the son to disavow pro tanto his confidence in his father's character, or ought he to reject the doubts absolutely, and to believe as strongly as ever? The Dublin Review declares for the latter opinion, and says that "the common voice of mankind" would condemn as "morally detestable" the contrary course.

The illustration is unfortunate in one respect as introducing an irrelevant consideration. Many people might hold that it is better to believe falsely that a father is good than to believe truly that he is a rogue. The moral overrides the logical consideration, and the proper statement of such an opinion would be, not that the son's conduct is detestable simply, but that it is detestable although reasonable. We will not go into the casuistry of the question, but simply state our own opinion, which is, that in the case suggested the son's judgment ought to be guided by the evidence, but his affections ought not to be materially altered. He should think that his father is a rogue if the evidence shows him to be a rogue, but should perform the surely not impossible feat of loving him though he is a rogue. We cannot see anything "morally detestable" in such conduct, which it would be easy to illustrate by many cases of actual occurrence.

There is, however, another ambiguity in the case which it is necessary to notice. The Dublin Review speaks of "the weight of argument" being against the father. The weight of what argument? It apparently means the argument which might be produced in a court of justice, and which would necessarily guide the opinion of indifferent persons. Now it is perfectly plain that the son might rightfully decline to be convinced by any such evidence; and why? Simply because the son is in possession of a vast amount of contradictory evidence which he cannot produce in court, but which, if it could be produced, would convince reasonable men. Our knowledge of the character of a man with whom we have been intimate for years depends upon thousands, or even millions, of observations, few of which can be adequately described in words, many of which have almost passed from our consciousness, but which to us are just as legitimate arguments as any that could be adduced by an impartial scientific inquirer. They cannot be accurately appreciated and measured, but they afford perfectly good premises for valid reasoning. Evidence as to character is of comparatively little weight in a criminal trial, because its sincerity cannot be tested sufficiently, and because language is not capable of transferring from the mind of the witness to the minds of the jury the countless collection of facts on which it is founded. It is still more difficult to describe character than to describe physiognomy; but the inferences which we draw from a recollection of likeness are just as sound as those which we draw from more tangible and measurable facts. Not to go further into a set of considerations which are frequently important in such cases, we may say that a son may be perfectly right in not being convinced by evidence which would convince everybody else, because he is in possession of a great body of evidence which is open to nobody else. If, on the other hand, it is meant that the weight of evidence is against the father even after taking into account all the means of information at the son's disposal, it is quite clear that he is logically wrong in resisting conviction, and we should say that he is also morally wrong. His father has still claims on his affection, but not on his respect; for surely no one will argue that if a son, after taking everything into account, has reasonable grounds for disbelieving his father's virtue, he ought to force himself to believe in it. Such a theory would introduce a new principle of logic, to which there is too much inclination at present—namely, that our convictions should be guided by our passions; but, at any rate, it cannot supply a general rule of logic.

The Dublin Review "retorts" upon the writer in Fraser by putting another case. If, it says, a man should count with his own hands and eyes 16 rows of pebbles with 16 in a row, and make the total 256, should he doubt that 16 times 16 is equal to 256? Certainly not; he should think that he has made a mistake. And why? Simply because the evidence in favour of the arithmetical truth is incomparably greater than the evidence furnished by a particular process of counting. We do not ask, for it is totally irrelevant to this question, on what grounds our certainty of the validity of mathematical operations rests; whether, as Mr. Mill would say, on the testimony of experience, or, as the Dublin Review would say, on the testimony of some faculty capable of affording a priori knowledge. In any case, it will be admitted that we are, or may be, certain that  $16 \times 16 = 256$  in so high a degree that the chance of that statement being erroneous is as nothing as compared with the chance of a particular arithmetical blunder. But the illustration may be turned against the Dublin Review. If there had been 116 rows of 116 pebbles, and the counter had found them to be 13,446, whereas, on performing the arithmetical operation, he had come to the result 13,456, he would, if a bad arithmetician, have very likely supposed himself to have made a mistake in the multiplication, and not in the counting. In both cases he would really have to be guided by the balance of evidence. The question before him is simply whether it is more likely that he should have blundered in counting or blundered in multiplying.

These cases suggest another difficulty, which is brought out by the illustrations in the Spectator. Suppose, it says, that seventeen people swear that Mr. Gladstone was in the House of Commons at a given day and hour, and twenty-three that he was not, our judgment would then be in suspense. If, however, we were one of the seventeen, if we had seen Mr. Gladstone, made a speech in reply to him, and so on, should we not be justified in rejecting the evidence of the twenty-three? Certainly we should, as a general rule, and for the simple reason that the evidence is overwhelmingly in favour of Mr. Gladstone's presence. It is less beyond experience that twenty-three people should lie than that our memory should deceive us on a matter where we had such ample means of knowing the truth. Even here, indeed, we do not put the case quite so strongly as the Spectator. We think that, as a matter of fact, any man's judgment would be perceptibly staggered by an agreement of twenty-three men of, as we will assume, undoubted honour and probity. He would think that there was a strange mistake somewhere, and would hardly think it quite out of the question that his own memory had played him a trick. Indeed, there is a simple test of this fact. The evidence of twenty-three unsuspected eyewitnesses would be enough to convince most people—we do not ask whether rightly or not—of the occurrence of a miracle; that is to say, of a suspension of the invariable order of nature. If such a belief is not out of the question, surely it cannot be out of the question to suppose that a similar amount of testimony would convince a man that he had been drunk, or dreaming, or seized with a temporary fit of insanity. And when the Spectator apparently says that any additional number of external witnesses should make no difference in our belief, we entirely decline to follow it. It falls, as it appears to us, into two fallacies. It speaks as if the knowledge of Mr. Gladstone's presence depended upon the immediate testimony of our consciousness. This is, of course, a mere slip of the pen. In matters to which a man's own consciousness testifies he is the only possible witness, and therefore his evidence is conclusive. If he has a toothache, the whole human race might swear that he had not without altering his belief, and for the excellent reason that they could not know anything about it. Such a case then comes within the general principle of proportioning belief to evidence, because by the hypothesis the whole attainable evidence is on one side; though it is perhaps hardly philosophical in such a case to speak of evidence at all. But in the case of Mr. Gladstone's presence on a given occasion, there are evidently several links which are supplied by inference. There is the possibility of the observer's memory being deceived, or of his having put a wrong interpretation on the sights, sounds, or other phenomena from which he inferred Mr. Gladstone. And if he was shortsighted, deaf, absent-minded, and so on, the links might be very weak. The principle, as the Spectator puts it, would imply that a man should never allow himself to be convinced by any external evidence that he has been under an hallucination; and that if a mad woman believes herself to be Queen Victoria, she is right in rejecting all the assurances of her friends that she is not. There is, however, another observation of more importance. The cases put by the Spectator are really cases in which the preponderance of evidence is enormously on one side. The probability approaches indefinitely near to certainty, just as a curve approaches indefinitely near to its asymptote; and the question is substantially this—whether a man ought to permit his conduct or his state of mind to be affected by a doubt of infinitesimal magnitude. Such a doubt certainly ought not to change his conduct; for the world would not be habitable if we did not at every moment of our lives assume the truth of innumerable propositions the certainty of which falls far short of mathematical demonstration. Indeed the degree of doubt may vary infinitely, and yet our opinions always amount to practical certainty. We should call the Atlantic pure water for all practical purposes though a pint of wine had been emptied into it, and under the same circumstances we might call Windermere equally pure. Yet the ocean would be purer than the lake in the ratio of the volumes of the two collections of water. In like manner we cannot distinguish the degrees of certainty with which we hold that two and two make four, that there is a city called Paris, that our father or our first cousin once removed is an honest man, or that we had eggs for breakfast this morning. The human mind resembles an imperfectly graduated thermometer which is not capable of representing very subtle changes of temperature. And yet there is a vast difference in our state of mind in these instances, which is proved by the fact that very different amounts of evidence would be required to upset our convictions in the various cases. To shake our belief in some of these truths would be to dislocate the whole structure of our minds, and to eradicate opinions which are intertwined with every thought that passes through them; to shake our belief in others, it would be enough to prove that we had had a passing lapse of memory, or suffered from a temporary aberration of intellect.

It may be right to call all these states of opinion by the name of "absolute certainty," meaning simply that we do not at present entertain, and are convinced that we never shall entertain, any doubt on the subjects to which they refer. What we should call varying degrees of assent or intensity of conviction may be properly designated as varying degrees of adhesion to the principles involved. That is a question of language in which we have no particular concern; and we should be glad to find that we really agree with the persons against whom we fancy ourselves to have been arguing. Nor can we even touch upon the application of such discussions to those religious inquiries to which of course they owe their real interest. We can only say that we see no reason for doubting the general principle that we ought, as far as possible, to proportion our convictions to the evidence, which is merely a particular application of the rule that we ought to believe as far as possible what is true, and therefore not to hold the chances to be 100 to 1 when they are really only 10 to 1. None of the cases alleged seem to have any tendency to invalidate this view. We do not doubt the perfect sincerity of our opponents; we only suggest to them that there is an obvious danger in using language which may be easily perverted to mean that a man may and ought to be "absolutely certain" of something which he really knows to be not certain at all.

VITUPERATION.

THE mind of man naturally relies and takes delight in vituperation—in hearing others, provided that no personal interest is concerned, deliver themselves of hearty abuse, careless of nice discrimination. People would not call names if they did not meet with the sympathy of animated attention; there would be few vituperators if there were no applauding audience. Vituperation is, in fact, a social exercise, and the liking for it is engrained; a spice of abuse enlivens a dull subject as much as a good story. We may all recollect the stimulus which an honest, cheerful, witty vituperator on our own side has given to our convictions. Even before a side is taken, the confidence which is inspired by an outburst of contumely goes for something, and has done so from the beginning of things. Satire, says Dryden—and he means vituperation—is almost as old as verse; and though hymns, which are the praises of God, may be allowed to have been before it, yet the defamation of others came not long afterwards. Of course the vituperation of which we speak as being so generally acceptable is not malignant. It is that habit of a ready, licentious tongue which anticipates and strengthens opinion in the speaker rather than is formed by it. People of ordinary good nature do not like to be parties to the more bilious forms of railing, where the railer desires to injure by his execrations; it must be understood that the bark is worse than the bite, that the whole thing is an achievement of rhetoric, with which malice has little to do. If we cannot admit in the retrospect that a trick of vituperation is really harmless either to speaker or sympathizers, yet people assume it to be so when it amuses them and they allow themselves to enjoy it.

The pleasure of vituperation we take to be a kind of glory, an exuberant elevation and sense of power in placing our antagonist or victim on any level we please. Whatever may be said of laughter, there is no doubt that calling names is an assumption of superiority; we judge a man when we designate him a blockhead or a rascal. Nor is this glory confined to the speaker; it inflates in a lesser degree those who listen, and who are supposed to be capable of appreciating a derogatory opinion which is confided to them. They feel themselves cleverer and honestest by unconscious comparison. The power to string epithets together stands for a substantial accomplishment, and has a way of creating conviction as the string lengthens. Hence a good vituperator is hailed as an important ally among the zealots of a cause, both as keeping adherents in good humour and their convictions at the proper tension. We are not sure that a party can ever be found to take root without one to carry people a little beyond themselves and so to commit them. Not but that there are men so keenly vituperative as to be unfitted for any kind of fellowship. They play their game alone. Social vituperators are of this class. As the practice can scarcely be largely indulged in in society without some qualities that make it entertaining, it all passes for sport, as "the man's way." There are people so much in the habit of witty disparagement that, if they talk of their friends at all, they cannot help doing them an injury, and attaching some stigma to their names in the minds of those who hear them, so that ever after there clings a sense of something to their disadvantage; for to hear a person called names whom we do not know, or to whom we are indifferent, establishes a prejudice, the strength of which is in proportion to the absence of apparent ill-will in the vituperator, and to the very vagueness and dimness of the charge. Nobody can slip into the vein without some ill-nature; but when a man is young and fresh this taint may be as little perceived by himself as by his admiring friends. Indeed, though ill-nature certainly grows under the habit, at first it may be little enough. It is the unrestraint and want of discipline which does the mischief, the use of a language immoderate, unmeasured, indiscriminating, unscrupulous.

A habit will long outlive the wit which set it off, and a hardened vituperator who calls names, and characterizes his neighbour's actions in opprobrious terms, has few friends. The same epithets which, in the fascinating insolence of sanguine and confident youth, appear to be a mere ebullition of animal spirits, offend us as disappointed malice when the game of life is played out. In fact, no imagination is active or lively enough to supply an unceasing flow of fresh invective, and yet there is no point on which the ear more inexorably demands novelty and play of invention. The man who designates either friends or enemies by the same abusive terms through a lifetime gets nothing but the reputation of a foul tongue for his pains. There must be something quaint and new, something to repeat, in order to sustain his band of listeners. The whole language of calling names is transitional, and changes with a rapidity known to no other art. Thus the scraggy railer finds himself superseded and outshone by some younger tongue well up in the most recent vein; his very terms are old-fashioned; and, whether for this or some deeper cause connected with the morality of the subject, we shall always find him flat, embittered, tinged with melancholy or discontent, his friends consulting and shaking their heads over him behind his back, and the whirligig of time bringing about abundant revenge. And what happens to persons in their private capacity happens to authors in regard to their fame. Pope made sure that his Dunciad would survive as long as the English tongue should remain as it was in the reigns of Queen Anne and King George; he supposed to rest his fame upon it. It is read no doubt still, but how stale and wearisome have his epithets become now. The perpetual recurrence of dunce, fool, and lunatic repels the general reader, to whose fancy they once condensed so much fine satire when dunce and fool were the favourite terms of opprobrium. Vituperation is the only language—assuming it to be the best of its kind—that loses credit and dignity with time. It will not keep. If when it is old it still amuses us, it is rather at the expense of the vituperator than of his subject and victim. In our calm superiority we see the injustice of it, and muse on the righteousness of moderation. What disadvantage is it, for example, to the Presbyterians of the seventeenth century to find them described by their opponents in a string of epithets as "covetous, false, undermining, poor-spirited, void of generous souls, sneaking, snivelling," &c. &c.? Who suffers in our estimation—Andrew Marvell, or the critic who habitually calls him "buffoon"? We are amused rather than convinced of Prynne's unpopularity when we are told that "he almost nauseated the sober part of the nation by the stench of his carrion pasquils." We are not influenced in our estimate of Anthony a-Wood when we find that a rival biographer pronounces his book a "tumultuous mixture of stuff and tattle." Vituperation has two stages of appreciation when approved at all. At first we like it because it expresses our prejudices with a courage and audacity which we are not equal to; and afterwards, as a literary curiosity, as showing upon what matters the asperities of a past age, which we have ourselves outgrown, exercised themselves. Where not redeemed by quaintness and the use of obsolete terms, the effect of vituperation on a style is generally to vulgarize it; for all names, all set forms of abuse, by whomsoever originated, descend to the vulgar at last. Hence it is wonderful how a habit of calling names lowers a man with posterity. Warburton was a great offender in this way. His Divine Legation "stuck with some candid men" who did not like his line of argument; and his orthodoxy was called in question. In return he calls the pious Roman an "execrable scoundrel." His correspondence abounds with such terms—applied to well-meaning divines—as dunces, wretches, a worthless crew, abandoned libellers, and senseless profligate scribblers. He looks forward, in his preface to a second volume, to "hauling them all like vermin in a warren, then leaving them to posterity to stink and blacken in the wind." He reached the climax of this sort of rhetoric when, in the House of Lords, he apologized to Satan for having supposed him capable of inditing Wilkes's pamphlet. Even antiquity was not safe from his tongue. Not only was the Society of Antiquaries a hospital of blockheads, but the very Fathers of the Church were mis-called. John of Antioch he suspected of being a "shagrag," and Theodoret and an august brotherhood were "poltroons." He only, however, exceeded the practice of the day. There was a trick amongst friends of praising one another up to the skies, and treating all the rest of the world as "wretches," which tells but poorly upon an indifferent and supercilious posterity. We find a record of Swift's, whose cynicism took this direction, showing a strictly private indulgence of the vein in his comments on the leading men of his day. If that on Lord Wharton, "the most universal villain I ever knew," was not well merited, at least it was shared by his friends; but he had also personal antipathies, as to the Scotch. Thus somebody is "one of the greatest knaves, even for a Scot"; the Duke of Argyll is "an ambitious, covetous, canny Scot." Then there follow in order Duke of Bolton, a great booby; Duke of Montagu, "as great a knave as any in his time"; Earl of Ranelagh, "the vilest soul I ever saw"; Earl of Sandwich, "as much a puppy as ever I saw, ugly and a fop"; Earl of Faversham, "he was a very dull old fellow"; Lord Guildford, "a mighty silly fellow," and so on. In order to show a high standard of merit, it was necessary to such a temper to flatter somebody. Flattery, indeed, is a necessary antithesis to vituperation, as we see when a few of these wits get together or write civil letters to one another.

The present century had the counterpart of these masters of the art in Professor Wilson, whom nobody ever surpassed in the reckless daring of his contumely. His vituperation was essentially of the unmalignant sort, betraying unrestraint and recklessness rather than malice. What a quantity of stuff of this kind that looks poor enough now amused his contemporaries, and uplifted them in the reading into some sense of his own audacious smartness! as when, for example, he characterizes cockneys by every epithet of scorn, calls Leigh Hunt, mainly on this account, a profligate creature, and stigmatizes all opponents, literary or political, as blackguards and villains. Though less exuberant, we find the same vein in De Quincey. It was a family tendency. His marvellous boy brother was an early proficient; once he proposed to execute the feat of standing head downwards on the ceiling "like those scoundrels the flies." He works himself into quite a passion of ill language against Dr. Johnson, for his tone towards Milton. He is incontinent and unappeasable. "Am I the man," he asks, "to suffer him to escape under the trivial impeachment of 'prejudice'?" "Dr. Johnson, viewed in relation to Milton, was a malicious, mendacious, and dishonest man." We call this vituperative, because he is obliged to make admissions about Milton which expose himself quite as reasonably to the same allegations, without once flying out at him. But the vituperative temper cares nothing for consistency; blindness is one of its characteristics.

We have only touched on the more creditable forms of vituperation, as indeed a branch of rhetoric, a vehicle for zeal, an expression of honest conviction even where self comes in. It is innocent in proportion to the absence of merely personal considerations, if indeed it can ever be quite clear of these or of some dash of error. We certainly see that men may have tastes and principles so much at heart that they keenly hate, and rejoice to vilify, the dead who are removed from them by long periods of time, and remoteness of association. With what a rage of contumely Mr. Ruskin denounces painters who have lain for ages in their graves; what adjectives and what nouns in conjunction; what ingenuity of novel invective do his pages display! "Sickening offensiveness"; "weaknesses and paltrinesses"; "tottering affectations"; "tortured insanities"; "shallow, unreflecting nothingness"; "distorted feverishness"; "strained and disgusting horrors"—such flowers of criticism on art are thickly strewn. How he storms at the "intolerable, inconceivable brutality of Salvator," "base born, thief-bred"; and at the lower Dutch schools, "which lose the villanous in the brutal and the horror of crime in its 'idiocy'!" However well merited may be his rebukes, it is impossible not to discern in Mr. Ruskin a relish for railing in well-sounding periods and a perception of the literary use of invective—a relish which we regard as dangerous alike to growth in judgment and to permanent influence.

Whatever may be the incitement to this vein—whether a detestation of moral turpitude, as in the mutual denunciations of Cavalier and Roundhead, Puritan and Churchman; or of folly, which was the stimulus to abuse among the wits of a later age; or of defective taste, which is perhaps the provocative to bad language that is most general in our own time—all vituperation comes at last to the charge of knavery and villany of some sort. We are so far moral creatures that nothing satisfies the unlicensed tongue but measuring all men and things alike by a moral standard. The man is as villanous who perpetrates a false quantity as he who rebels against his king, or betrays his country, or scruples at a dogma, or tyrannically imposes it. However far removed our likes and dislikes, our tastes and efforts, may seem from the standard of moral right and wrong, vituperation never stops short of it. Not knowing the language of moderation, it is incapable of shades or degrees, and is driven to see wickedness and foul wrong in all that it disapproves in order to account for and justify its own vehemence.

ON A VISIT.

TO most young people the social arrangement known as going on a visit to friends at a distance is one of the most charming things possible. Novelty being to them the very breath of life, and hope and expectation their normal mental condition, the mere fact of change is in itself delightful; unless it happens to be something so hopelessly dull as a visit single-handed to an invalid grandmother, or the yearly probation of a girl of the period under the charge of a wealthy maiden aunt with strict principles on the question of chignons, and no croquet lawn. If the young ladies out on a visit are, however, moderately cheerful, they can contrive to make amusement for themselves out of anything short of such sober-tinted extremes as these; and very often they effect more serious matters than mere amusement, and their visit brings them a love affair or a marriage which changes the whole tenor of their lives. At the worst, it has shown them a new part of the country, given them new patterns of embroidery, new fashions of hair-dressing, new songs and waltzes, and afforded an occasion for a large supply of pretty dresses, which to most young women, or indeed to most women whether young or old, is a very effectual source of pleasure.

The great charm and excitement of going on a visit belongs naturally to the young of the middle classes; among those of higher condition it is a different matter altogether. When people take their own servants with them and live in exactly the same style as at home, they merely change the furniture of their rooms and the view from the windows. The same kind of thing goes on at Lord A.'s as at Lord B.'s, in the Scottish Highlands or the Leicestershire wolds. The quality of the hunting or shooting may be different, but the whole manner of living is essentially a repetition; and the dead level of civilization is not broken up by any very startling innovations anywhere. But among the middle classes there is greater variety; and the country clergyman's daughter who goes on a visit to the London barrister's family, plunges into a manner of life totally different from that of her own home; the personal habits of town and country still remaining quite distinct, and the possibilities of action being on another plane altogether. A London-bred woman goes down to the country on a visit to a hale, hearty Hessian, her former schoolfellow, who tucks up her woollen gown midway to her knees, wears stout boots of masculine appearance, and goes quite comfortably through mud and mire, across ploughed fields and undrained farmyards, taking cramped stiles and five-barred gates in her way as obstacles of no more moment than was the mud or the mire. Long years of use to this unfastidious mode of existence have blinded her to the perception that a woman, without being an invalid, may yet be unable to do all that is so easy to her. So the London lady is taken for a walk, say of five or six miles, which to the vigorous Hessian is a mere unsatisfying stroll, and what her youngest child could easily enough do. To be sure the walk includes a few muddy corners and the like, and Bond Street boots do not bear the strain well; neither is a glistening silk gown of the fashionable colour improved by being dragged through furze bushes and bracken, and brushed against the wet heads of field cabbages. Moreover, crossing meadows tenanted by cattle that toss their heads and look—and "looking," in horned cattle, is a great offence to most town-bred women—has been a service of peril which alone would have taken all the strength out of her nerves, and all the pleasure out of her walk; but the hostess cannot imagine feelings which she herself does not share, and the London lady is of course credited with courage, because to doubt it would be to cast a slur on her whole moral character. The Hessian minds the beasts no more than as many tree stumps, but her friend sees a raging bull in every guilty mother that stares at her as she passes, and thinks something dreadful is going to happen because the flies make the heifers swing their tails and stamp. Then the dogs bark furiously as they rush out of farmsteads and cottages; and the newly-dressed fields are not pleasant to cross or skirt. The visitor cares little for wild flowers, less for birds, and all trees are pretty much alike to her; and this long, rude walk, accentuated with the true country emphasis, has been too much for her. Her host wonders at her evening lassitude and low spirits, and fears that she finds it dull; and the robust hostess anathematizes the demoralizing effects of Kensington, and scornfully contrasts her present friend with her past, when they were both schoolgirls together and on a par in strength and endurance. "She was like other people then," says the well-trained Hessian, who has kept herself in condition by daily exercise of a severe character, "and now see what a poor creature she is! She can do nothing but work at embroidery and crouch shivering over the fire." Sometimes, however, it happens the other way, and the lady guest, even though a Londoner, is the stronger of the two. The wife has been broken down by family cares and many children; the guest comes fresh, unworn, and young; the wife seldom goes beyond the garden, never further than the village, and is knocked up if she has done two miles; the guest can manage her six or eight without fatigue; hence she naturally becomes the husband's walking companion during her visit, to his frank delight and as frank regrets that his wife cannot do as much. And the wife, though good breeding and natural kindness would prevent her objecting to these long walks, finds them hard upon her. Most probably she bitterly regrets having invited her former friend, and mentally resolves never to ask her again. She wanted her as a little amusement and relaxation for herself; her health is delicate and her life dull, and she thought a female friend in the house would cheer her up and be a help; but when she finds that she has invited one who, without in the least intending it, and only by the force of circumstances, sets her in unfavourable contrast with her husband, we may be sure that it will not take much argument to convince her that asking friends on a visit is a ridiculous custom, and that people, especially young ladies fond of long walks, are best at their own homes.

In London there are two kinds of guests from the country; the insatiable, and the indifferent—those who wear out their hosts by their activity, and those who oppress them by their supineness. The Londoner who has outlived all the excitement of the busy city life wonders at the energy and enthusiasm of his friend. Everything must be done, even to the Tower and the Whispering Gallery, Madame Tussaud's and the Agricultural Hall. There is not a second-rate trumpery trifle which has been in the shop windows for a year or more, that is not pored over, and if possible bought; and among the inflictions of the host may be counted the crude taste of the guest, and the childish flinging away of money on things absolutely worthless. Or it may be that the guest has come up stored with many maxims of worldly wisdom and vague suspicion, and, determined not to be taken in, attempts to bargain in shops where a second price would be impossible, and where the host is personally known. With guests of this superabundant energy a quiet evening is out of the question. They go the round of all the theatres, and fill in the gaps with the opera and concerts. They have come up not to stay with you, but to see London, and they fulfil their intention liberally. Or they are indifferent and supine, and not to be amused, do what you will. They think everything a bore, or they are nervous and not up to the mark; they beseech you not to ask any one to dinner, and not to take them with you to any reception; they are listless at the theatre, and go to sleep at the opera; at the Royal Academy the only pictures they notice are those of their own neighbourhood, or perhaps one by a local artist known to them. All the finest works of the year fall flat, and before you have seen half, they say they have had enough of it, and sit down plaintively offering to wait till you have done, in the tone of a Christian martyr. These are the people who are always complaining of the dirt and smoke of London and the stuffiness of the houses, as if they were personally injured and you personally responsible. They show a very decided scorn for all London produce, natural or artificial, and wonder how people can live in such a place. They are sure to denounce the prevailing fashions, whatever they may be; while their own, of last season, are really exaggerated and excessive; and they refuse to have the town touch laid on them during their stay, but heroically follow the millinery gospel of their local Worth, and amuse you by themselves. They show real animation only when they are going away, and begin to wonder how they shall find things at home, and whether Charles will meet them at the station or send William instead. But when they write to thank you for your hospitality, they tell you they never enjoyed anything so much in their lives; leaving you in a state of perplexity, as you cannot help remembering their London and provincial complaints, and evident relief in leaving; and comparing your remuneration with the warm suggestions of pleasure now before you.

eyes. All you can say is, that if they were pleased they took an odd way of showing it.

There are people rash enough to have other people's children on a visit, to take on themselves the responsibility of their health and safety, when the young guests are almost sure to fall ill by the change of diet and the unwanted amount of indulgence allowed, or to come into some trouble by the relaxing of due supervision and control. They get a touch of gastric fever, or they tumble into the pond; and either bronchitis, or a fall from horseback, or tripping over from a ladder, or coming to grief on the swing, or such a such accident, is generally the result of an act which is either heresim or madness as one may be inclined to regard it. For of all the inconveniences attending visiting, these incidental to child guests are the most distressing. Yet there are philanthropic friends who run these risks for the sake of giving pleasure to a few young people; whether they deserve canonisation for their kindness or censure for their rashness we leave an open question. As for certain disturbances in health, that generally comes to other than children from being on a visit. Hours and style of food are sure to be somewhat different from those of home; and he slight constraint of the life, and the feverishness which he induces, add to the disturbance. Occupations are interrupted both to the guest and the host; and some hosts think necessary to make company for the guest, and some guests are heavy on hand. Some regard your house as a gaol, and on as the gaoler, and are afraid to initiate an independent action or to call their souls their own; others treat you as a landlord, and behave as if you kept an inn, making a convenience of your household in the most unblushing manner. Some are astiduous, and find nothing that they have been accustomed to, and covertly snub your wines, your table, and your whole arrangements; others embarrass you by the fervour of their admiration, as if they had come out of a hovel and did not know the usages of civilized homes. Some intrude themselves into very small household matter that goes on before them, and offer advice that is neither wanted nor desired; and others will not commit themselves to the most innocent opinion, fearful lest they should be thought to interfere or take sides. Some of the women dress at the husband; some of the men flirt with the wife and make love to the daughters surreptitiously; some loaf about or play billiards all day long till you are tired of the click of the balls; others bury their heads in a book, and are no better than nummies lounging back in easy chairs; some insist on going to be met in a hard frost; others will shoot in a downpour; and others again waste your whole day over the chess-table, and will not stir out at all. Some are so sensitive and fidgety that they will not stay above a day or two, and are gone before you have got into the habit of seeing them, leaving you with the feeling of a whirlwind having passed through your house; and others, when they come, stick, and you begin to despair of dislodging them. On the other hand, there are houses where you feel that you would wear out your welcome after the third day, how long soever the distance you have come; and here are others where you would offend your hosts for life if you did not throw overboard every other duty and engagement to remain for as many weeks as they desire. In fact, paying visits and inviting guests are both risky matters, and need far more careful consideration than they generally receive. But when it happens that the thing is congenial on both sides, that the guest slips into a vacant place as it were, and neither bores nor is bored, then paying a visit is as delightful as the young imagination pictures it to be; and the peculiar closeness and sweetness of intimacy it engenders is one of the most enduring and charming circumstances incidental to friendship. This, however, is rare and exceptional, as are most of the very good things of life.

THE PROPOSED CREATION OF CARDINALS.

THE Roman Catholic papers, which on such a point are likely to be well informed, report that the Pope contemplates very shortly filling up some fourteen or fifteen of the twenty vacancies in the College of Cardinals, and eleven names are mentioned of those expected to receive the red hat. Prominent among them is Archbishop Manning, and with him come the Archbishops of Munich, Cologne, Mechlin (Dechamps), Posen, Baltimore (Spalding), and the Patriarch of Lisbon, who makes an ex officio claim to the dignity by virtue of a privilege accorded by Clement XI. To these are added the names of four high officials of the former Papal Government—Bendi, Prefect of Police; Negroni, Minister of the Interior; Vissolacci, and De Merode. Of the claims of many of these personages to reap the reward of their labours in the cause of "ourism" there can be no sort of question. There is a story told of an English Catholic visitor expressing to a very distinguished German ecclesiastic his regret that Dr. Newman was not made a Cardinal. "My dear friend," was the prompt reply, "that is not the stuff Cardinals are made of." Exactly so; but such men as Manning, Dechamps, Melchers, and the reclaimed Archbishop of Munich, who has been good enough to excommunicate his old friend and counsellor, Dr. Dollinger, are just "the stuff Cardinals are made of," and have fairly earned their promotion. The Archbishops of Westminster, Mechlin, and Baltimore were leaders of the ultra party at the Council, while their brothers of Munich and Cologne, who were rather troublesome at Rome, have still more constantly distinguished themselves since by their persecution of their former associates. Considering how important, though hardly conspicuous, a part was played by the police in the management of the Council, the bestowal of the purple on Negroni can only be regarded as a fitting and graceful acknowledgment of the services of Negroni and Vissolacci less is generally known; but De Merode is a man of mark in his way, and a staunch supporter of Papal interests, though his fraternal affection betrayed him into the impropriety of ordering a solemn requiem for the pious, but too liberal, Montalembert, which His Holiness, being quite superior to the superstition De mortuis nil nisi bonum, countermanded, not without a tolerably free expression of his sentiments on the subject. On the whole, the proposed nominees appear to us admirably qualified for their elevation, though in the present state of things at Rome the precise marketable or other value of the dignity may perhaps be considered ambiguous. There is something ominous in the statement that the solemnities usual in the preconisation of Cardinals "will, on this occasion, of course have to be dispensed with," though the necessity, in fact, arises solely from the assumed captivity of "the prisoner of the Vatican."

As regards Archbishop Manning, indeed, we were a little surprised, not that the Pope should be ready to promote him, but that he should be desirous, if he is desirous, of accepting an honour likely to hamper his action and to impair rather than to enhance his influence in his own country. Cardinal Wiseman, whose genius was greater than his common sense, fully expected to be received at Court as Cardinal, and was not a little disappointed, if not soured, at finding that his new dignity conferred no social rank or position in England, and, being received from a foreign Sovereign without the sanction of his own, could not be recognised by the Government at all, so that all official intercourse had to be carried on through Bishop Grant of Southwark, instead of himself. Dr. Manning will be under no such illusions, and neither is he likely to apply to the Queen for permission to accept his new title, which was, we believe, asked and obtained in the case of Cardinal Weld. He is, however, the best judge of what will be most conducive to his ecclesiastical aspirations; and a higher status in Roman Catholic society, coupled with the reverential chances of influence in future conclaves, may perhaps seem a sufficient compensation for the drawbacks of a princely rank which will not be recognized and cannot be laid aside. For it is a curious circumstance, and one which oddly illustrates the composite character of the Papacy, that the highest position in the Roman Church next to that of the supreme and infallible Pontiff is a secular and not a spiritual office, which may be, and often has been, held by laymen. The whole history of the institution is so remarkable that it may be worth while briefly to recall it at a time when the anomalous Court in which Cardinals rank as princes of the blood is passing through a momentous, if not final, crisis of its long and chequered existence. "The Catholic Church," said M. About, in his peculiar manner, "is governed by a Pope and seventy Cardinals, in memory of the twelve apostles." This is not quite an accurate account of the matter; but it represents with tolerable fidelity the popular impression among both Catholics and Protestants as to the de facto government of the Church. But when we proceed to inquire how the body which was once ruled by twelve apostles came to fall under the domination of a Pope and seventy Cardinals, the answer can hardly be compressed into the limits of an epigrammatic sarcasm.

For many centuries, even after the Bishop of Rome had attained in practice to a position of unchallenged supremacy in the Western Church, his election was dependent on the joint action of the whole civic community in its threefold division—the Government, the clergy, and the people. It was not till the middle of the eleventh century that Nicolas II., acting under the inspiration of Hildebrand, who was soon afterwards to succeed him on the Papal throne, effected this great revolution—for such it undoubtedly was—which transferred the election of the supreme Pontiff from a large and mixed constituency, in which the civil authorities held a prominent place, to a small ecclesiastical senate nominated by himself alone. The preamble of Nicolas's Bull, after rehearsing the troubles and confusions of former elections as the cause for this momentous change, decrees that henceforth the right shall appertain first to the Cardinal Bishops, then to the Cardinals of lower rank, and that the clergy and people shall merely express their acquiescence. About a century later Alexander III. made the votes of two-thirds of the Conclave essential to a valid election, and this provision still continues in force. The present composition of the Sacred College is fixed by a later enactment, dating from the reign of Sixtus V., in 1585, which limits the number of members to seventy, divided into six Cardinal Bishops, fifty Cardinal Priests, and fourteen Cardinal Deacons. It must, however, be remembered that the nomenclature is purely technical; a Cardinal Deacon may be in priest's orders, as is the case with Cardinal Antonelli at this moment, and many Cardinal Priests are bishops. On the other hand, there may be Cardinal Priests who are not in priest's orders, as was for many years the case with Cardinal Dandini, who was also, while only a deacon, Bishop of Genoa. There have even, according to Moroni, been Cardinal Bishops who were only in diaconal orders. The fact is, that the cardinalitial title is a purely secular one; it is a grade in the Court of Rome, not in the Church; but as the Court is a strictly ecclesiastical one, all who belong to it have to wear the ecclesiastical habits, and to remain unmarried. Monsignori, for instance, many of whom are laymen, dress as priests, and cannot marry without resigning their dignity. There is no ordination for a Cardinal as such, and he only requires the Pope's permission to return to secular life and marry, as many lay Cardinals have actually done. As recently as 1735 Don Luis of Bourbon was named by Clement XII. Archbishop of Toledo and Cardinal, at the mature age of eight; and Sixtus V. made his nephew a Cardinal when a boy of fourteen. There are several instances on record where Cardinals in holy orders have been allowed to renounce their dignity and marry, generally on political grounds. Only two centuries ago, Casimir, brother of the King of Poland, who was both a Cardinal and a Jesuit, received a dispensation to marry, and to marry his brother's widow, on the Jewish principle of "raising up seed to his brother." Several other instances occurred in the same century of Cardinals in sacred orders being allowed to marry. The real fact is that this hybrid dignity, while not a sacred, is yet, as belonging to the Papal Court, an ecclesiastical one. It is conferred on laymen by a legal fiction of appointing them for twelve months with an obligation of taking deacon's orders within that period, which, however, can be renewed toties quoties by the plenary power of the Pope, just as French Protestants were invested with the Cross of St. Louis for ninety-nine years, when their right to wear it would be forfeited if they remained in heresy. It was, however, ordered by a Bull of Pius IV. that Cardinals not in deacon's orders should not vote in conclave; but this exclusion is explained in a later Bull of Gregory XV. to be subject to Papal dispensation, and accordingly the Cardinal Archduke Albert, who afterwards married, voted in the election of Sixtus V. by virtue of a special license from the late Pope. It was the express wish of Pius IX. that all the Cardinals should be at least in deacon's orders, and there are accordingly no members of the present College below that order.

The process of creating Cardinals is almost as singular as their position when created. They pass, so to speak, through a chrysalis and an unfledged stage of existence—if such a confusion of metaphors may be allowed—before the fully developed butterfly displays its pointed wings. First, there are the Cardinals in petto, who are eventually destined by the Pope to that high dignity, though no one but himself need know anything of the fact. It was usual at one period for the Pope to mention their names in secret Consistory, as was done by Martin V.; but this imperfect promulgation did not entitle them to act as Cardinals. Then the practice was adopted of simply intimating in Consistory the number, but not the names, of the persons designated for the purple, which had no other effect than to limit the range of the Pope's power of creation, as these unknown members were held to belong to the Sacred College. A custom has since sprung up of the Pope's writing out in sealed packets the names of Cardinals promoted in petto, for the guidance of his successor, who, however, is not bound to carry out his wishes in the case of his death, and does not invariably do so. Pius IX. has the discredit of supplying the first example of a Pope annulling his own in petto nomination, and that, too, after it had been formally intimated by letter to the nominee, who was moreover by far the most distinguished Italian ecclesiastic of the present century—Rosmini. The future Cardinal, after receiving notice to make preparations for his public reception, not only found himself summarily rejected, but his latest work, published by the express direction of the Pope, placed on the Index. So much for the chrysalis or in petto stage of development, from which a freshly named Cardinal emerges into what was formerly a kind of novitiate, during which he is called a Cardinal cum ore clauso, invested with the dignity but debarred from all active exercise of office, until the Pope has solemnly "opened his mouth." Eugenius IV. declared Cardinals in this state incapable of voting in Consistory; but the restriction was removed by Pius IV. a century later, and accordingly Gregory XV. has ruled that every promulgated Cardinal—as distinguished from those in petto—has the inalienable right of the franchise. Seven Cardinals "with closed mouths" voted in the election of Clement X. in 1670, one of them being Clement himself. But in recent times this latter distinction has become a mere formality, though it still exists in theory, and might at any moment be revived, the closing and unsealing of a new Cardinal's mouth being accomplished in the same Consistory. On the other hand, a Cardinal's right of franchise in Papal elections once acquired is so strictly "inalienable," to use the term of Gregory XV., that no suspension, interdict, or excommunication can deprive him of it. This strange regulation was introduced by a Bull of Clement V. as a security against the passion or caprice of partisan Popes like Boniface VIII., who degraded the two Colonna Cardinals from their rank. Cardinal Soderini, who had been degraded and imprisoned for conspiracy by Adrian VI., was actually let out of prison, in spite of the dying injunctions of the Pope, to vote in the election of his successor, and said the Mass of the Holy Ghost at the opening of the Conclave. A still more notorious case occurred in 1740, when Cardinal Coscia, who had been imprisoned for the most scandalous crimes, was taken out of the Castle of St. Angelo to vote in Conclave. This precedent has never since been reversed. Pius IX., indeed, affected by a Brief in 1867 to deprive the late Cardinal Andrea of all "active and passive voice" in Papal elections; but the Cardinal's death, under sufficiently suspicious circumstances, two years later, makes it impossible to say whether the validity of this unprecedented and illegal stretch of authority would have been admitted had he survived the Pope.

It is obvious that a rank and title so exclusively connected with the Papal Court as distinguished from the Church must be materially affected, if not eventually superseded, by the loss of the temporal sovereignty. For centuries four-fifths at least of the Cardinals have always been Italians, as was only natural when they formed the Senate of an Italian prince, and the constituency that was to elect his successor, and from whom practically—for there is no canonical restriction, on their choice—that successor was to be chosen. On the contrary, nothing can be more unreasonable than that a body which is to form the ordinary Council of the chief pastor of the Universal Church, and from whose ranks he is to be elected, should represent any one particular country or nationality. If it is necessary that the Sovereign of Rome should be a Roman, any local restriction is singularly out of place in choosing the spiritual Father of Christendom. Pius IX. has already lived to fill up almost the whole Sacred College twice over. We shall watch with some curiosity his next batch of Cardinals, if the twenty places now vacant, and which he can hardly have an opportunity of filling more than once again, are indeed about to be supplied.

THE LEGAL DRAMA.

THE practical basis of the English character assures the success of the legal drama. We like to find ourselves entertained without having to call upon our imagination, for we know by experience that imagination is always dull and often deaf. The theatre and its mimic stage may be all very well when we can get nothing better. It may suit the season of youth, when we live and breathe in an atmosphere of illusions, and find the transition easy from the fairy tales of our childhood to representations of history and romance which are more or less realistic. But our maturer faculties are reluctant to lend themselves to a conspiracy against our common sense. We are sharp to remark the tragedy monarch dropping his h's, and to note the garish glitter of the glass in his consort's jewelled diadem. With Garrick we detect in the clothes of the courtly roué "as vulgar a ruffian as ever trod the boards," and if we are betrayed into visiting the pantomime, we prefer the boxes that command a view of the machinery. In all this we show a striking contrast to our neighbours the French. They may be congratulated on preserving the perennial freshness of the illusions that die so early with us. Accordingly they can afford to be comparatively indifferent to the legal drama, because all acting becomes reality to them almost without an effort of the mind. Versatile, volatile, and impressionable, their quickly won sympathy reacts on the performers, and the stage and the house confound themselves in a common loss of individuality. Molière, Sardou, or Offenbach can always count upon drawing, and the impossible vaudeville is accepted for the instant in all good faith. Even the business-like frequenter of the Bourse can change at any moment his world of finance for the realms of fancy, by the purchase of a ticket at some bureau de location. We can thus understand why, after their first novelty had worn off, the trials of the Communists ceased to prove attractive. Thus, too, we may explain the fact that struck the Times' Special Correspondent the other day, when two exceedingly sensational trials drew neither reporters nor public from Paris to Versailles. We English could not afford to waste rare chances of this sort. Sensations with us are so much more difficult to come by that we can ill afford to miss the opportunities that supply them. A Parisian may be indifferent to the legal drama, because it is often duller to him than the fictitious, in spite of the possible sensation of the dénouement. The first object of its authors is not the entertainment of the public; its best situations are merely incidental, and telling points are never absolutely to be reckoned upon. The piece hangs, as Justice drags across the stage with proverbial deliberation, and in the getting up there is a general absence of the artistic element. Circumstances are elaborated to monotony, and bits of incidental evidence assume extravagant importance as if in contempt for the impatience of the audience. The counsel want fire, and the ill-timed interruptions of the Bench are fatal to the flow of eloquence. There are exceptions, of course, and occasionally the enterprise or good fortune of a public prosecutor enables him to compete with his professional rivals of the Odéon and Français. In trials like that of Tropmann he can emphasize some thrilling horror by the production of material pièces de conviction, as Mr. Wear's yellow gig was produced on the London stage after the Gill's Lane tragedy. But while in our English Courts some of us would welcome such adventitious sensation as this, our peculiar nature enables us to dispense with it. When once it is borne in upon us that there is a great interest of life and property at stake, we can afford to wait patiently while the plot develops. Nay, we take a positive pleasure in dallying with enjoyment which we feel must at best be only too brief. The dull business-like examination and cross-examination of a witness by some slow counsel serves to sustain our sense of the grave material interests involved; careful attention to the Judge's tedious summing up is one of the intellectual efforts of which most of us seem to be capable. A strain it may be, but we feel that he is weighing the issues of life and death, or that he is wringing the very heart-strings of struggling claimants for a fortune.

We do not know that this feature in our character redounds greatly to our credit. At best it distorts to a vice the national virtue of earnestness; and were we to recognize the fact, it might prove a corrective to the aim of moral superiority which we are so fond of parading. We confess to the existence of sin and sorrow, and we admit the universal infirmities of human nature; yet we not critical of a statement which accompanied the discovery, that the present cathedral of Chester was "originally a Benedictine Abbey." The Times is the Times; it is our own times which it deals; we accept its statements as to what is actually going on among us, and we perhaps ought not to be particular as to things which happened so long ago as to come under the head of "originally." Indeed, the Times shows, on the whole, a very creditable amount of knowledge of the history of Chester. It knows that the present Bishopric was founded by Henry the Eighth, and it also knows that there were earlier Bishops of Chester, who were the same as the Bishops of Lichfield. It knows also that the seat of this earlier diocese was placed not at St. Werburgh's, but at St. John's. This is really an amount of local knowledge not at all to be despised, and on one who has got so far we should not be hard for putting his "originally" at a time so far removed as the latter years of the twelfth century, and for thinking that the Benedictine monks, who certainly were there then, had been there from the beginning. Thankful, then, for our great Gaelic fact, we will not do more than put in a gentle reminder that, as late as Domesday, St. Werburgh's was still served by secular canons, and that the Benedictine monks were a reformation or corruption, at all events an innovation, of Earl Hugh the Wolf, the builder of the earliest parts of the present church.

Our problem as to the ethnology of Chester city and county palatine is further complicated by a sermon alleged to have been preached by the Dean of Westminster in Chester Cathedral on Friday week, a sermon which the Daily News reported the next morning, but which the Times bottled up till the following Wednesday. We have compared the two versions, and we find no contradiction of any moment between them, though each, as so often happens, contains some things which are not to be found in the other. The Times, for instance, contains the statement that "for the first three centuries of the Christian era there were no churches at all, no places set apart for public worship anywhere." This statement the Dean is made to repeat, first with some vigour, and then with some signs of doubt. "There was not any one authentic instance, perhaps there was not one, in the whole of the first three ages." Dr. Stanley has been a Professor of Ecclesiastical History; so perhaps we ought only to ask, in an inquiring spirit, what then is the meaning of the accounts, accepted by most ecclesiastical historians, of the Christian churches which were pulled down under Diocletian? We confess that we rubbed our eyes over the report in the Times, and the Daily News seems to have been so puzzled with it as to leave it out altogether. But, to keep things straight, the Daily News presently contains another sentence which the Times leaves out, and which more nearly concerns our immediate subject:—"Chester Cathedral stood on the very outpost of the English frontier. It was the first English Cathedral that met the eyes of their wild Celtic ancestors far beyond the Dee in former times." Whose "wild Celtic ancestors"? The idea did flash across our mind that it was the Welshmen whom the Dean was addressing, and that the orator who spoke Gaelic was no other than Dr. Stanley himself. But there is no sign in either version that Dr. Stanley spoke any language but English, and the passage about "their wild Celtic ancestors" immediately follows an appeal to Cheshire men as such. We are therefore driven to believe that Cheshire men once had "wild Celtic ancestors"—wild Celtic ancestors who came from "far beyond the Dee." Mark again the careful prudence which avoids any more definite word than "Celtic." The wild ancestors of the Cheshire men were Celts from beyond the Dee; but it is not said that they were British, Welsh, Cymrian, or the like; they may, as far as this statement goes, very well have been a vestige of the Gael in Gwynedd. Mark also how lately they came into Cheshire. When they came from far beyond the Dee, "Chester Cathedral was the first English Cathedral that met their eyes." It is plain then that Dr. Stanley is talking of times since Henry the Eighth, since the foundation of the present Bishopric, when, in his own words, according to the Times, "the old Benedictine Abbey became the new Cathedral of Chester." We thus, by comparing our two authorities, get to the bottom of the whole mystery. Some time since the reign of Henry the Eighth Cheshire was settled by wild Celts from far beyond the Dee, who are the ancestors of the present Cheshire men. Thus much we learn from Dean Stanley. From our other informant we learn that the city of Chester still contains a considerable Gaelic-speaking population. The two statements help out one another. We now know from what branch of the Celts the wild ancestors of the present Cheshire men sprang. They were not Cymry but Gael, a most important fact in British ethnology. Some time then within the last three centuries a Gaelic settlement from some part of North Wales occupied Cheshire, they became the ancestors of the people of the county palatine, and in the city itself they still retain their language. The fact is new and striking; it is especially strange that, contrary to what commonly happens in such cases, the Gaelic tongue has survived in the city, while, as far as we have ever heard, it is not to be found in the county at large. We will not say Credo quis impossibile ait; the fact rests on a much higher line of argument. It is established out of the mouth of two witnesses, and that by a series of undesigned coincidences. No evidence, according to all rules of historical criticism, can be better.

With this great discovery fresh in our minds, we are not in a mood for cavilling. Otherwise we might ask what is meant by Chester Cathedral being "a fragment, as it were, of that old Roman fortress and stronghold from which it takes its name." Again, the Cathedral is "the depository, the centre, of a long and varied history in Church and State." "That outward church arose first out of the living deed—works of the first of that ancient Royal Saxon line of which almost every daughter was a saint-faithful or a saint." The first of the ancient Royal Saxon line was, according to all orthodox genealogy, no other than Woden. Woden then, and no smaller person, was the founder of Chester Cathedral, and, to judge from the passage about the "fragment," it would seem that, like Theoderic at Ravenna and Abbot Paul at St. Albans, he built it out of Roman remains. Of course we need not believe that any part of his work is now standing, any more than we have the work of Augustine at Canterbury, or of Dunstan at Glastonbury. It might be objected that Woden, if not himself an idol, was at least an idolater, and was therefore an unlikely person to be the founder of a Christian church. But, if Voltaire built a church, why not Woden? The tolerances of early times, whether at the court of Alexander Severus or at that of Æthelberht, went a good way. Some months back we gathered from Dr. Stanley himself that Stuf and Wiltgar, unbaptised descendants of Woden, were the founders of the church of Carisbrook. Why then should not Woden himself be the founder of the greater church of Chester? Then again, according to Professor Westwood, the tombstone of a grandson or great-grandson of Woden is still to be seen near Edinburgh, with a contemporary Latin inscription. This Romanising taste was most likely hereditary in the family, and it quite falls in with the notion of Woden using Roman materials in the construction of his building. On the whole, we recommend this view of the foundation of St. Werburgh's to the careful consideration of antiquaries, though we cannot receive it with the same undoubting confidence as the Gaelic occupation of Cheshire, the great "neglected fact" or "omitted chapter" in English history.

WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

IT must be allowed that the agitation for woman's suffrage in England is poor and tame compared with that of which reports come to us from the United States. We are told that at a convention lately held in Washington the celebrated Mrs. Woodhull was somewhat reserved during the morning, but "let herself out" in the evening. We have sufficient acquaintance with the speeches and writings of Mrs. Woodhull to be able to realise, as Americans are fond of saying, the discourse in which she let herself out against the political and social arrangements of which she disapproves. According to one report of this convention, Miss Anthony defended Mrs. Woodhull against "immoral charges." We do not know who were the persons who brought these charges, or what they were; but we should have thought that the task of defending Mrs. Woodhull against herself would have tried to the utmost the friendly eloquence of Miss Anthony. Besides "letting herself out" at Washington, Mrs. Woodhull went to Boston and delivered a lecture on "Free Love," which was enough to rouse the austere founders of that city from their graves. It is curious to speculate upon the probable treatment of this doctrine of "free love" under the severe discipline of the Puritan colonists of New England. Mrs. Woodhull, according to the report, argued that it was her inalienable constitutional and national right "to love whom I may, to love for as long or as short a period as I can, and to change that love every day if I please." It is extravagant to suppose that any such doctrine could have been propounded in the early history of Boston, but we know what was likely to happen to man or woman whose conduct might appear to be a practical anticipation of the doctrine. But the severity of Puritanism has been greatly mitigated at Boston. Mrs. Woodhull's enunciation of the principles of free love provoked "a little scene," but the moral people of Boston, as the reporter calls them, received the lecturer pretty well, and she doubtless proceeded to let herself out in a strain of argument which Miss Anthony would have some difficulty in persuading us is not immoral.

It appears that some of the American advocates of woman's suffrage are beginning to be dissatisfied with their association with the energetic champion of their cause who speaks so very freely upon the subject of free love. A lady who signs herself "Olivia Logan" writes to a newspaper to disclaim the distinction which had been conferred upon herself and her husband of "standing in the front line of the ultra-progressionists of the age in regard to marriage." We presume that the honour which Mrs. Logan disclaims would be cheerfully accepted by Mrs. Woodhull. Indeed, we think that the "platform" on which she placed herself before the Bostonians must be on a level with the most advanced line of progress. Mrs. Logan, however, has either never reached this line, or has recently performed what a Yankee would call "a considerable backwardation" from it. She has heard that it has been reported that she and her husband regard the religious ceremony which took place on the occasion of their marriage "as a concession to the prejudices of the unenlightened majority." This report, says she, is entirely untrue. Indeed she goes so far as to declare that, if woman's suffrage means free love, she is opposed to woman's suffrage. We sympathise with Mrs. Logan, but at the same time we must confess that we should like to hear Mrs. Woodhull letting out against her. It certainly cannot be alleged that Mrs. Woodhull or her defender Miss Anthony made any concession to the prejudices of that unenlightened majority in which we must reckon ourselves. On the contrary, Miss Anthony took "the broad ground" that social degradation ought not to affect political rights, or, in other words, that the class whom she, or the reporter of her speech, calls "prostitutes" were as much entitled as herself to share in the agitation for woman's suffrage. We have ourselves been particularly careful not to adopt the ugly word which seems to be used in this report as descriptive of the professors of the doctrine of free love. We feel a difficulty in distinguishing between Mrs. Woodhull's Bostonian "platform" and the principles which would be likely to be held by the class to which Miss Anthony refers, supposing that that class held any principles at all. But then we belong, as we have already admitted, to an unenlightened majority which requires concession to its prejudices, and thinks that a man and woman ought to be married before they proceed to live together for a longer or shorter period. We remember a play, long since banished from the stage, in which the fun turns upon the mistake of a gentleman who visits the house of a lady under the belief that it is a resort of the class which Miss Anthony invites to join her in agitating for woman's suffrage. It seems to us that a male reader of Mrs. Woodhull's "platform" might possibly fail to perceive the distinction between free love and something which we will not name.

It is perhaps one of our prejudices which causes us to speak of Mrs. Woodhull's school of morality with a reserve which her disciples do not imitate. We observed in a recent number of her journal a correspondent's letter which appears to treat of that development of free love which in the Old World is called adultery. This letter states that a very intelligent millionaire in Wall Street, who also indulges in scientific farming and cattle-breeding, remarked lately that he was proud of his stock outside his house, but that he was ashamed of his stock inside. This millionaire being intelligent, is happily free from prejudices which have widely prevailed in all ages and countries of the world except perhaps in the nineteenth century in America. If, he said, he was as free to experiment inside the house as outside, he would bet half his fortune that he would improve the domestic stock as much as the stock outside. There are obviously two ways and no more in which the "domestic stock" could be improved, and it is not perhaps clear which of these two ways the intelligent millionaire preferred. The correspondent remarks that, when such "scientific aspirations" got spread among "money kings," who are a good deal in the habit of having what they want, the institution of civilized marriage will undergo as severe a strain as that of civilized slavery lately did. It is unfortunately true that even in England rich men are much in the habit of having what they want, but still their "scientific aspirations" are not always gratified with impunity, while those of their wives are liable to severe condemnation. The intelligent millionaire who desired to improve the "domestic stock," might, if he had been an English peer, have perceived that, under the guidance of scientific aspirations, an inconvenient confusion might arise as to what the stock was. If he supposed that his sex might indulge in scientific aspirations which would be forbidden to the other sex, it is desirable that Mrs. Woodhull should repeat at New York the lecture which she lately gave at Boston. As a leading contributor to her journal puts the claim of woman, "the freedom to be healthy must be absolute." As long as a woman can be crushed by an imputation of impropriety, she will remain, says this writer, virtually a slave. A woman who is conscious of being true to herself, will disregard "the worst word of vituperative slang" which the world can hurl at her, and she will proceed to develop her own destiny in accordance with the design of her being. Here, again, our unenlightened prejudice crops up, and we venture to suggest that, with husbands improving the domestic stock and wives developing their own destinies, society would have a tendency to become chaotic.

We do not of course impute to the advocates of woman's suffrage in England a full and deliberate participation in Mrs. Woodhull's plan for regenerating humanity. But some of the persons who agitate for woman's rights occasionally use suspicious language as to woman's duties. The term "female polygamist" was invented by one of these persons to describe the class which Miss Anthony invites to co-operate with Mrs. Woodhull and herself. It is remarkable that some of the persons who are active in demanding woman's suffrage in England have made themselves conspicuous in agitating for the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Act. If this agitation has been caused by sympathy for the class to which the Act applies, we think that the sympathizers are entirely mistaken, as the Act has already done more good to this class than they are likely to get by woman's suffrage, which Miss Anthony begs them to join her in demanding. We believe that Englishwomen will not readily advance to the point at which Mrs. Woodhull and her disciples now stand, but some of them are undeniably moving in the same direction at a slower pace. "The freedom to be healthy must be absolute. As long as woman can be crushed by an imputation of impropriety she will remain virtually a slave." These words, which we once more quote from Mrs. Woodhull's journal, express a demand for the enfranchisement of women in the very largest sense. It is time, says Miss Anthony, speaking on the same side, that women should throw off the mock modesty which has maddled them for so long a time, and deal plainly with facts as they are. We really hope that it is not time. We entreat the women of England to continue to wear the mantle of modesty, at least as a concession to the prejudices of the unenlightened majority of men. We have felt compelled to deal plainly with the fact of the existence of Mrs. Woodhull, but the task is particularly disagreeable.

THE THEATRE.

A PLAY has been performed for some weeks at the Princess's Theatre which curiously exemplifies the caprices of popular taste. We should have thought that this play, which is called On the Jury, was at least as attractive as many others. It is a story of domestic life, by no means ill told, and there is an exciting scene in which a boat is upset and the heroine is rescued by her lover from drowning in the Thames, in sight of London Bridge and London. It appears hardly worth while to engage Mr. Phelps to play a principal part in a piece in which another principal part is given to a very poor imitation of a river steamboat. The piece is undeniably acceptable to pit and gallery, although less so as regards the higher-priced parts of the house. It is difficult to believe that anybody who cares for those scenes in which Mr. Phelps produces a considerable impression can care also for a representation, which is necessarily inadequate, of the upsetting of a boat by the swell of a steamer in the Thames. Opinions may differ as to the rank to which Mr. Phelps is entitled among actors, but at least it may be said that that which in past years he has done best he still does as well as ever. The upsetting of the boat on the Thames is preceded by a waterside scene, in which several persons pass over the stage, and one of them stops and buys a penny pie. This is the sort of thing which occurs frequently in pantomimes. It is not in itself funny, but we always know when such a scene occurs in a pantomime that the fun, such as it is, will begin directly the clown commences his usual operations on the pie-man. But it happens that there is a pantomime of by no means lively character at this theatre, and we cannot help thinking that in it we get enough of penny pies—not to say too much—to serve us for a single evening. Probably the incident of the purchase of a pie by a waterman, who states that it is the first bit of food he has tasted that day, is introduced in order to give an air of reality to the upsetting of the boat, which is transacted directly after it. We feel some regret that Mr. Phelps, after a lifelong devotion to the highest department of the drama, should be induced to ally himself towards the close of his career with those dramatists who depend upon sensational incidents for their success. Yet neither Mr. Phelps, nor any other actor, however accomplished, can depend wholly upon the dramas of past ages to maintain their position in public favour. And besides, if Mr. Phelps proposes to appear in the Man of the World, or some other comedy of the last century, there is the formidable difficulty of finding actors and actresses to perform with him who can assume the dress and manners of the period with propriety. We should, on this account, have been glad to see the piece called On the Jury, more successful than it is, and still more to find in it more merit than we can fairly say that it possesses. The introduction of the pie-man reminds us of the tight-rope dancer who, for one night only, was added to the other attractions of the Last Days of Pompeii, at the Queen's Theatre. It might be supposed that a drama founded on the novel of that name would be likely, if tolerably well acted, to succeed; but the manager must have a strange conception of his own aim if he expected that tight-rope dancing would help him to attain it. There is still a difference between a high-class theatre and a music-hall, and we believe that the experiment of combining the attractions of both at the Queen's Theatre was not carried beyond one night.

The moderate success which has attended a piece supported by Mr. Phelps and Mr. Webster causes surprise at the great success of another piece to which we should have ascribed even smaller intrinsic merit. The play called Partners for Life has now drawn fashionable audiences to the Globe Theatre for more than one hundred nights, and we are told that the attraction lies not so much in the piece itself as in Mr. Montague's acting of a part in it. We will quote, as a specimen of this play, the only incident which we happen, after a few weeks' interval, to remember. A servant announces dinner, and as the company pass out of the drawing-room he offers his arm to a lady, who comes alone and last in the procession, and says, "Allow me, Madam." Such an incident would be tolerable, but not particularly funny, in a farce; but in a genteel comedy, which the Prince of Wales went twice to see before his illness, its introduction is marvellous. As regards Mr. Montague's acting, we can only wish that he had something to act; but there is a scene near the end in which a barrister's blue bag is introduced, which deserves to be compared with the purchase of a penny pie at the Princess's Theatre. We certainly do not complain that the public is amused, or that the Globe Theatre is enjoying a prosperity which it has not often known. But it is wonderful that there are not more and better dramatists, when the rewards of success in dramatic literature are so considerable. The plays of the late Mr. Robertson still support the theatre where his faculty for writing modern comedy first became conspicuous. If there be an author capable of filling the place which his untimely death left void, managers, we should think, would be glad to hear of him. A piece rather better than Partners for Life, and equally well acted, would certainly run for a whole year. The public is disposed to be very grateful to those who may be able to amuse it.

Another dramatic event equally surprising is the success of a play founded upon classical mythology. We spoke lately of a musical piece in which the scene is laid upon Mount Olympus, and Jupiter is informed by Thespis, the manager of a company of actors, that he and the other gods are only available for theatrical purposes in burlesque. This piece is a great improvement on the ordinary burlesques with which our theatres are overdone, and it might have been expected that a classical subject would yield itself pleasantly to that kind of treatment. But the play called Pygmalion and Galatea, which now attracts good houses at the Haymarket Theatre, has neither music nor scenic accessories to contribute towards the success which it has undoubtedly attained. Nothing could have appeared more improbable than the result which Mr. Gilbert, with the assistance of manager and company, has produced. The public has become so familiar with attempts to make the scene-painter supply the deficiencies of authors and actors, that it cannot greatly care for a "Greek interior" which remains unchanged throughout this play; and as regards dresses, although brilliant in colour and probably correct in shape, they only serve to impress upon our minds that the wearers are British born and bred, and not the least bit of Greeks. Mr. Buckstone is an established favourite, and his appearance as a wealthy Athenian is probably considered by the audience as a good joke, irrespectively of how he looks and what he says. The part of an Athenian soldier is played by Mr. Howe, an actor who, in the course of a long and creditable association with this theatre, has changed from slight youth to a portly middle age to which perhaps a round hat and an umbrella might be more suitable than a brazen panoply modelled from the Achilles in Hyde Park. The sentiments of patriotism which this valiant Athenian utters are doubtless shared, like his corpulence, by many British volunteers. These depreciatory observations, which inevitably suggest themselves to a spectator of this play, are really high commendation, because they show that it has succeeded in spite of formidable difficulties. An ordinary English actor can do almost anything in the range of his profession better than he can wear a suit of armour; and as Mr. Buckstone is always Mr. Buckstone, his appearance as an ancient Greek directs our thoughts towards the region of burlesque, in spite of our knowledge that this theatre lies beyond it. Nevertheless the author has contrived to tell a pretty story pleasantly, and he does not allow his audience to yield to the temptation to laugh in the wrong place. He has altered the classical legend by providing Pygmalion with a wife; so that when the statue comes to life there is no place ready for her in the sculptor's household, nor is it easy to acquit the gods who vivified it of a malevolent purpose of providing business for the Divorce Court. The young person who has thus been introduced into an uncomfortable world has the good sense, as soon as she understands the circumstances of her position, to retire from it. She goes behind the screen from which she had originally emerged into life, and returns to stone. The gods having thus withdrawn their injurious favour, the domestic happiness of Pygmalion is restored, while that of the valiant soldier in scarlet and brass is announced as shortly to begin. It is manifest that the success, which is unquestionable, of this hazardous experiment is largely due to Miss Robertson, who plays the part of the animated statue.

The successful revival of Mr. Boucicault's comedy of London Assurance at the Vaudeville Theatre excites feelings at once of pleasure and regret. This amusing play is well acted, and is received with hearty applause; and we ask ourselves as the curtain falls why it should be impossible for this author to attain the same kind and degree of success again after more than thirty years of observation of life and theatrical experience. It surely could not have been from want of encouragement that he deserted the field in which this early and brilliant triumph was achieved. The allusions of the play have an almost archaic flavour, but the hand that wrote it still exerts a powerful, although mischievous, influence on the stage. The scene is laid for the most part in Gloucestershire, and the time is 1841, when actions of crim. con. and suits in the Consistorial Court flourished, and runaway lovers depended wholly on a postchaise and four horses to escape pursuit. Sir Harcourt Courtly still sends an anticipatory account of his elopement with Lady Gay Spanker to the Herald, disregarding the fact that that respectable journal has gone the same way as the elder Farren and Mrs. Nisbett, whom some of us remember as the delightful representatives of those characters. Those who have seen the father in this play will like to see the son, and those who have not seen the father, should see the son, in order to gain some idea of what the father was. If Mr. Boucicault could now write another play like this, he would find in Mr. W. Farren and other members of the same company efficient help in embodying his ideas, and the result of the joint labours of author and actors would be prosperity to all concerned. But Mr. Boucicault probably finds it equally profitable and much easier to write, or rather to put together, such plays as Formosa, instead of endeavouring to improve in mature age upon his early work. It is hardly possible that he is insensible to the fact that London Assurance is applauded by people who witnessed Formosa with wonder mingled with contempt. The success of this revival is as undeniable as that of the new play called Partners for Life, and it is far more easy to explain; for the revived play is the best work of Mr. Boucicault, while the new play is neither better nor worse than twenty other recent plays of Mr. Byron. The elder dramatist has produced at least one enduring comedy, while the younger hardly pretends to do anything more than write a play which may last until he has had time to write another. It is strange that Mr. Boucicault should have created a sort of standard which marks the decline of dramatic art which he himself exemplifies.

REVIEWS.

FREEMAN'S NORMAN CONQUEST.—VOL. IV.*

THE new volume of his History of the Norman Conquest brings us practically to the close of Mr. Freeman's work. He has still to examine the immediate influence of the great revolution which he has described on the social and intellectual condition of the conquered country, and to trace its constitutional results as far as the reign of Edward I. But as a direct historical narrative his work ends with the death of William at the close of the present volume. If we compare it with its predecessors, it stands in some ways, no doubt, at a certain disadvantage. As a writer Mr. Freeman is emphatically "among them that delight in war," and though there is fighting enough in the ground he traverses here, there is no such great contest as that of Senlac to fire him to the enthusiasm which flowed through his story of the death-struggle between William and Harold. Nor is there that novelty in the subject of William's rule itself which made his account of the Conqueror's reign a distinct addition to English history. On the contrary, he is necessarily forced to traverse ground which has been already traversed by two great historians. In spite of the depreciatory references to Thierry which crowd the pages before us, we remain convinced that no amount of blundering can destroy the artistic value, the literary grace, the picturesqueness, and interest of Thierry's work; while, fragmentary as is the condition in which Sir Francis Palgrave's account has come down to us, its learning and originality make it a formidable rival to all after-comers. On the other hand, the present volume has a dramatic unity which its predecessors necessarily lacked. Throughout it we are at home. The story does not run on two legs; it no longer carries us abruptly from England to Normandy only to whirl us abruptly back from Normandy to England. In the former portion of the work this double character was inevitable, but during the reign of William the part played by Continental affairs is so small that it hardly interrupts the purely English current of the narrative. It is a still greater gain that our sympathies are not distracted by the presence of a couple of heroes. Harold is dead and buried, and throughout the present volume we are face to face with the Conqueror alone.

The disadvantages of his present story bring some of Mr. Freeman's merits conspicuously to the front. It is no slight praise to say that in historical lists like these he has fairly borne down his competitors, that he has added interest to a story which Thierry has handled, and discovered materials for the illustration of the Conquest which had escaped the research of Palgrave. If it is impossible to make the story wholly novel, he has at any rate given novelty to almost every part of it by his remarkable use of the details preserved in Domesday, and by his descriptive sketches of English towns, while the lack of military interest is atoned for by constitutional dissertations in which he stands immensely above his two predecessors. But though he can battle bravely with the disadvantages of his subject, Mr. Freeman shows less inclination to grasp its advantages. The distinctive peculiarity of the present volume, as we have said, is that from one end of it to the other we are face to face with the Conqueror. William is no mere name round which the historian may group a varied series of events which happened to occur in his time. His own vigorous personality meets us at every turn. From his coronation to his grave he fills the whole canvas. The terrible conquest, the wise reorganization, the mingled order and tyranny of his rule, the triumphs of its opening, the calamities of its close, all are his own. It is William whose sword hews its way from Cornwall to the Frith of Forth, or whose statesmanship plans that wonderful union of the older Teutonic constitution with the newer feudalism which created the England in which we live. Able men like Lanfranc are his counsellors, but they are never more than his counsellors. The work, for good or ill, is always his own. It is seldom that a man of such intellectual stature stands out so distinctly on the canvas of his time. The flatteries of his chaplain, the cold censure of the English chronicler, the traditions that floated down in the great houses of the Conquest, the letters of Lanfranc, the stories of Orderic, a hundred of such anecdotes as men of this sort are sure to grave deep in the popular memory, all enable us to know William as few historic heroes can be known. His character itself, too, is full of grand contrasts—the Norseman struggling with the civilizer, the wild passions of a savage bursting through the crust of the statesman. Few figures, in a word, are more fitted to kindle the imagination of the historian; and it is a little disappointing when we find that Mr. Freeman regards it with a coldness which tells upon every page of his book. It is not that he is ever purposely unjust to the Conqueror; it is that one feels throughout what a distinctly moral effort it costs him to be just. More than just he is resolute not to be. There is not a trace of sympathy, of fervid admiration, of enthusiasm in the picture. The historian has washed off the brilliant colours in which he painted Harold from his palette, and sketches his great rival accurately and conscientiously, but in grey. The result is inevitable. We bow with respect before the care and accuracy which are displayed, but we gain no lifelike impression of William.

The result is the more provoking that it does not spring from any want of power in the painter himself. Of all characters in our history Harold's is the one of whom we actually know least, yet Mr. Freeman has known how to create a Harold. William's life and character, on the other hand, is preserved to us with an amazing fulness, yet Mr. Freeman has left the Conqueror a figure without warmth or interest. What it really springs from is, if we may venture to term it so, an historic caprice. Mr. Freeman has chosen for his judgment of William the standpoint of a Peterborough monk of the eleventh century, who has left us his impressions of the Conqueror in the English Chronicle. With the chronicler, he is awed by William's amazing greatness, he is ready on the whole to do justice to his moral excellence, but he is not going to like him any more than the monk of Peterborough likes him. The choice of such a standpoint undoubtedly gives a certain originality and force to Mr. Freeman's view of the matter; but the standpoint is, after all, an artificial one; the English feeling about the Conqueror, or indeed any estimate of his own time, can only fairly be taken into account as elements in the larger appreciation of his character which history demands. On the other hand, this almost contemporary feeling which pervades Mr. Freeman's work has its obvious advantages in dealing with the time itself. The clearness and precision with which it enables the historian to grasp the very different aspects of different periods during William's reign appear in the opening of the present volume. Nothing can be finer than the way in which Mr. Freeman points out the character of William's position as soon as the coronation made him legally an English King. Resistance became in the eyes of a large proportion of his subjects rebellion, and all hope of any combined national rising was at once lost. It was with local revolts that the Conqueror had henceforth to deal, and these revolts left half the realm untouched from first to last. If we set aside the momentary outbreak in Kent, which had nothing to do with William himself, the whole country eastward of a line from the Fens to Lincolnshire remained steadfastly loyal to the new sovereign:—

The coronation took place, as I have said, during a moment of apparent universal submission; if all England had not acknowledged William, no part of England acknowledged any one else. The struggle which followed was a reaction after a panic; it was the revolt of a people goaded to revolt by the oppression far less of William himself than of William's unworthy lieutenants. In all those parts of the country which had already submitted to the new King, it was strictly rebellion, however justifiable rebellion, against an established government. And even in those parts to which William's power had not yet reached, in those parts which he had to subdue by force after his coronation, the struggle bore a somewhat different character from that of simple national resistance to foreign invasion. When the men of Exeter or Chester made defiance to William, they were bidding defiance to the only de facto King and government in England. Their resistance was therefore local rather than national; each city and district fought for its own hand, not for the common freedom of the whole realm. A land therefore which resisted bit by bit was, in the nature of things, conquered bit by bit.

Nor did William assume in this earlier period of his reign the character of a Conqueror at all. He regarded himself, and he called on England to regard him, as the lawful successor of Eadward, elected by the free choice of the people, and crowned formally by the Church. Of course there were difficulties in the way of such a theory, whether arising from his own Norman followers, whose greed it effectually checked, or from the stubborn resistance of a large part of his English subjects. Still there can be no doubt that at the outset William held it, and held it firmly. There was a striking likeness, as Mr. Freeman points out, between his position and that of Cnut, and what difference there was between them seemed all in his favour. William's accession was followed by few confiscations, and by no such judicial murders as had disgraced the opening of the Danish rule. The land, too, so far as outer appearances went, had accepted William's rule. The oppression of his lieutenants during his absence in Normandy did little to disturb its tranquillity; the disturbances in Kent and Hereford were easily suppressed; and an English party was growing up, especially among the trading and ecclesiastical classes, in William's favour. No one, we think, has definitely pointed out before the real relation of England to the Conqueror during the year which followed William's coronation. But his position as an English sovereign is strikingly shown in his early campaign against Exeter and the cities of the West. The account of their confederation and revolt forms one of the most remarkable passages in the volume; the claims of Exeter seem oddly to have resembled those of the Italian towns a century later. Its burghers offered to pay tribute, but they would accept no king or king's reeve within their walls. The notable thing, however, is that the revolt was put down by an English army, and the conquered citizens were treated as subjects rather than vanquished strangers by their conqueror.

The fine description which Mr. Freeman has given of Exeter itself is an admirable instance of the way in which the local position and the archaeological features of a place may be made to contribute to the illustration of general history. It is by a series of pictures of this sort that he has succeeded in giving interest to the period which followed this year of peaceful subjugation, the period strictly speaking of the Conquest. Of the successive campaigns in which William trampled down the revolts which burst forth around him we know comparatively little, except in the great crisis which followed the appearance of Sweyn's fleet in the North. The best part of Mr. Freeman's work lies in his reconstruction, if we may use a Niebuhrian phrase, of this lost period of history by means of a careful survey of Domesday Book, and of a close local acquaintance with the towns which fell before the Conqueror's sword. One such picture is particularly interesting. Lincoln witnessed not merely the creation of a new French town on the height now crowned by its castle and minster, but the actual transfer of the elder English burgh to a new and lower site:—

For a small part of them a dwelling-place was found in a manner which forms one of the most interesting pieces of local history in England. Within the city, at the foot of the hill, beyond the stream of the Witham, lay a waste piece of land which had never been dwelt upon by man. This the King granted to his English favourite Colsweigen. A new town began to arise. At the time of the Survey thirty-six inhabited houses, inhabited doubtless by men who had lost their homes on the height, formed part of the estate of Colsweigen. For the use of his tenants he built two churches, the most striking portions of which still remain. They still bear witness, in their tall slender towers and windows of the more ancient fashion, that even while the Norman castle and the Norman minster were rising above their heads, Englishmen could still build in earlier and more national forms of art. Reared as they were after King William came into England, the works of Colsweigen, the towers of Saint Peter-at-Gowts and Saint Mary-le-Wigford still reproduce that style of building which Wilfrith and his contemporaries had brought from Rome, and which so long remained the common heritage of Western Christendom. I hardly know of any works of man which speak more strongly to the heart than these two stern and unadorned, yet stately, towers, reared, in the days of bondage, by an Englishman who, by whatever means, contrived to hold up his head among the conquerors of England, and to win no small share of the honours which belong to the founders of new temples of God and of new dwelling-places of man.

Domesday has been worked into the fabric of the history with similar skill. One of Mr. Freeman's discoveries by means of it is that of an early forfeiture and redemption of lands, which must have followed immediately on William's accession. But through every stage of the Conquest we are allowed to see the social and agrarian revolution which followed the march of the Conqueror. Domesday, indeed, is made to do such yeoman's service to history throughout the present volume that we can hardly complain if Mr. Freeman shows himself less sensible of the other opportunities for illustrating this period which present themselves in less trustworthy quarters. We find, for instance, the dealings of the D'Oillys with the Abbey of Abingdon, which in the monastic Chronicle present such a vivid picture of the wrong and violence which went on during the Conquest, and yet of the good which mingled with it; but the tale is reduced to its most prosaic form, and buried in an appendix. Yet we can hardly conceive a story which would have brought home more forcibly to an ordinary reader the actual condition of the country at the time. Little social pictures like that of Blachemann's home at Abingdon need hardly have been left in the obscurity of notes. But even when noting here and there a fact which is denied to us, we are astonished at the enormous mass of fresh information which Mr. Freeman has been enabled to give.

MUSTERS'S PATAGONIA.*

OUR attention was drawn some six months ago to the geography and physical features of the extreme South of the American Continent by Mr. Cunningham's excellent Report of the Survey of the Straits of Magellan by the officers of H.M.S. Nassau, to which he was attached as naturalist. Though not equally exact or scientific in his descriptions of the country, its products, or its physical phenomena generally, the account brought home by Commander Musters of his explorations and experiences about the same period will be read with no less interest for the authentic and lifelike sketches which he gives of a district and a race little known to the ordinary reader. The very absence of scientific scope or of technical details for which the writer apologizes will possibly be hailed as redeeming the book from what is too often found a source of dryness and tedium by the unsentimental many. At the same time it need not be supposed that Mr. Musters writes simply for the entertainment of the shallow, or for the excitement of those who love sensation. Tales of stirring adventure and hairbreadth escapes are not, he plainly tells us, in his line. His object is, by a faithful and unadorned record of his twelve months' life amongst the wild tribes of the South, to make his readers feel as much at home as himself in those wild scenes and that singular society.

A chance visit to the Falkland Islands in April 1869, in the course of a business trip to Buenos Ayres, fanned into a flame the spark of curiosity and interest which had been first kindled during a previous term of service on the South American coast by the study of the charming works of Darwin and Fitzinger. Armed with the best credentials, as well as with the necessary appliances for the purposes of travel, observation, and sport, and relying much upon a tolerable knowledge of Spanish, Mr. Musters availed himself of the offer of an old friend who was bound for the Western Coast, and after a boisterous passage of eleven days found himself at Possession Bay, just within the entrance of the Strait, with the mountains of Tierra del Fuego distinctly visible to the South and West. To his great good luck he came to Punta Arenas just on the eve of a small expedition being despatched by the Commandante, Señor Viel, to Vera Cruz in search of some runaways from that convict settlement. To penetrate the continent to this point being his cherished design, Mr. Musters was delighted with the Commandante's permission to join this party, and to leave behind him the desolate sandy point, the daintiness and cosmopolitan of which were bitterly bemoaned by the Señora Viel, a fair representative of the proverbial charms of the ladies of Lima. The Spanish penal settlement, transferred hither from the still more inhospitable site of Port Famine, is a place of poor resources, severe climate, and arid soil, producing little beyond potatoes; chiefly important for its command of the Straits, to which the recent discovery of rich beds of steam coal gives the promise of unbounded development. Hence, under the guidance of Lieutenant Gallegos, commanding the party, a thorough man for hard work—short, thickset, swart as an Indian, and not less skilful in throwing the bola or the lazo—our author took the first plunge into the boundless Pampas. We are not, he warns us, to conjure up pictures of the Pampas as the rich grassy or thistle-covered plains, rolling away for miles on miles, drawn in Sir Francis Head's delightful book. The word is applied indiscriminately by the Indians who have picked up a little Ostentian to any tract of country hunted over by them. After a successful day's sport and a hearty feast they will ask with great gusto, "¿Muy buena Pampa? No?" "Is not the wild life the best?" But the Pampas of Patagonia, properly so called, though occasionally spreading for miles of grassy surface, are more frequently, if not broken by hills and suddenly yawning ravines, utterly sterile, or presenting a sparse vegetation of stunted bushes and round thistle clumps, or even nothing more than bare patches of clay or gravel strewn with huge broken boulders, or rugged with broken volcanic masses. In winter an unbroken sheet of snow covers grass, rocks, and shingle alike, and the word Pampa invariably recalls to the memory either the cutting blast which sweeps the land from the hills to the West and South, or the terrific Pampero from the heated atmosphere of Buenos Ayres, which causes such disasters among the shipping. Over these plains, thickly strewn in places with gigantic volcanic débris, testifying to tremendous eruptive convulsions at no remote period of geological time, our traveller's path lay with little variety to Santa Cruz. Few Indians were met with among these barren wastes. At Santa Cruz Mr. Musters's desire of seeing more of the haunts and manners of the wild children of the plains was furthered by the opportune arrival of Casimiro, self-styled chief of the Tehuelches, by whom, as interpreter, he was introduced to Orkeke, a cacique who had just come in with a party of the Northern Tehuelche clan. With this fine old man, six feet in height, who, in vaulting upon a bare-backed steed on leading the chase, showed no sign of having passed his sixtieth year, Mr. Musters soon contracted an intimate friendship, and months spent in his company confirmed the impression of his intelligence and general qualities, which his fine features and thoughtful aspect inspired from the first. Though particularly neat and cleanly in his habits, Orkeke was not exempt from the plague of vermin, to which all Indians are victims, rousing his guest one night to have a smoke, and, after sitting a long while lost in thought, remarking, "Musters, hie never sleep." Though by no means a total abstainer, he was never guilty of great excess in drink, and it was an understood thing that either he or his brother Tankelow should, on occasions of a grand drinking bout, keep sober to protect their families. With him Mr. Musters decided on casting in his lot, seeing his friend and former guide Gallegos depart southwards with the deserters he had recovered, not without leaving behind many warnings as to the almost certain destruction which awaited the adventurous Englishman.

The winter was agreeably spent on the island of Pabon, the pleasant residential centre of the trading station of Santa Cruz, held by commission under the Argentine Government by Don Luis T. Buena, a captain in the navy. Mr. Clarke, an active agent from New England, with the missionaries Schmidt and Hart, who had worked hard for the conversion and civilization of the Indians, made up a pleasant and instructive party till the dawn of spring gave the opportunity of a fresh start. The interval afforded our author the means of studying the language, characters, and manners of his native hosts, and joining in many of their exciting scenes of sport. Guanaco and ostrich, with an occasional puma, by the aid of dogs or skilful throwing of the bola or lazo from horseback, kept the hunters supplied with food or with the excitement of the chase. At the breaking up of the camp or toils, after some attempts on the part of Casimiro, whose career betrays him to have been a drunken disreputable fellow, to secure the English traveller to himself, Mr. Musters, with Orkeke and the old Bluebeard's sixth wife, a strapping young woman six feet in height and of proportionate breadth across the shoulders, Tankelow, his son and daughter, sundry natives and Chilean hunters who had camped recently, rode forth up the valley of the Rio Chico. The journey was unpleasantly diversified at starting by the sudden outbreak of an old vendetta between the Southern and Northern Indians of the party, ending in a kind of pitched battle, in which the opposing chiefs, Casimiro and Orkeke, met their deaths. We do not know of decisive movements of the nature of this band of natives, but an opportunity occurred of testing their strength, a large spherical boulder being thrown at a place called Anaken, which it is an old custom with the Indians to lift as a trial of muscle. It was so large and heavy that Mr. Musters could barely grasp it with both arms and raise it to the level of his knee; but some of the Indians managed to lift it to their shoulders. The rocks on the line of route were chaotic and rugged beyond all powers of description. One day the party encamped in a glen or corrie, apparently without a second outlet, walled in by frowning cliffs. All the rest of their march lay through a barren desert of rocks, frequently intersected by deep ravines, the faces of the precipitous cliffs on either hand displaying beds of red and yellow ochre, from which the women, after a difficult scramble, replenished their stores of paint. Desolate and generally waterless, the region afforded few opportunities for hunting, though at times flocks of the large ibis, called in Chili "bandarras" (Theristicus melanopus), were seen. An ostrich nest was luckily found by Tankelow, with thirty eggs, one of which fell to our author's share. To the east of the track, for thirty or forty miles, extends a district known to the Indians as "the Devil's Country," which they asserted was never entered, being wholly barren and impracticable. Beyond this is a practicable track, sometimes followed by the Indians, leading northwards, probably as far as the Chupat; but from that line so impassable is the country that it would take two years, the Indians said, to proceed by the sea-coast from Santa Cruz to the Rio Negro. The existence of such arduous tracks as these, and the desolate Traviakas encountered near the coast, will account for Patagonia being described as an arid, almost waterless, country. Mr. Musters, in reality, the coast barrier once passed, found most of the interior abundant with lagoons, springs, and frequent streams; while even in the Traviakas the numerous wild animals met with show that water exists. At Gelgelak (latitude 47°) game was found in great abundance, and our author, now expert in the use of the bola, could readily make a bag of guanaco or ostrich, though at other stages an occasional arinadillo would take out the traveller's scanty fare. In the range of hills visible from Kaimak (latitude 45° 50') there is a mine or vein of iron ore used by the Indians in the manufacture of bolas. Specimens brought home by the author have been pronounced to be both brown and magnetic iron ore. Some leagues to the east of this spot a mass of iron, having, so far as the report of the Indians could be made out, the shape of a bar shot, lying in the middle of a barren plain, is the object of superstitious veneration. Whether it is an aerolite or not, Mr. Musters had not the opportunity of judging by inspection. The degree of mechanical or artistic skill attained by the Patagonians, as shown in their weapons or implements in common use, seems but of the lowest kind. Wielded, however, by a muscular arm, the rude lamp of iron or hard stone forms a weapon of no mean efficacy, as is shown in the case of the herculean Waki, in the frontispiece (afterwards, we regret to hear, killed in a drunken fight), bringing down a full-grown puma with broken skull by a swing of his bola. The use of these primitive weapons is, however, rapidly giving way before the importation of fire-arms. In the picturesque illustration which the author gives of the meeting between the Tehuelches and Araucanians, by far the greater number of natives are seen armed with muskets or revolvers.

Without pretending to the character of a scientific observer, or hazarding theories regarding the ethnological relations of the tribes among whom his lot was cast, Mr. Musters supplies many graphic and interesting particulars of Patagonian ways and habits, or of tribal customs and beliefs. Among the most curious of these notices are the traditions which are found current among the Indians and Chilotes of unearthly or enchanted cities somewhere hidden among the woods. The legend of the Golden City, which the pages of Westward Ho! will have made familiar to many of our readers, and which has for ages floated between Mexico and the Magdalena, has reached and lingered along the slopes of the Southern Cordillera. The Gran Quivira of New Mexico, the fabled Iximaya, the El Dorado of Guyana, or El Gran Payititi of Brazil, is sought by the rude Patagonians in the mysterious city of Los Cemeses, or La Ciudad Encantada. A loud report, followed by the rise of a dense cloud of smoke above the peaks of the Cordillera, was explained by Jackechan, our author's Indian companion, as betokening an unknown city or settlement to which the tribe had in vain sought to penetrate. To Mr. Musters it seemed, with more reason, the explosion and smoke of an active far-off volcano. A Chilote or Valdivian, Juan Antonio, told him a story which he had at third or fourth hand from its source, of one of a wood-cutting party who, having lost his way in the forest, was guided by the sound of a bell to a settlement or town of white men, by whom he was led blindfold to an exceeding rich city, and after three months brought back to the same spot blindfolded as before. An impudent young man, twelve years old, who was missing for three months, turned up well clad and in good condition, giving out that he had been all the while "with the man on the island in the lake" there being no known lake nearer than Nahuel-huapi, thirty miles distant. Mr. Musters was asked by the guide Jaria, while travelling from Punta Arenas, a propos of the wild animals of Patagonia, on which Lieutenant Gallegos was enlarging, whether he had ever heard of the Tranco or Trauco, said by the Chilotes to inhabit the western forests of the Cordillera—a kind of homoideus, possessing the form of a wild man covered with a full of shaggy hair, which is believed to descend from some inaccessible spot among the forests, and attack the earth, upon which it preys. To the discovery of the mysterious haunt shadowed forth in the manifold phases of this legend, the records of which have been mainly brought together by the researches of De Angelis, the attention of Buenos Ayres, Lima, and Chili was for a long time directed. Mr. Musters traces a curious combination of strands in the triple cord of tradition, which connects the marvellous stories of the Northern Indians and Chilotes with the half mythological records of the Spanish conquest. His dealings with the natives during the twelve months of his sojourn or wandering among them, left our author favourably impressed with the kindness, good temper, and general fairness of these children of nature, who are far from deserving the epithet of ferocious savages, brigands of the desert, and so forth, frequently bestowed upon them. It was with manifest regret that he turned his back upon his hosts and companions upon his arrival at Patagonia, as Carmen, the chief coast town, has been named of late. We do not gather from his pages any very encouraging presage of what political or social fortune may be in store for this wild and little known region. Such attractions as it possesses appeal to the love of adventure, and the sympathy with nature in her rough and untamed moods, rather than to the prudential forethought which seeks new fields for settled energy or commercial development. The enjoyment which our author found in this free and unconventional kind of life makes itself felt in the course of his descriptions throughout, and imparts to his work a spirit of reality and liveliness which never flags.

YONGE'S THREE CENTURIES OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.*

WE trust that the students of Queen's College, Belfast, for whose use, we are told, "this volume was originally compiled," will not in their study of English literature be tempted to take as a model of style Mr. Yonge's dedication. We have read a good many dedications in our time, but never till now have we come across one by a Regius Professor of Modern Literature. If it took one Regius Professor to compose it, it would take another to understand it. Perhaps we can manage to guess what Mr. Yonge means, but it is a pity that he (or his printer) has left so much to conjecture. The volume, we read, is inscribed to Dr. Henry, the President of Queen's College, "in acknowledgment of the warm interest which he has at all times taken in the welfare of the [sic] and of great and constant kindness experienced by the author, O. D. Yonge." A dedication, however, does not properly belong to the general reader, and if it satisfies Dr. Henry, it is not for us to find fault. But Mr. Yonge has a good deal to say about the style of the authors of whom he treats. Clarendon, for instance, he tells us, was led by "an extreme redundancy of expression into a length of sentence which is absolutely unparalleled." We have not applied a foot-rule, first to the sentences in the History of the Rebellion, and next to those in Three Centuries of English Literature, and so we are not able to state whether, if expressed in yards, feet, and inches, a sentence of Clarendon's or of Mr. Yonge's would be found the longer. The Professor, however, quite early in his work has given us a sentence containing thirty-two lines of by no means large type, and it is reasonable to suppose that in a work of so many hundred pages he may have succeeded in safely managing a yet longer sentence. Though there is a certain credit due to any one who can get correctly through a long sentence, just as there is to any lady who can manage a long train, or to any gentleman who can, without tripping over it, carry a long sword, yet with train and sword the long sentence has gone out of fashion. Mr. Yonge tells us that it is Lord Macaulay who "has probably had more part than any other in influencing the taste and forming the style of the present generation." We would recommend the Professor to set his class as a useful exercise the following passage from his essay on Charles Lamb to be turned into English in Macaulay's style:—

Moreover there was a tendency to hereditary insanity in his family, which at one period of his life attacked himself, and which in the case of his sister led to a terrible catastrophe, as in a sudden paroxysm of frenzy she murdered her mother; and the consequences of this calamity, while it gave him an opportunity for displaying his extreme tenderness of heart and devotedness of family affection, appear still more incompatible with that peace of mind which one would suppose necessary to lively writing.

We have noticed other peculiarities in style, some of which perhaps may be peculiarities only on this side of the Irish Channel. Edward Hyde, we read, "was born in 1608, as the son of a country gentleman in Wiltshire." Mr. Yonge evidently does not wish to cast any stain on the reputation of Edward Hyde's mother, and yet, if he really was the son of a country gentleman in Wiltshire, we do not understand why he should be said to be born as the son. Again, in reference to some exhortations addressed to young Hyde by his father, we are told that

The admonition was impressed on the young man's mind with peculiar solemnity, since, as Hume, who has given us the account, continues: "In the midst of these rational and virtuous counsels he was suddenly seized with apoplexy and died."

The solemnity certainly was very peculiar, if, as the sentence undoubtedly reads, a young man having had a fit of apoplexy that ended in death was only the more deeply impressed with his father's admonition.

When we come to consider the matter of Mr. Yonge's work, we find it difficult to picture to ourselves the audience to whom it was, in the shape of lectures, originally delivered. It is too elementary for the members of a University, and too ambitious, we might almost say too pompous, for a set of school-boys. We do not profess to know much of Queen's College, Belfast, but we should scarcely think that the students of that learned institution require a Regius Professor to publish for them at full length "The Elegy written in a Country Churchyard," or the description from "Pickwick" of the Eatonswill election. It is something to know, however, that though "Hohenlinden" is given, the students apparently are assumed to be familiar with "My name is Norval," and "The Diverting History of John Gilpin." At all events these are not quoted. Chaucer would seem to be beyond the reach not only of the students, but also of the Professor. Can Mr. Yonge have even so much as glanced at the Canterbury Tales, when he says that "the study of works of this age belongs rather to the antiquarian than to the modern scholar"? Further on he says, when talking of Dryden's version of some of Chaucer's tales, that the "obsolescence of their original had long rendered them unintelligible." We will undertake to say that, if as much space had been given to Chaucer as is given to Gray, Campbell, Marryat, and Dickens, not only Mr. Yonge's "ripe scholars," but even the students of Queen's College, might, with the assistance of a glossary, have read this "obsolescence" with ease and pleasure. It requires a far riper scholar to make out the Latin Delectus than the "Knight's Tale," and long before a boy should get to Homer he is fit for Chaucer. We would recommend Mr. Yonge to set his class to study the admirable little volume of selections from Chaucer, published in the "Clarendon Press Series." After one day's experience he will not talk any more about obsolescence. He must have, however, the vaguest notions of that remote period of antiquity when Chaucer flourished, for he tells us that the poet was one of "the composers of works in the language which was [i.e., at the close of the fourteenth century] beginning to be called English." Though, apparently, Mr. Yonge has not read Chaucer, he is full of admiration for his genius. In writing of his poems, and of John Barbour's, he reminds his hearers that they are peculiarly "admirable, as proofs of the power of genius to surmount the greatest difficulties and hindrances (for Chaucer and Barbour lived before the invention of printing, and therefore knowledge had unrolled for them but few of her learned stores)." In the same page in which this passage occurs there is a quotation from Æschylus. Moreover, from an advertisement at the end of the book we learn that Mr. Yonge is the author of a Greek Lexicon and a Latin Gradus. Therefore the Professor himself, if not his pupils, ought by this time to have become somewhat accustomed to the contemplation of genius composing poetry without the aid of the printing-press. John Barbour, moreover, he describes as a Scotch minstrel; and to the minstrel's art the invention of printing had, we always imagined, given the deathblow. It would be just as reasonable to find in Robin Hood's archery proofs of the power of genius to surmount the greatest difficulties and hindrances, seeing that he lived before the invention of gunpowder, as it is to gaze with wonder on a man for being a minstrel before the invention of printing. The criticism on Shakespeare is scarcely more satisfactory. Mr. Yonge warns his hearers that "to present detached scenes, as specimens of his genius and art, is to exhibit Shakespeare at a great disadvantage." He goes on to add, "but it may be hoped that the passages so presented will prove sufficiently attractive to induce a study of his different plays in their entirety." Again, we find ourselves lost in wonder at a college where it would seem that the students, till a Regius Professor of Literature came among them, had not so much as heard of Shakespeare. Mr. Yonge tacks on to "the passages presented" little bits of criticism and scraps of history. He quotes a passage from King John, and does not neglect the opportunity of defending Hubert's reputation. "I should remark," he says, "in passing, that in this play, as afterwards (in a lesser degree) in Henry IV., the poet does injustice to one of the great men of our early history." Does Mr. Yonge mean to describe "the real Falstaff" as one of "the great men of our early history"? Perhaps, however, he will justify himself by a further quotation from Shakespeare, and with Mueller will ask, "Why, I pray you, is not pig great? the pig, or the great, or the mighty, or the huge, or the magnanimous, are all one reckonings, save the phrase is a little variations." He shows not a little dexterity in the way in which, without any apparent break, he passes from one set of characters to another. He had been describing Benedick and Beatrice, and making long quotations from Much Ado About Nothing. He thus easily passes to Romeo and Juliet:—

From these dissembling lovers we may fitly proceed to those who did not disguise their affection. Romeo and Juliet, the son and daughter of two unfriendly families in Verona, who nevertheless have found [sic] to make such acquaintance as has proved sufficient to inspire them with ardent mutual love. Romeo, like a faithful wooer, ventures into her father's garden by night to speak with her at her window; and poetry has never clothed the aspirations of true love with more exquisite imagery than he addresses to his mistress, nor is the lady insensible to his eloquent passion.

Mr. Yonge himself in this hopelessly obscure passage almost rises to the height of, at all events, a modern poet, when he makes Romeo address to Juliet imagery that formed the clothing of his aspirations. From Juliet Mr. Yonge wishes to get to Constance, and he shows even greater dexterity than in his passage from Beatrice to Juliet. "But women," he says, "is not always uncertain, coy and hard to please like Beatrice, nor ardent and passionate like Juliet. The affection of a mother is deeper than that of any maiden." "The affection of a mother" is Constance's cue, and she makes her entry with dignified ease.

It would have been well if Mr. Yonge had reserved for his Three Centuries of Modern History, which we see advertised, some of the historical facts that he gives us in his present work. It requires surely something more than a chance statement in a paragraph to prove that the impeachment of Strafford was one "of the most iniquitous proceedings of the Parliament," and that the Grand Remonstrance was a "mischievous manifesto." The students of Queen's College, when they first learn that there was once such a man as Milton, will at the same time learn that he was a man who was possessed by "a general spirit of insubordination." They will further learn that as a poet, presuming on the fact that in Virgil "Jus and Asaracus and Dardanus, the founders of Troy, were permitted" to enjoy themselves in the other world, he has thought it "consistent with common sense or propriety to represent the devils as similarly indulged by their justly offended Maker." But we shall scarcely do Mr. Yonge justice unless we quote the whole passage:—

He even amplifies Virgil's picture; aggravating, if possible, the indecency by choosing as the moment of their holiday the breaking up of the Council, the Stygian Council, as he calls it, in which each fiend has vied with the other in blasphemous and threatening machinations against the Most High.

We have not mastered yet Mr. Yonge's method of easy transition from one subject to another, and we must pass as best we may from the insubordination and indecency of Milton to "the unwearied industry, steadiness, and honesty of purpose" of Johnson. The student may be somewhat puzzled when he reads in page 389 that Johnson, by "his unwearied industry and steadiness," raised himself "to an eminence in the literary world," and in page 390, that he was of "a desultory turn of mind and indolent habits." We could forgive Mr. Yonge, however, if he would do nothing worse than contradict himself in two successive pages; but we cannot forgive him for his abridgment of Johnson's celebrated letter to Lord Chesterfield. He is welcome to look upon it as "uncalled for, not to say ungrateful," if only he would quote the letter as a whole. That he does not do so is certainly not from want of space, for his own remarks and the extracts he maims in giving are far longer than the letter itself. Possibly he feared that he might rouse in the students of Queen's College the same "general spirit of insubordination" for which Milton was famous, if once they heard, without due comment, the whole text of such a letter written by a poor commoner to a nobleman "of the very first eminence in the political world." Certainly he is very successful in drawing the sting out of the severest passages. Every one but the students of Queen's College knows the passage where Johnson says:—

The notice which you have been pleased to take of my labours, had it been early, had been kind; but it has been delayed till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it; till I am solitary, and cannot impart it; till I am known, and do not want it.

We should have thought it impossible for a student of literature even to dream of mangling such a passage as that; but then we must confess we were not greatly familiar with Regius Professors of English Literature. At all events, the following is the form in which it is presented to the students of Queen's College:—"He [Johnson] declares that 'the notice which Lord Chesterfield had taken of his labours had been delayed till he was known, and did not want it.'" It is not necessary to carry this examination into Mr. Yonge's work any further, or we might show how equally unsatisfactory is his treatment of the great novelists of the last century, and of some of the greatest poets of this century. His book contains, no doubt, a good deal of information; but so ill arranged, and at times mixed up with such inaccuracies, that we should hesitate about placing it in any one's hands.

HADDAN AND STUBBS'S COUNCILS AND ECCLESIASTICAL DOCUMENTS.—VOL. III.*

OF the general character of this great collection we spoke nearly two years back. The single volume which had then appeared was the work of Mr. Haddan, and related chiefly to Welsh matters. The second volume, also devoted to the Celts, was also to be Mr. Haddan's, and it seems that, though the third is mainly due to Professor Stubbs, Mr. Haddan has had a hand in that too. An unfortunate illness of Mr. Haddan's has delayed both volumes; the second it has so greatly delayed that it has been thought better to publish the third at once without waiting for the appearance of the second. But we are told that the second volume may be looked for in the course of the present year. We trust that this is a sign of Mr. Haddan's thorough restoration to health and thereby to capacity for work. English scholarship cannot spare such workers. And another thought passes across our mind as we look at the title-page of the book. Mr. Haddan is there described as "Honorary Canon of Worcester." In that diocese the Bishop can do no more for him; but it is not creditable to those who have the disposal of preferments which are not honorary at Worcester and elsewhere that so unpleasant an objective has to cleave to the description of one of the foremost of the class for whom cathedral preferments are specially designed.

The present volume, for which we are mainly indebted to Professor Stubbs, deals with the ecclesiastical history of England from 597 to 870—that is, from the first conversion of the English to the accession of Alfred, or, as we might otherwise put it, to the partial reappearance of heathenism under the Danes. This point makes a very good break. With the Danish settlements in Northumberland and a large part of Mercia the ecclesiastical and literary life of Northern England suffered a rude shock. Up to that time we may say that, on the whole, the light had shone most brightly among the countrymen of Beda. Mr. Earle, it will be remembered, goes so far as to say that the whole literature of Southern England is not native Saxon, but merely transplanted Anglian. At all events, the point at which this volume ends marks the time at which, mainly as an indirect result of the Danish invasions, the supremacy, both political and intellectual, began to be fixed in Wessex. The volume therefore, as the Notice fastened into it tells us, "contains a complete and separate period of History." Nor can we regret when we hear that it is "required for the use of the Theological School at Oxford." It is good news that a Theological School should be set to work on English History between 597 and 870. It is all the better news, because, if they are set to study it under Mr. Stubbs's guidance, they cannot help studying the contemporary Imperial history along with it. From such a collection as this men may learn, among other things, how great was the oecumenical position of Alcuin—our Ealhwin—and his master. Even the "Anglicanus" of the Times, if he could bring himself to sit for a while at the feet of the great scholar who has given us this volume, might learn to see something more than "romantic interest" in the days of the great Emperor. And a kindred writer in the Pall Mall Gazette might learn that those days, with the blaze of light which parts them off from a time of gloom on either side, were not "the darkest period of European history."

The present volume has not—in the nature of things it could not have—the same freshness of interest as the Welsh volume of Mr. Haddan. That volume carries us into a region large tracts of which had never before been trodden by the foot of a critical scholar. Except what had been done by Archdeacon Jones in his History of St. David's, Mr. Haddan had the field wholly to himself, and he had throughout the great and exciting interest of waging war against one of the most pestilent of popular idols. Mr. Stubbs's lines have fallen in very pleasant places, but not in places quite so pleasant as those of his colleague. He has brought together a mass of materials from various quarters which hitherto have had to be searched for in various quarters; he has arranged them in their due order and proportion, and he has brought to bear on them an unfailing critical instinct such as has never been brought to bear on them before. But there is not the same absolute novelty which there was about Mr. Haddan's volume. Mr. Stubbs has plenty of new facts to set before us, plenty of old mistakes to root up, but he has not to grapple throughout with one obstinate spectre, like those dreams about the "Ancient British Church" which Mr. Haddan has sent back to their native place within the ivory gate. Again, the light which Mr. Stubbs's ecclesiastical researches throw on political history can be fully taken in only by those who have worked for themselves at the political history of the time. In those days, when, as soon as heathenism was once uprooted, the Church and the nation were truly one, the two threads of civil and ecclesiastical history cannot be kept apart. As the ecclesiastical divisions followed the political divisions of the times when they were made, precious pages of early English history can be nowhere so well spelled out as in the ecclesiastical map. And our whole political legislation from Æthelberht onwards shows the ecclesiastical impress on every enactment. All these things come out, as they never came out before, under the hands of Mr. Stubbs. Still Mr. Stubbs has not, as Mr. Haddan had, to tell the tale of a Church and a nation withdrawing step by step before the advances of another nation. In short, Mr. Stubbs has to deal with our own domestic affairs within our own borders, while Mr. Haddan had to tell the more exciting tale of a foreign conquest.

If we were called on to pick out one particular point of special value in Mr. Stubbs's materials, one particular point of special value in his way of treating them, it would be the way in which, as we have already hinted, they throw light on the relations between England and the Continent, and thereby on the general course of European affairs. It is not merely ecclesiastical intercourse with the see of Rome. It is a general interchange of thought, not uncommonly an interchange of men, between England and Continental countries. Theodores at Canterbury and Boniface at Mainz, Alcuin at the Court of Charles, Eadwulf of Northumberland brought back by the Pope and the Cæsar, Cenwulf vigorously denying to Pope or Cæsar any jurisdiction in his realm of Mercia—all these things bring vividly before us the way in which English and Continental affairs were entwined together both in their political and in their ecclesiastical aspects. And Mr. Stubbs's profound knowledge of the original sources of German history has enabled him to illustrate many of these points as they have never been illustrated before. The great advantage of a collection like this is that it brings before the reader, in a connected view, arranged and commented on by a consummate scholar, a mass of documents which hitherto had to be hunted up in a hundred different and often inaccessible quarters. Take, for in-

"romantic interest," as it seems to our superficial friends. Our usual English authorities, those to be found in the Monumenta Historica Britannica, teach us that Legates, one of them George by name, were sent over to England by Pope Hadrian in the days of King Offa. If we turn to Wharton's Anglia Sacra, we find a reference made to their mission in a letter from a later Pope to a later Mercian King, from Leo the Third to Cenwulf. If we turn further to Wilkins or Spelman, we find the report which the Legates made to the Pope at their return. But for the letter which, before the Legates were sent, Pope Hadrian wrote to King Charles touching a rumour of certain designs against himself on the part of King Offa, we have hitherto had to go to the great collection of Jaffé. Now it is quite possible that an English scholar might not have easy access to all these books at once; it is quite possible that a man who had lighted on one of the documents might know nothing of the existence of the other. Mr. Stubbs gathers all of them together from the four winds; he sets them all in their proper order, and adds his comments on the documents themselves and on the matter contained in them so as to make a connected history of the whole business. People who just skim the surface of these matters, whose notion of Charles is doubtless that of a "romantic" personage surrounded by French Paladins, will hardly understand the amount of curious thought which is suggested to a scholar on finding that Pope Hadrian thought it necessary to explain to the King of the Franks and Lombards and Patrician of the Romans that he does not believe the report that the King of the Mercians—"gentis Anglorum Rex," as he seemed at Rome—was trying to persuade the Roman Patrician to depose the Roman Bishop. It is something to be able to turn without looking off one's book to the report which the Papal Legates gave on their return and the list of the instructions which they gave to the English Kings and people. It is no small matter to find Roman Legates laying down such a rule as the following:—

Sanximus, ut in ordinatione regum nullus permittat pravorum prevalere assensum: sed legitime reges a sacerdotibus et aulicis populis eligantur, et non de adulterio vel incestu procreati.

If we are uncharitably disposed, we may suspect in this instruction something like a narrowing of the elective franchise, but we can nowhere find a more distinct setting forth of the elective nature of kingship, anything further removed either from theories of divine right or from the doctrine that all crowns are at the disposal of the Bishop of Rome. And possibly a little good advice as to the choosing of Kings may not have been wholly useless just then, especially in Northumberland, where Kings were rising and falling with such wonderful speed that the Legates did not easily find out the right name of the Northumbrian King whom they visited, but report King Ellwald to the Pope by the more saintly name of Oswald as well as by his own. Then again we find that it was needful, even at the end of the eighth century, to preach against certain vestiges of heathen usages, and even those who may not sympathize with the legates' zeal against the custom of eating the flesh of horses may at least think well of them for denouncing the silly and cruel fashion of cutting off their tails, slitting their nostrils, and tying their ears together. We turn over a few pages, and we come to a series of letters from Alcuin to a whole host of English correspondents, which have the most important bearing on both English and Continental history, but which are now for the first time made accessible in their proper place and order among the materials for English history. He writes letters of good advice in his own name to Kings, Bishops, and others in England; and in his letter to the Bishop and Church of Lindesfarne, then suffering the horrors of an invasion of heathen Danes, we find a passage which illustrates the way in which the different parts of Europe were brought together, as by other means, so also by the prevalence of the slave trade:—

Cum dominus noster Rex Karolus hostibus per misericordiam Dei subditis domum revertetur, ad illum venire disponimus, et si quid tunc vel de pueris qui in captivitate a paganis abducti sunt vel de aliis quibuscunque necessitatibus vestras sanctitati proficere possumus diligenter ad effectum producere curabimus.

Then we find both in English and in Continental writers the records of the negotiations between Charles and the English Princes and Bishops about the question of image worship, and the attendance of English members in the Council of Frankfort. Mr. Stubbs does not forget a possible objection that the wise men who came "de Britannia partibus" may have come from the continental Britain. Then we find letters, sometimes from Alcuin, sometimes from Charles himself, promising protection to English pilgrims, interceding for the restoration of English exiles; and, on the other hand, asking the Mercian King to command the return home of a Scottish priest who tarried at Köln, and profanely ate meat in Lent. These passages illustrate the doctrine set forth by Charles himself:—

Nullatenus vastam terre longinquitatem vel procellosa maria latitudinem federante in Christo amicitie jura disrumpere, fas arbitramur. Sed quanto longiore spacio humana dividitur conversatio, tanto probatore fide pietatis pactum servari debet.

But, besides these gentler feelings, the great King and Patrician could also sometimes be stirred up to wrath, as when Alcuin writes in his name to Offa to set forth the indignation of Charles against the people of Northumberland for the murder of their King Ethelred. Parts of this letter are indeed given in a book so easy of reference as William of Malmsbury. But here we get it in full and in its proper place as a step towards the later documents which record the direct interference in Northumbrian affairs on the part of Charles, now grown from King and Patrician into Emperor. In fact, we have here for the first time the full materials for the history of a series of transactions of which very little notice has hitherto been taken, and which throw a most important light on the international affairs of the time.

We have picked out for special mention one only among the crowd of subjects of all kinds which are illustrated by this volume. Mr. Stubbs shines equally in his critical examination of the authenticity of his documents and in his dealings with the historical value of their contents. If he can trace out the connexion of events bearing on the highest relations of the Church and the Empire, he can also sit down to fix the exact authorship, and spell out the exact text, of the various Penitentials. As a specimen of Mr. Stubbs's skill in dealing with a matter of internal ecclesiastical history, we would refer to his comments on the document printed in page 575, where we get a lively picture of one stage of that constant flux between regulars and seculars and seculars and regulars which fills so many pages in the history of the time. There is special acuteness in his remark that "the word monk, if retained at all, was sharing the change which befel the companion word monastery or minster." The use of the word monasterium to express a secular church is, we need not say, one of the standing puzzles of the half learned.

We heartily wish Mr. Stubbs and his colleague all health and strength to carry on their great work till—we will not say what date, but down to the latest date consistent with the appearance of a great narrative history from the hand which has not only gathered together the materials for a most important and commonly most misunderstood period, but has also drawn the living portraits of Henry the Second and Richard the First.

ANNIE.*

MISS MAINE'S little story has many merits, though we can scarcely recommend it for reading to low-spirited young ladies. The story is profoundly melancholy, and the author sternly refuses to gratify us by even a single gleam of sunshine. She dwells upon the misfortunes of her heroine as steadily as Sterne contemplated the misfortunes of his imaginary prisoner, though her morality seems to be rather of the stoical than the sentimental order. To those readers of novels who love to indulge in the luxury of tears this statement will doubtless count as an argument in favour of the book. To them we can conscientiously say that, assuming the end to be right, it is pursued with much literary skill. The story is more carefully designed, its characters are in better keeping, and the style is more graceful than is often the case with modern fictions. Miss Maine has evidently made up her mind distinctly as to the effect which she wishes to produce, and has taken the most direct path to her object. In spite, however, of these merits, we have a certain doubt whether she would not find more fitting application for her talents in some other form of literary art, or rather, whether she is as yet quite sufficiently familiar with the resources at the novelist's disposal. There is an occasional touch of constraint, as though she were not quite confident of her power in certain situations; and there is a disposition to leave her characters in the background, whilst she is explaining the nature of their sentiments about each other or the world in general. A novelist is not compelled to speak, like a modern dramatist, exclusively through the mouths of his creatures; but he should be careful not to be too obtrusive in performing the part of chorus. A young writer is tempted to indulge in too much moralizing, because he or she has not yet found out the way of making the story speak for itself; but if this is a venial fault, it is one which requires correction, because it has an inevitable tendency towards the worst of all sins—dulness. Miss Maine has not, in our opinion, come fairly within the scope of that damatory epithet; but there are passages in which she runs a slight danger of trying the patience of a hasty generation.

It is time, however, that we should cease our own generalities in order to criticize the story in detail. The plan, as we have said, is studiously simple. Two young sisters are living by themselves in the Lake country. The elder is the heroine, "Annie," or, as she is called in the alternative title, the "Excellent Person"; and we fancy that Miss Maine herself takes a kind of grim pleasure in fixing that unpromising name upon her victim. For poor Annie is doomed to be the butt of misfortune. She works hard to support herself and her beautiful young sister by teaching music and playing the organ. We need hardly add to the last statement that the clergyman falls in love with her. Whether clergymen always fall in love with female organists in real life is more than we can say; but the final cause of such persons in novels is to provide worthy objects for clerical affections. So far, then, all seems well. There is no conceivable reason why this calm, sensible young lady should not marry a clergyman of slightly realistic proclivities, and live very happily ever afterwards. It is a fact, however, that very sensible young ladies sometimes cherish sentimental affections with foolish tenacity. Annie refuses the clergyman out of love for a fine-looking young Oxford man who had made her acquaintance on a reading party a long time before. His suit had then been summarily refused by her father, now dead; but Annie the less persuade ourselves that, such as we are, we are the salt of the earth in matters of religion, humanity, and civilization. Looking serenely down from the most elevated point that man has yet attained, we complacently denounce the barbarities of the dark ages, and the brutalities of benighted contemporaries. We avert our shuddering gaze from the shows of the Roman amphitheatre. We even hesitate to admit the horrors of the arena as fitting inspiration for our fastidious art. Gérôme himself dare only deal with them suggestively. Conceive the thrill that would pervade metropolitan circles were Astley's or the Agricultural Hall to announce a genuine Spanish bull-fight. Yet the difference between a butchery of gladiators or bulls and one of those famous causes which commend themselves to the best English society seems to us a mere question of habit and fashion. We have trained our nerves to be squeamishly sensitive to bloodshed and coarse physical torture, but as long as our eccentric sensibilities are spared on these points, there is no amount of harrowing sensation we are unequal to. There is a great murder trial. The crime has been committed with unusual grandeur of conception, or under circumstances of ingenious atrocity. Murders there will always be, and examples must be made of murderers; but a murder trial would seem to be one of those matters which refined society might safely leave to its professional guardians, just as the sheriff shrinks from performing in person the last sad offices of justice. Society, however, thinks differently. Society scrambles for orders of admission, bribes the doorkeepers, and crowds the Court. Nor do the motives of its eagerness demand such searching analysis as the subtle drug which puzzles experts in a poisoning case. The interest of the spectacle clearly lies in the fluctuating chances of the wretch arraigned for his life, or in the details of the atrocity related at second-hand. The spectators hang breathlessly on the lips of the counsel who opens the case with a moderation significant of conscious strength. They are hurried delightfully along with the voluble sophistry of the eloquent advocate for the defence. Under other circumstances they are no great amateurs of oratory, nor can they follow a popular preacher for his twenty minutes when he appeals to them on matters which they believe to be of vital moment to themselves. Here in the Court, on a hard seat and in a foul atmosphere, the winged hours fly past them like minutes. They can distinguish the shadow of the gibbet looming over the shoulder of the prisoner on trial; they can point the speeches of counsel by reference to the countenance of a man—or, better still, a woman—worn and weakened by protracted anxiety and confinement; they eagerly note the convulsive clenching of the fingers, the nervous twitching of the throat, the suppressed heaving of the chest. Nor are they without the sympathy that comes of comprehension. There are ladies whose beauty or social fascination has served as a voucher to the front places, and they reflect in their fair faces the pallor of their criminal sister. They enjoy the luxury of latent hysteria. Their eyes fix themselves in compassionate horror as she sinks swooning under the words of doom into the arms of the female warder. That comfortable blinding of sympathy and horror is the very climax of the entertainment they came for. Their overwrought feelings have been deliciously exhilarated by the morbid stimulant they craved. The art of Siddons or Ristori has no such resources as those which her special circumstances have bestowed on that commonplace culprit at the bar. The tragedy is played out so far as the spectators are concerned. It has been eminently successful, and they carry away a store of agreeably horrible memories for future delectation. Their thoughts, it is to be hoped, do not follow the convict to the gloomy cell and the grim pressroom and further. At least, if they do, what can we think of the nature which courts these vivid impressions of misery which the spectator can do nothing to alleviate?

It has been the fashion of late to run pieces on the London boards in a way that twenty years ago would have made managers and the public stare. By a singular coincidence the legal drama has suddenly followed the prevailing fashion. The grand case of the day mocks at precedents, as we fervently trust that it may defy parallel in the future. There was amply sufficient in it to account for the attention which it excited from the beginning. Tichborne v. Lushington translates into real life the pet plot of sensational romance writers, with variations and elaborations which the author of a French feuilleton could hardly have dared to risk. If the claimant were what he professed to be, the rightful heir to an almost historical family had reappeared under circumstances that demanded explanation at every stage. If he were what the defence represented him, still the fact remained that, in the face of improbabilities, he had persuaded men of character, capital, and intelligence to stake money and reputation on their belief in his success. Presumptions appeared so evenly balanced that the coming trial seemed a very fair match, and people waited anxiously for attack and defence to "show their form" in public. So far all was natural enough; and the same thing might have happened had an ex-private of Spahis turned up after a ten years' service in Algeria, laying claim to some ancient title and domains of the Rohans or Montmorencys. But in France the interest would have died away with the opening speech of Brother Béthune, possibly to revive with the reply of the Attorney-General. How it has been in England we know. The interest has gone on growing in intensity until at last it has been brought up to the point of carefully perusing the eight daily columns in which the Times reports Sir John Coleridge. What will happen when the aspects of the notorious trial clash with those of the debate in Parliament defies speculation. Already, we understand, the case has exercised an appreciable effect on the lighter departments of the book market. Anonymous enthusiasts lose their heads, and pelt everybody, from the Judge downwards, with communications which can only have a single destination. Witnesses who have only an indirect concern in the affair reappear in Court day after day with a regularity that goes unremunerated. The women knit like the tricoteuses of the French revolutionary tribunals; the men eagerly anticipate the elaborate reports that would reach them in any case a few hours later. We have ceased to be surprised at this. The witnesses have at least an indirect concern in the case; while the general public, with no concern at all, has so far mastered the proceedings that probably nine people out of ten could pass a creditable examination on the minutiae of the interminable controversy. If the Tichborne trial establishes nothing else, it demonstrates beyond question the hold which the legal drama has established on the public taste.

THE MANCHESTER MALIGNANTS.

IT is not perhaps surprising that the name of Mr. Matthew Arnold should not have found much favour with the Nonconformist Conference. Sweetness was not exactly the predominant characteristic of the meeting, either in temper or in language, and its conception of light may be gathered from the demand for the exclusion of the Bible and everything pertaining to religion from public education. The dissidence of dissent was exhibited in a very striking and impressive manner, but the Protestantism of the Protestant religion is not immediately recognizable in a protest against the Scriptures being allowed to be read by Protestant children during the hours when Roman Catholic children are absent from school. Authority is to be found in one of the old moralists for recommending, or at least excusing, a course of hearty imprecation as a means of throwing off a fit of spleen, and at once calming and clearing the mind. If there is anything in this prescription, the Nonconformists should be very much the better for the meeting at Manchester. It is to be hoped that the discharge of expletives has been accompanied by a sense of relief, although it may be doubted whether it has tended to vindicate what Mr. Miall calls "the moral dignity of the Nonconformist body." A Scotch laird who was much addicted to this cheap and simple alternative is said to have accustomed himself, with an amiable desire not to hurt anybody's feelings, to "swear at large"; but the Nonconformists have apparently no relish for such pointless commination. While dealing maledictions very freely all round, they reserved a special share of them for Mr. Forster and Mr. Matthew Arnold. The name of either of these gentlemen seemed to produce much the same effect on the meeting as the fluttering of a very red handkerchief is supposed to have on an excited bull. "The vast audience," writes an enthusiastic reporter, "which crowded meeting-house and galleries rose again and again to its feet," and applauded violently when one of the speakers requested Mr. Gladstone to oblige the meeting by dismissing Mr. Forster from his present office. It cannot be denied that Mr. Forster has disappointed the expectations of the Nonconformists. They have been struck, as it were, by a shaft feathered from their own breast, and the wound is therefore doubly painful. If we might venture on another simile, we might say that Mr. Forster was the Trojan horse by the introduction of which into the Ministerial citadel the Dissenters trusted to master the Government, but unfortunately he carried his contingent to the service of the defence, instead of co-operating with the besiegers. There is no reason, however, to suppose that Mr. Forster was a party to the hopes which were fixed on him. Those who are now loudest in their anger against him appear to think that he was under some kind of obligation to act as in his position they would no doubt have acted, and to place sectarian aims above the obligations of statesmanship. Mr. Richard, who is a member of the House of Commons, and who must be supposed to know something of the composition of the Ministry, had the hardihood to assert that over the door of the departments was written, "No Nonconformists need apply." There are two distinguished Dissenters in the Cabinet, and several in the secondary rank of Parliamentary officials. It cannot be said that Mr. Forster stands alone in refusing to conform to the intolerant and malignant Nonconformity of the Manchester Conference. In point of fact, the dissidence of Dissent applies in a large degree to the violent programme of Mr. Miall and Mr. Richard. Mr. Miall was himself obliged to confess that the Education Act, which he refused to recognize as a compromise, had been passed with the tacit assent of a large body of Dissenters, who "failed to distinguish between their religious principles and their religious sentiment, and who held that religion should never be dissociated from education." A complaint was raised at the Conference that Nonconformists were not sufficiently represented in the management of the Endowed Schools, but it was shown that, when proper application had been made to the Commissioners on this subject, Nonconformists had been appointed in several instances which were mentioned. It was added in explanation that Nonconformists were, as a rule, reluctant to move in the matter. It may be assumed therefore that Nonconformists generally are not dissatisfied with the proceedings of the Commissioners, and that on this, as on other points, the Conference is very far indeed from representing the general body in whose name it professes to speak.

It is evident that a number of Nonconformists have lashed themselves into a violent passion with regard to the Education Act, and the exhibition, though not perhaps very pretty, is not without its uses. In uno veritas, and the intoxication of anger also tends to display in their true colours those who are under its influence. We are indebted to the Conference for a tolerably candid and explicit statement of Nonconformist pretensions, and it is desirable that it should be understood what these pretensions amount to when plainly expressed. It has been thought to be rather absurd, and perhaps not quite honest, that the Alliance should have submitted a scheme of prohibitory legislation under the name of a Permissive Bill. But this is after all less anomalous than the demand which is now made in the name of religious freedom for the suppression of religious education. Constitutional freedom, as opposed to what, from a recent notorious example, may be called the freedom of the Commune, has hitherto been construed to mean that the majority shall decide how the affairs of the country shall be managed, with the qualification that, as far as possible, the minority shall not be compelled to do anything of which it conscientiously disapproves. This rule we are now asked to reverse. Freedom, according to the Nonconformist reading, means that the majority shall not be permitted to co-operate for its own purposes, if the minority does not happen to approve of those purposes, even though the minority itself may be under no coercion in the matter. As far as can be ascertained, the great body of the people of this country are agreed on two principles of national education—first, that existing voluntary schools shall, as far as possible, be turned to account; and, secondly, that such religious instruction as is agreeable to the majority shall be given at such times and under such conditions that no child need attend against the will of its parents. It is now proposed that the majority shall no longer be permitted to carry out these principles, but shall be compelled to do something which it has the strongest possible objection to do; and the only ground for this peremptory and tyrannical command is that a minority, and, according to all means of calculation, a small minority, does not like to see the majority enjoying its present freedom of action. The practical effect of the demands put forward by the Manchester Conference would be that ratepayers throughout the country would be compelled to go to the expense of setting up purely secular schools, in which a kind of education would be given to which they, as a body, object, and to abandon the use of the voluntary schools, with which they have no cause of complaint. By the side of existing schools which satisfy the people, and which cost comparatively little, there would have to be established other schools, which would offend the prevailing religious sentiment of the community and which would impose a heavy and unnecessary burden on the ratepayers. And all this must be done in order to please a peevish and distempered minority of Nonconformists—a minority not only in the country, but even, as it appears, in their own body—who do not so much as pretend that they have any practical grievance to complain of, and whose policy is simply the wanton malice of the dog in the manger. There could hardly be a more striking illustration of the sour bigotry and shrewish intolerance of the Conference than the demand that schoolmasters in the pay of the public shall be absolutely precluded from devoting any of their time out of school hours to religious instruction. It would perhaps be better to begin at once by requiring from every schoolmaster a distinct repudiation of every form of religious belief. We should then have religious freedom in perfection.

The best way to realize the practical operation of the new dogma of the rights of minorities is to apply it to some other subject than education. Take, for example, the military defence of the country. There are a number of worthy, respectable people who object to armies on principle. The great body of the nation, however, happens to be of a different opinion, and the consequence is that the peace party has to contribute to the support of the army, and is under the same liability to military service as other citizens. According to Nonconformist principles, the members of the Peace Society should not only be relieved from these obligations, but should be allowed to pass a veto on the maintenance of an army at the expense of other people. At Warrington, the other day, Mr. Rylands ridiculed the idea that the majority had a right to teach religion against the wishes of the minority. Apply this to the army, and we arrive at the conclusion that the majority has no right to provide for the defence of the country against the wishes of a minority of fanatics who object to war on principle. As it is, every facility is provided for the education of the children of Nonconformists without exposing them to proselytizing efforts, and it is, in fact, admitted that no such efforts have been made. Moreover, Nonconformists are exempted from all contributions for religious teaching. All that they have to pay is a small sum which does not even cover the whole cost of the secular instruction which is provided for their children. It is not freedom for themselves that they are now seeking, inasmuch as they have it already, but liberty to coerce others. Montesquieu has remarked that every one has given the name of liberty to the government which agrees with his habits or inclinations. The liberty of fanaticism is the liberty of the Inquisition and the stake; and the violent intolerance of the Nonconformists who met at Manchester equals, if it does not surpass, that of the most bigoted Ultramontanists. It is intimated that no candidate who refuses to embrace the Wahabism of Mr. Miall and his friends in its most extreme form shall be supported at the elections. Another addition has thus been made to the band of ego-ideal zealots who are willing to stake the government of the country on the acceptance of a single wretched. What with the Nonconformists, the Alliance, the idolaters of Contagious Disease, the champions of women's rights, and the people who want to marry their deceased wives' sisters and nieces, candidates at the next general election will have a nice time of it. Perhaps some means may be discovered of pitting the different sets of fanatics against each other, but it is obvious that it will be of little use to swallow one formula without the rest. Anybody who has stomach for them all will be at liberty to enjoy his own opinions as to such trivial matters as the distribution of taxation, the security of the country, the regulation of wages and hours of labour by the State, and so on. It is just possible, however, that the great body of the people, who have as little taste for the bigotry of Little Bethel as for the fanaticism of its acclimatist and positivist allies, may interfere to spoil this pleasant combination, and candidates will perhaps be shrewd enough to look to this quarter for protection.

CHESHIRE ETHNOLOGY.

WE know not by what freak of good or bad luck it is that something is always happening to bring the ancient City of the Legions—that on the Dee we mean, not that on the Usk—into special notice in some shape or another. We not very long ago reviewed a Chester book, and just now the restoration of the cathedral, and the ceremonies accompanying the reopening of the restored building, have caused Chester again to figure in several paragraphs of the daily papers. If those paragraphs are to be believed, the opening services seem to have been marked by some incidents of a singular kind. We read, for instance, in the Times, that, as there is—as is but natural so near the march—a considerable Welsh-speaking population in Chester, a sermon had been preached, or was going to be preached, for their special benefit. But the odd thing was that the sermon was to be addressed to the Britons “in their native Gaelic.” To ordinary minds there seems something very strange in preaching to Welshmen in Gaelic, something not wholly in harmony with that article of the Church which condemns all ministering in the congregation in any “tongue not understood of the people.” A profane wit indeed suggested that the account of the ball of the Gaelic Society, the description of which appeared in some of the papers in parallel columns with the restoration of Chester Cathedral, had, by some freak of the printer, got jumbled up with the narrative of the more sacred ceremony. That the company at a “Gaelic ball” should deem it their duty to talk Gaelic, whether “native” or otherwise, seemed not wholly unlikely; it seemed at least far more likely than that any man should think of preaching in Gaelic to a congregation of Welshmen. But we set this suggestion aside as rationalistic. Whatever we may say of its trustworthiness as to past events, we cannot but accept the authority of the Times as decisive with regard to those times from which it takes its name—our own times, namely, as they pass day by day. We are bound, therefore, to believe that the sermon was preached, or was to be preached, as the Times tells us, in Gaelic. And as we cannot suspect any one concerned in the ceremony at Chester of fostering the error of celebrating divine service in an unknown tongue, we are bound to believe that there is a population at Chester to whom a Gaelic sermon would be a sermon “in their native Gaelic.” The fact is new to us, and at first hearing it sounds a little startling; but a few moments' thought will show that such a fact, kept in the dark as it has hitherto been, falls in exactly with the conclusion of one school of British ethnologists. The existence of a Gaelic population at Chester is much less surprising than the existence of an Iberian population in South Wales, as affirmed by Tacitus and Professor Huxley. That there was, at some time or other, a Gaelic settlement in North Wales, has been very generally believed; legends of the incursions of the Gwynedd, and traces of their name and local nomenclature, are rife in various parts of the Principality. Some indeed explain them by mere desultory incursions from Ireland, of which some instances certainly did take place. The national legend of Cunedda tells of a Gaelic invasion of North Wales within the historic era. One school of antiquaries, like Archdeacon Jones in his Vestiges of the Gael in Gwynedd, explains the whole class of phenomena by the theory of a general Gaelic occupation of Britain, earlier than the settlement of the Britons or Welsh. We will not undertake to resolve these knotty points one way or another, because the fact which the Times has so kindly revealed to us, the fact of a Gaelic-speaking population being found at Chester in our own times, fits in equally with any of these theories. It matters very little whether the existing Gael of Chester are casual settlers from Ireland, or the descendants of a great migration from the North in the fifth or sixth century, or a vestige of a primitive occupation which once occupied the whole Isle of Britain. In whichever of these ways we may account for the fact, we have the word of the Times for it that the Welshmen of Chester, settlers no doubt from the neighbouring counties of North Wales, are at this moment more likely to be edified by a Gaelic sermon than by one in either Welsh or English, and we commend the neglected fact to the special attention of ethnological and philological scholars.

The existence then of these vestiges of the Gael in Chester we thankfully accept as an important addition to our knowledge, and in this thankful frame of mind we are not disposed to be hardly allies to the memory of the heroic-looking youth for years of hopeless separation. When eleven years have elapsed since their meeting, the youth—no longer very young—comes up again, still looking heroic, lately become rich, and now disposed to act like a gentleman. The engagement is renewed, but is broken off, in spite of the honourable behaviour of both persons, by the wiles of Annie's beautiful young sister, who, we regret to say, tells downright lies to both in order to bring about a separation and secure her sister's lover for herself. This piece of treachery to poor Annie, who had carefully brought up the sister from her earliest years, meets with complete success. Annie hands over her lover to her sister, and retires in a crushed condition to a village at some distance, but still within reach of the ritualistic clergyman. The clergyman behaves admirably, and, his rival being thus cleared from his path, once more proposes to give Annie a home. This time she is more reasonable, and we hope to reach a happy conclusion. Perhaps, however, Miss Maine thought that a melancholy catastrophe was imperatively required by the general tone of the story; or perhaps it struck her that there would be something slightly ludicrous in allowing the arrangement for a change of partners to be carried into effect quietly and to the satisfaction of all parties concerned. To one of these considerations the luckless clergyman falls a victim; for, just as he is going to propose, he is summarily drowned by a convenient flood, and poor Annie is again left desolate. She is even yet not quite free from misfortune. The natural fate of a young lady thus jilted by one lover, deprived by death of another, and victimized by the machinations of a beautiful younger sister, would be to take to some form of "doing good," if not to retire into a convent. Poor Annie, however, is endowed with a special aversion to doing good in the conventional manner, and does not more than half believe in the opinions of her clerical admirer. Her only real consolation seems to be playing the organ to a small congregation in a retired village of Cumberland; and, in spite of her talents for music, we cannot fancy that to be a very exhilarating employment. However, she is ultimately dismissed with just a gleam of comfort. "It may be," we are told, that in struggling for devotedness to the people and to her art, she was "at last content, if not happy. Sooner or later, on such a life as hers, the blessing of peace must fall." Judging from her previous performances, we should say that it would be very late indeed—probably about her seventieth year.

We have already noticed what is, in our opinion, the weakest part of the story. The most striking difference between a powerful and a feeble novelist is generally this—that the powerful writer gives the most marked indications of vigour at the critical periods of the story; whereas the feeble writer is apt to shirk the more trying situations, and to dwell upon the comparatively easy periods which intervene. Judged by this test, Annie is not quite satisfactory. We take, for example, the scene in which the heroine breaks off the engagement with her first lover, under the impression that he is really attached to her sister and is only faithful to her from a sense of honour. The explanation takes place during a drive; and it must be confessed that it is rather awkward for them both. The lady feels that she is finally bidding adieu to her chances of happiness, and the lover is half-conscious that her accusations of coldness have some real foundation. It is perhaps only natural and in harmony with the reserved and proud character of the lady that her part of the conversation should be short and pithy; but the gentleman takes his dismissal with a coolness which argues either that he is singularly wanting in passion, or that the author is rather anxious to get rid of her task. He sees that she is in earnest after a couple of sentences, and then, without a word, drives her back as fast as the horses will take them. After all the careful explanation we have received of the feelings entertained by both parties to the dialogue, we are a little disappointed at this calm conclusion. We expected a more vehement explosion; and, to whatever cause the faintness of the picture may be owing, it strikes us as a want of art. The gentleman ought to have more fire in his composition in order properly to enlist our sympathies; we are too much driven to the conclusion that, after all, Annie is well rid of a lover who takes his repulse as quietly as he could have taken the breaking-off of an advantageous bargain for a horse or an estate. We are rather disposed, indeed, to think that in this instance Miss Maine feels the usual difficulty of feminine writers in adequately describing the male animal. The scenes in which the younger sister tells the heartless lie by which her sister is finally separated from their common lover are more efficiently worked out; yet even there we feel that a writer whose forte lay in describing painful emotion could have got more out of the situation than Miss Maine has succeeded in doing. "What an angel you are, Annie, and what a brute I am!" exclaims the young lady, in a momentary spasm of remorse; and the last part of her exclamation is undeniably near the truth; but the remorse is hardly as keen as it ought to have been in order to do justice either to the moral nature of the beautiful sister, or to the artistic merits of the position. A girl who breaks her sister's heart as quietly as she says that she is not at home to a troublesome visitor does not possess the interest which we ought to feel towards the bad characters of a story. It must, however, be set against this, that the story has real merit in the portrait of a self-contained character, who makes chances of happiness from sheer want of passion at critical moments. She has that kind of self-distinctness and consequent incapacity to assert herself properly, or to display a due amount of selfishness, which often leads to

"excellent persons" being thrust to the wall by more unscrupulous and vigorous characters. Annie, in short, is a good centre of the story; but we should have wished to see a little more vitality in the subordinate characters. And our chief piece of advice to Miss Maine would be something of the same kind as we should have given to her heroine. She should add a little less in calm analysis of motive and character, which makes stories unduly long and prevents people from energetic action at the right moment, and try to put a little more fire into the emotions of her actors. She has abundant delicacy of observation, but is a little wanting in colour and animation.

PLINY'S LETTERS FOR ENGLISH READERS.*

FOR a synoptical view of Roman life and society during that portion of the Imperial era which is represented in literature as the "silver" age of Latinity, Pliny the Younger may be trusted with the same confidence that is placed in Horace as the illustrator and exponent of the Augustan or "golden" period. From the Satires and Epistles of the latter we gain our liveliest notions of Rome and the Romans under the heir of Julius Cæsar; the familiar letters of the younger Pliny supply the material for a comprehensive picture of Roman manners and scenes and characters, after the Empire had passed from the family of its founder into the hands of Cæsars chosen and appointed by the army. It is owing to a happy taste for letter-writing, contracted perhaps from a general admiration of Cicero, his intellectual superior, that so polished and competent a representative of the later epoch has transmitted to posterity his observations and impressions of the age in which he lived, and thereby furnished a link between the old world and the new, whilst illustrating the transition period between Paganism and Christianity. Even in its secular aspect, the singular features of that epoch deserved to be caught and depicted; for whereas the blind jealousy or administrative abilities of this or that Emperor had rendered the pursuit of politics dangerous or superfluous, the field for the study of literature, eloquence, and the fine arts still remained open, and the machinations of informers and sycophants did not prevent the private houses of illustrious Romans from being the abodes alike of Republican virtue and Augustan culture. The domestic life of Pliny and his friends was, as far as one can judge, more uninterruptedly serene and happy than that of Cicero and many of his contemporaries; and if in the Augustan period success in prose and poetry was more brilliant, in Pliny's days it was at least sought more widely and generally. There are diverse other points of view in which so much of the social history of Rome as is to be found in the letters of Pliny presents an interesting and instructive study to modern readers; so much so indeed that they are deserving of being more largely read at school and college than, owing perhaps to the difficulty of crowding later Latin writers into an already full programme, has hitherto been the custom.

At the beginning of last year Messrs. Church and Brodribb materially contributed to the recognition of Pliny's merits as a Latinist and a letter-writer by an edition of selections from his correspondence, illustrated and explained by copious and apposite notes; and now they follow up that boon to those who can read Latin with another not less valuable to the English readers who are only capable of enjoying the letters at second-hand. Mr. Lucas Collins's very useful and popular series has afforded a fit opportunity for a sketch of the life and writings of the younger Pliny; and the writers of the volume before us have contrived, out of their intimate and complete familiarity with their subject, to place the man, his traits of character, his friends, and his surroundings so vividly before us that a hitherto shadowy acquaintance becomes a distinct and real personage.

So much of the same ground was necessarily gone over in our review of the "Select Letters" at the time of their publication by Messrs. Church and Brodribb, that it would be superfluous to attempt more than a passing glance at much of what is detailed in the chapters of their "Pliny for English Readers." These set before us with sufficient clearness the scenes which succeeded each other in that part of the drama of the Empire in which Pliny was more or less an actor; the dark days of the beginning of Domitian's rule, and the reign of terror with which it closed; the new age in which, under Nerva, the friends of the proscribed, and Pliny amongst them, found courage to take reprisals, and to exact reparation from the infamous informers of the defunct tyrant; the still calmer and more settled tranquillity of Trajan's reign, in which Pliny rose to the highest office as governor of a distant and important province. In the first period he was a rising advocate and man of letters, preserved by his own caution and tact from being the victim of Domitian's jealousy which would naturally have fixed itself upon him on account of his intimacy with the philosophers, whom the Emperor banished in a body from Rome. In the house of one of these he was staying when the order came for his banishment; and, at the death of Domitian, a paper containing an information against Pliny by Carus Matius, a principal delator or false accuser, was found in his portfolio. At this time Pliny would have been in his thirty-fourth year, and his practice in the law courts (more particularly in the Court of the Hundred, which decided civil matters and questions of property, and of which and its advocates he tells some curious stories in his letters) must have enabled him to lend valuable aid in exacting, either in the Senate or before a court of arbitration, a tardy atonement for violence and rapine in the previous reign from two notorious creatures of Domitian, Publicus Certus and Marius Priscus. He had studied oratory and style under Quintilian, yet, from his frequent abuse of a veteran pleader in his own court, the informer and fortune-hunter Regulus, one is led to suspect that this man must have got more briefs through his tricks and artifices than his less adroit and more conscientious junior. Pliny is certainly too hard upon a man who, by his own showing, as the authors of this volume observe, was not intellectually contemptible.

If the glimpses which the letters afford of the law courts are interesting, still more so is the insight they offer into literary life under the Emperors of Pliny's epoch. Silius Italicus and Tacitus, both greatly his seniors at the bar, were associated with him also in the cultivation of the Muses. With Silius he was on terms of intimacy, and his criticism of him, that he wrote "verses with more diligence than force," coincides with the verdict of modern scholars. With Tacitus he was more closely associated. He rejoiced in his society and good opinion, and it was the pride of his life that on one occasion a stranger sitting next Tacitus at the games, and finding him to be a distinguished author, concluded he must be "either Tacitus or Pliny." To Martial the epigrammatist, Pliny stood in the position of a patron. When, in the early part of Trajan's reign, that poet quitted Rome for Spain because he did not succeed so well with the new régime as with Domitian, whom he grossly flattered, Pliny, as he tells a correspondent, presented him with a viaticum for his travelling expenses, and this in pursuance, he adds, of a good old custom of "complimenting with money those who had written the praise of persons or States." The simple-minded letter-writer regrets the disuse of a practice which, as the authors remark, was "recognized amongst ourselves till, happily both for the purse and for the honour of our men of letters, the public superseded the patron"; and he is curiously insensible to the field for satire opened by payments for praise, whereby

The patrons live to future generations,
The poets live by their industrious earning,
So that, alive and dead, men live by Learning.

It is indeed Pliny's connexion with literary men, both with some whose works have come down to us, and with others—e.g. Passennus Paulus, a descendant and imitator of Propertius; Caninius Rufus, a would-be epic poet; Vergilius Romanus, a comic poet; and other poets and prose-writers, to say nothing of the foreign philosophers and rhetoricians with whom he was intimate—which has called forth one of the best and liveliest chapters in the very pleasant volume before us; we refer to that which is devoted to the custom of "Public Readings" (vii. 80-89). It seems probable, from the cases in which we can form an opinion, that Pliny, if a just, was also an indulgent, critic; and another way in which he strove to encourage and foster literature was by attending diligently the gatherings at which ambitious authors were wont to court, by recitation of their compositions, the publicity and sales for which modern writers depend on the energy and good offices of their publisher. Though the multiplication of copies of popular books was a far easier and cheaper process at Rome under the Empire, and the supply was much more satisfactory in the first centuries of the Christian era, than it was much later in mediæval Europe, yet the "Sosii brothers" were booksellers rather than publishers; and a Roman author had not his Murray or his Blackwood to go to for the sale of his copyright or the arrangements of advertising, floating, and in short publishing his book. Messrs. Church and Brodribb put this very lucidly before their readers, as they do also the alternative, which existed only in Imperial Rome, to the fashion of which the "assiduo ruptæ lecture columnæ" of Juvenal give such vivid testimony. It had existed in the Augustan age; it had become a business of life in Pliny's time. When a hall of library, chairs, benches, and audience had been secured for the purpose, the reader would anticipate the popular lecturer or preacher of to-day (with his diamond ring, his bran-new coat, and well arranged hair) by adornment, and sometimes extravagant adornment, of his person. The reciter, we are told, would occasionally "put a gay coloured hood on his head, bandages on his ears, and a woollen comforter round his neck." Whether the ear bandages were designed to save the reader from the infliction which his labour imposed on his auditory we are not certain, but it must be clear that the tax thus laid upon good-natured folks' patience was very severe, and it must have been only a sense of duty to literature and to society that enabled refined hearers like Pliny to endure it. We are reminded that there was not then "the abundance of reading which constitutes one of the most serious burdens of modern life"; there were no magazines, no pamphlets, no newspapers; perhaps, too, there was always the chance, as at a modern sale, of some extempore fun, or a little quiet gossip. Such an interlude as that recorded in pp. 87-8 would have repaid even a bored listener for the unwilling loan of his ears. "Passennus," the elegiac poet, "had collected a number of friends to hear him read a new volume; among them a lawyer, Javolenus Priscus by name, with whom he was on very intimate terms. The poet began, 'Priscus, you bid me'; but was astounded by a sudden interruption from his friend, 'I do not bid you!'" We may illustrate this incident by supposing that Pope is reading in public his Essay on Man, and has got as far as "Come now, my St. John," when St. John, who is one of his audience, interrupts him with, "Come, indeed!—not I." Javolenus, says Pliny, "is a man of doubtful sanity, though he takes a share in public business, is summoned to consultations, and even gives opinions on civil law." The fact is, our authors go on to say, "that he was a very distinguished lawyer, some of whose legal wisdom is still preserved in the Pandects of Justinian. Possibly in a fit of absence, while his mind was wandering to scenes more congenial and familiar, he was startled by hearing his name, and made the ludicrous reply which Pliny has preserved. Or, if Passennus was one of the poets who had occupied with their readings nearly every day in April—one of the busiest months, it must be remembered, for lawyers—and Javolenus had been dragged from court to attend them, his 'I don't bid you' may have been the expression of pent-up annoyance, which no feelings of friendship could restrain." Pliny's practice, if he gave a reading, was, he tells us, to minimize the burden on his friends' patience, and assuredly he deserved listeners by his conscientious rule of "putting himself in their place." Still one may marvel that, in April and other months most given up to these public readings, he did not put up a notice, "out of town," on his house-door or club-chambers, and betake him to one or other of those delightful villas near Ostia or under the Apennines, or even beside the Lake of Como, which might thus have become refuges from importunate public readers as well as from Imperial jealousies and proscriptions.

The chapter devoted to Pliny's country residences divides with that on which we have been dwelling our special interest in this volume. We seem to know already so much of Pliny's friends and family relations (to which, by the way, the writers do full justice in their ninth chapter), that we crave for information about a more abstruse matter—the arrangements of his famous villas. The chief of these were the Laurentine and the Tuscan, though those on the Lake of Como, "Tragedy" and "Comedy," must have had their attractions. "Comedy," he tells his friend Romanus in a letter, is so close upon the lake, "that you may almost throw your line from your chamber, and fish as you lie in bed, as well as if you were in a boat." But the larger villas possess most interest, and have been the subject of speculation to English and French writers on the architecture of antiquity, such as Castell, Félibien, and André Lefèvre in his popular "Parks and Gardens." The Tuscan was the more important country seat, with its estate and farm buildings; the Laurentine was not a villa proper, but rather a villula, or house with simply its gardens and pleasure-grounds. But the charm of this latter was its easy distance from Rome, its look-out on the Tyrrhene Sea, its rare recommendations for a studious retreat in autumn and winter weather. As its owner describes it, nothing can surpass the variety of landscape or the perfection of its internal arrangements. Like all such villas, it was limited in height to one story; nor does it ever appear that the exterior aspect and elevation of the building entered into the consideration of the proprietor in comparison with his anxiety to get the best possible outlook. His land view was now shut in by woods, and now widened into broad meadows, whose flocks, driven down from the hills by winter, grazed and grew fat in spring weather upon spring keep. From the "specularia" or windows of his dining-room might be seen a prospect of, as it were, three different seas, and from another point of the same room "you look through the colonnade into the court, and see the mountains in the distance." Left of the dining-room was a sitting-room, within which was a smaller winter snugger, one side of which caught the morning and the other the afternoon sun. Another room, fitted with a wall bookcase containing "such works as one can never read too often" (non legendos libros sed lectitandos), had its windows so disposed as to catch the sun at all times of the day. It has been said that this villa was one-storied, but the exception to this general rule was a storied tower at the end of a tennis-court, the highest story of which was designed to catch the extensive and diversified prospect which its site commanded. A similar idea, we learn from Mr. Gervase Wheeler's Choice of a Dwelling, has been turned to very good account in a first-class American country house; but there is another feature in Pliny's Laurentine villa which bespeaks a completeness that few modern dwellings even of the rich and luxurious have realized—a cryptoporticus, or windowed cloister, which could admit the air in fine weather, and exclude wind and rain in foul. Outside of this was a sunny terrace fragrant with the scent of violets (p. 133). The Tuscan seat was on a larger scale, and resembled some spacious English park. It lay in a vast amphitheatre, with a broad plain in front, bounded by wooded hills well stocked with game of all kinds; the lower slopes planted with underwood, except where, here and there, were stretched undulating lawns rich as to soil and fruitful as the valley itself. Below lay a series of vineyards belted with shrubs, and then the meadows and tillage, good arable land and rich flowery pastures. The estate was well watered, and yet quite free from marsh or stagnant water, owing to the slopes down which all surface water ran into the Tiber. Here too, as at Laurentum, the house commanded a fine view. A southern aspect and an afternoon sun in summer were further attractions; and the long, broad colonnade, with an antique portico and a terrace beyond it, skirted by box and other shrubs, clipped and trimmed according to the vagaries of the topiary art, were other recommendations to this favourite summer residence of Pliny. From the terrace you descended into a lawn, or raised border, which Pliny calls "pulvinus," and Lefèvre "une pelouse en pente douce," and beyond which came a shrubbery formed of soft and almost liquid acanthus. Such summer and winter retreats may well have wooed their refined and scholarly owner from the turmoil of city life, and attracted to his society the many and valued friends to whom he wrote his epistles; for they must have breathed a calm unknown to the noisy capital where the pleasures which prevented life from being tolerable consisted in the games and betting-ring of the Circus, the shabby splendour of the dinners of the new-made rich, and the everlasting public readings of good, bad, and indifferent poets.

One or two aspects of Roman life as portrayed in Pliny's letters are all that we have attempted to notice; for the rest, and for the figures which trod the stage on which Pliny was no insignificant actor, we must refer the reader to the very agreeable sketches contained in the volume before us.

THE BRITISH SCHOOL OF SCULPTURE.*

CONSIDERING the great amount of writing devoted every year to English art, it is remarkable how poorly we are provided with anything like an adequate history of it. The Century of British Painters by the Redgraves is, indeed, excellent so far as it goes, full of carefully selected facts intelligently and interestingly told; but the scheme of their book, which really embraces English painting from its origin to our own day, confines it necessarily to an outline. Invaluable as a handbook to a modern Gallery, or to such an exhibition as that of the Old Masters at the Academy, the "Century" rather reveals the wealth and importance of its subject than displays it. Cunningham's "Lives," which include architects and sculptors, are amusing, and fairly rich in information; but the writer's strength lay less in criticism than in anecdote, and the series (which has many omissions) ends more than forty years ago. Yet a continuation of this book, with an introductory volume, might supply a tolerable history of English art; and, looking to the public interest in the matter, much extended by recent exhibitions, one would fancy that it might answer as a trade speculation. Many of the materials for such a continuation, it may be added, exist in the single biographies of our later artists. These are, indeed, in general but poor performances; Gilchrist's "Blake," despite its mannered style, and the Life of D. Scott, by the writer now before us, being the only creditable ones we remember; but the feeblest contemporary records are invaluable to the later biographer who has never even "seen Virgil."

One grave difficulty, however, besets all writing about art—namely, the necessity of copious and elaborate illustration. Without this, the story of an artist's life is stripped of its reality; it wants its raison d'être; it is like the musician's company when he will not play. The biographer of poet or novelist may quote from the works, or can at any rate easily refer his readers to memory or to their bookshelves. The painter's biographer, wanting adequate illustration, can appeal only to vague remembrance, or to works dispersed through a hundred Galleries, or reunited in one for a single season. He is thus but one degree more advantageously placed than the author who attempts the hopeless task of reviving the transitory triumphs of the theatrical or operatic stage, whilst he wants in general the lively anecdote or personal gossip of the actor's life; for it is only the inferior class of artists who either practise or endure what France, its natural home, calls the "vie de Bohème." And this necessity of illustration obviously presses more in the case of the sculptor than of the painter, or even of the architect; sculpture, in modern days, being buried in private houses, and presenting decided material difficulties in the way of its periodical exhibition. It is in part owing to this circumstance that the literature of sculpture is at once so theoretical and so meagre. What a series of journeys, what a labour of obtaining leave, what a waiting on Providence for sunshine sufficient to reveal the beauty of the Venus and justify the modesty of the Nymph, would be required by him who should truly write the history of British sculpture only! To this we must add the cost of adequate illustration; and, although photography, by supplying materials for the engraver, affords facilities heretofore unknown, yet even as an aid to the draughtsman it must be very cautiously used, whilst it is wholly inadequate to take the place of engraving. For, however loud may be the interested boasts of each ingenious process as it appears, however complacent the echoes of half-trained admirers, each and all labour under the same curse of mechanical quality. The so-called facsimile, autotype, heliograph, or whatever fine name it may bear, invariably and necessarily misses exactly one little matter—the life of the original. If put forth as art, the photograph is one of the things, as Blake said, "which all artists hate." And had he lived to see the photographic reproductions of his "Job" and "Gates of Paradise," we venture to say that he would have hated it still more.

These considerations incline us towards more leniency to the book before us than it might otherwise have been entitled to claim. Looking to the subject, the liberal proportions of the volume, and the editor's name, we must confess to some disappointment. Mr. W. B. Scott is favourably known as the author of an able sketch of Dürer's life, as well as of the biography already noticed, and the British School of Sculpture contains a sufficiently large number of engravings, on metal and on wood, to give some true idea of the best works executed by our deceased sculptors, to whom the present selection is confined; yet, whether from commercial exigencies or from imperfection in the scheme adopted, the volume can hardly rank above the ordinary "Christmas book" standard. Take, first, the selection of works for full-size illustration. The book is indeed dedicated to the memory of Flaxman as "author of many perfectly beautiful illustrative works of European celebrity" (a clumsy and one-sided compliment, as it seems to ignore Flaxman as a sculptor); yet of the full-sized illustrations but one is given to this great genius, whilst seven are devoted to Messrs. Gibson, Spence, and Baily, artists whose merits, which we fully acknowledge, certainly bear no such proportion to Flaxman's as would be indicated by this distribution of favour. Watson, again, whose eminent gifts Mr. Scott recognizes, has but one print, and Banks is not illustrated at all. Yet these really poetical and accurate artists, so little known to their countrymen, surely deserved honour more than Wyon's tame imitation of the Greek, with its falsely managed drapery, or the half-modelled sketches in which Monro allowed his natural feeling for grace to lose itself.

In the woodcuts we are glad to observe more discrimination in choice, although here the proper effect has been occasionally sacrificed by coarse execution. Flaxman's figure of Resignation from Chichester Cathedral (p. 131), perhaps the most beautiful single draped figure in modern sculpture, with some of the woodcuts from Gibson, are examples. In other cases, for some inexplicable reason, the name of the artist has been omitted, whilst nothing in the text supplies an explanation. We notice these blemishes with reluctance, but it would not be just to pass them over; partly because in a book on sculpture illustrations have necessarily very great importance, partly because the publishers have provided here excellent materials, to which on all accounts we should like to see more justice done. By some addition and some little cancelling, these illustrations might easily be reproduced in a volume really worthy to be classed as a book, not for a season's run, but for the libraries of all who care about the noblest of the fine arts, and the one also in which the existence of Flaxman places us amongst "the most favoured nations."

Should such a reproduction of the "British School" as we fancy over pass into fact, the editor's portion of the task must also be thoroughly reconsidered. Mr. Scott cannot indeed write without showing an artist's feeling, and (what does not always co-exist with this) a genial sympathy for art of diverse aims and merits. Yet he, as author of the books already named, should also know what sound biographical and critical work means; and although disposed to grant large license to the editor who is employed on a book framed on such a scheme as this, yet we think he would allow that there are pages here in which he has not done himself the justice due to his reputation. Meagre in some notices, in others—notably in Flaxman's case—he indulges in a discursiveness which gives the impression that he has not fully realized his subject. In such a task as this, however, there is so great a discouragement to a conscientious critic, as distinguished from the mob of Christmas-book makers who write with ease (to themselves), that we shall hope for a very different result should the publishers think our suggestion worth following, and reissue the volume as a true record of the British School of Sculpture. It is in the full conviction that they, as well as we, would be gainers, that we submit these criticisms. We are sure, at any rate, that this will be a far wiser scheme than the completion of that which has been announced, a companion volume on living British sculptors. Such a book cannot help becoming a mass of laudatory padding, in which the value of deserved praise will be effaced by the presence of inevitable compliment. The task is one in which a man desirous to speak his mind out must fail, and Mr. Scott should leave it to the official trumpeters of the Albert Memorial.

Quitting this ungracious portion of our task, let us give one glance, not indeed to Mr. Scott's whole subject, for which space fails, but simply to the exquisite genius which lends the charm to his volume. Many of the woodcuts from Flaxman's monumental reliefs are sufficiently delicate to give a fair idea of that genius. And as we turn from one little group to another, finding in each a new version of that tale of sorrow which, of all tales, has been most outworn by the sculptor's art, what a singular variety and freshness in its rendering is set before us, what a truth to human feeling, what ever-present tenderness and elevation! There is, indeed, some inequality in the designs, the later ones exhibiting marked advance; yet on the whole we may say that each of these woodcuts is a little poem from life, simplified and idealized at once by Flaxman's genius. We know nothing in sculpture, since the Greeks, testifying to such an affluence of creative imagination; nothing near it. This volume alone contains as many "inventions" by Flaxman as would have adequately filled the career of a good artist; and yet this volume does not contain one-fifth, we believe, of Flaxman's monumental or sculptural designs, beyond which lies the vast series illustrating Homer and Hesiod, Æschylus and Dante.

What place in his art should we assign to Flaxman? Without attempting to argue this question—for which Mr. Tenniwood's long-promised, long-delayed "Life" will, we hope, one day furnish fitting opportunity—we may briefly indicate our judgment. Roughly dividing the qualifications which compose an artist's title to recognition between the formal or material (which refer to mastery over the knowledge required for his art, and power in using that knowledge consistently with its special limits), and the inventive (which comprises all that, in the way of thought or feeling, began express through the medium of his art), Flaxman must yield to the greatest of the Greeks on all points except sentiment. This, however, is the ultimate test; it is one to which it is almost cruel to expose the sculptor. He was also inferior in technical knowledge of form to many of those who have practised the art in Europe since 1500, with or without natural genius, and to a much smaller number (within the same range) in power of handling the chisel. We cannot claim for him, again, the mysterious sublimity of Michael Angelo, nor the realistic force of David of Angers. On the other hand, Flaxman—to begin with the formal side of sculpture—is unequalled since the sculptors, not of A.D. 1500, but of the third century after Christ, in his sculptural instincts; in his power of selecting for his art exactly the right subject, and then treating it in the most sculptural manner. More than any modern or mediæval sculptor, he has the Hellenic “note” of propriety. No one, again, has surpassed him in his conscientious truth to natural form, so far as he had mastered it, or his sedulous avoidance of a forced or sentimental effect—vices into which, respectively, Michael Angelo and Canova (to name but two conspicuous instances) often lapsed. No one has been so free from conventional emptiness, whether the material emptiness of modern Italy, the Academic emptiness of France, or the pedantic emptiness of Germany. And no one, as we have said, has come anywhere near him, since Hellenic days, in copiousness of invention, united with tenderness and grace. Go to the Cathedral of Chichester, where local patronage (we suppose) has gathered some ten or twelve of his little monuments, and turned that building into a shrine more attractive and more sacred to the scanty worshippers of pure Art than the mechanical splendours of Cologne, or the gay grandiosity of St. Peter’s. Flaxman has created more types here alone, and those of an incomparably more significant order, than a century of Italian monumental sculpture produced, when Italy was at her best, and when kings and convents vied with each other in splendid patronage. And yet Flaxman, after his noble “Mansfield” group, the single great monument due to the expenditure of tens of thousands during his lifetime within the Abbey, though justly valued and praised by Rogers, the accredited oracle of taste in the patrons’ circle of the day, hardly seems to have received a commission for anything beyond a relief in miniature. We have indicated several curious problems here; the solution of them we now commend to the reader.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

M. DE BOURGOING has just published another volume of his “Diplomatic History of Europe during the French Revolution,”* and he describes all the complications of politics during the period which elapsed between February 1793 and July 1794. We need not point out the importance of a work like the one now before us, especially when it possesses the merits of accuracy, clearness, and completeness which distinguish M. de Bourgoing’s production. The history of the Revolution had until lately been treated too exclusively from the military point of view, and, with the exception of Baron Bignon’s Histoire de la Diplomatie française, it would be difficult to name a French book bearing on the subject in question. M. de Bourgoing has been fortunate enough to obtain access to the voluminous collections of State papers preserved at the Ministère des Affaires étrangères. More than once we have had occasion to remark upon the absurd restrictions with which those collections are made available to students, even when existing international relations cannot be affected in the slightest degree by such researches; but it would appear that a more liberal system is now adopted, and it is not unlikely that the character of the publications issued within the last few years in Germany on the history of the French Revolution has helped to bring about this result. In one of the notes at the end of his volume M. de Bourgoing gives a very interesting summary of the principal German works on the subject, especially that of Professor von Sybel, and he shows how the recent feuds between Austria and Prussia have affected the accounts written by historians of the efforts which the Coalition made seventy years ago to put down the revolutionary movement.

The essays collected by M. Henri Martin under the title Études d’Archéologie celtique† may be considered to a certain extent as an introduction to his History of France. The Celtic element was the first he had to study, and he naturally wished to verify by personal observation the facts which literature and archaeology have determined. Fortunately, the scholar can find even now in a few remote districts of Western Europe representatives of the race to which Gaul was indebted for Druidical civilization, and we can catch, so to speak, an echo of the old songs which celebrated Merlin and King Arthur. M. Martin truly remarks that these sources of information should be consulted with a sympathetic disposition; if we approach them in the spirit of negative criticism, they will be for us entirely meaningless. Such is the idea which prevails through M. Martin’s essays. They comprise—1. A dissertation on the Celtic Race; 2. A series of Notes of a Journey through Wales; 3. various papers on questions of Breton Archaeology, Mythology, and Literature; 4. A paper on Sweden and on Scandinavian Antiquities. And as, especially just now, politics must always slip in even amidst topics of a purely literary nature, our author endeavours to show what the relations between Prussia and the Scandinavian populations are likely to be. His volume, printed, we should remember, before the terrible events of last year, ends with a word of caution to France, to the effect that it behoves her to make alliances which shall secure the independence and power of the Scandinavian States.

We have to thank M. Lenoir for a small volume* which, although having no scientific pretensions, is particularly interesting, and deserves to be read. Having joined M. Göttsche’s expedition in Middle Egypt and Arabia, the author undertook to chronicle the every-day adventures of his fellow-travellers, and to describe the more or less amusing incidents which relieved the graver part of the journey. Whatever scenes M. Lenoir had the good fortune to observe struck him by their picturesque or humorous features, and supplied him with abundant materials for gossip. Others may throw light upon the past history of Egypt, or appreciate its present resources and the social condition of the people; we must not expect from our author anything but mere impressions de voyage, and descriptions as sketchy as the scenes which suggested them. Some of these descriptions, however, are droll enough to amuse the dullest reader, and the woodcuts which illustrate the volume add much to its interest.

The race of the Magyars is perhaps one of those about which we have the least information of a trustworthy kind. M. Amédée Thierry, in his work on Attila, and M. Rambaud, in his Empire grec au X<sup>e</sup> Siècle, elucidated, indeed, the difficult problems connected with the origin of that people, and M. Saint-René Taillandier, as we shall presently see, has done much to make us acquainted with Magyar history and literature; but before M. E. Sayous published his little volume† we had no consecutive work of importance on any separate period in the annals of that race. The epoch treated by M. Sayous is one of the most dramatic in the history, not only of Hungary, but of Europe; it begins with the accession of Leopold to the Imperial throne, and ends with the catastrophe of 1815. The French Revolution was for the Magyars the signal of a national and constitutional resurrection, which steadily developed itself notwithstanding reactionary measures sufficiently violent to crush, one would suppose, the strongest manifestations of freedom; and the clash of the armed legions which met on the battle-fields of Rivoli, Austerlitz, and Wagram‡ did not prevent the Hungarian subjects of the Emperor Francis II. from carrying on vigorously the work of political revival. But, as M. Sayous remarks, they may also be said to have taken a considerable share in the coalition against Napoleon, inasmuch as their devotedness saved Austria from destruction. If they had chosen to take advantage of the approach of the French for the purpose of asserting their independence, they would have effectually crippled Austria’s power of resistance. M. Sayous has performed his task with care; he gives us at the beginning of the volume a list of works consulted by him, which form an interesting collection of Hungarian literature.

M. Saint-René Taillandier also has taken as the subject of his latest researches the nations belonging to the Magyar race§, and the volume he now publishes is devoted to an account of the Servians, from the rebellion of 1804 to the death of Prince Milosch in 1860. A brief introduction describes the condition of Servia during the middle ages, and explains likewise the circumstances which led to the writing of the present monograph. In the first place the author discusses the question of Pan Slavism, and shows that the best safeguard against the encroachments of Russia is to be found in the strengthening of the small States on the banks of the Danube. Why is it that, twenty years ago, the Hungarians were disposed to throw themselves into the arms of the Czar rather than submit to the yoke of the House of Hapsburg? Why is it that the Slavonic populations are even now tempted to follow the same course? Simply because Western Europe took no interest at that time in the Christians of the East, and because the fatal policy of Prince Metternich was still followed—a policy the leading feature of which consisted in sowing the seeds of division among the various elements of the Austrian Empire. If the interests of the Germans and the Magyars were separated, as some thoughtless enthusiasts hope, the aims of Pan Slavism would be fully satisfied; but between this dualism and a return to the Metternich traditions there exists, according to our author, a happy medium, and the true interests of Austria itself require that Bohemia, Hungary, Poland, and all the Eastern nations, should form a powerful federation under the rule of the Hapsburg family. While attempting to point out a solution for a political difficulty which has long puzzled the ablest statesmen, M. Saint-René Taillandier has also aimed at reading to his own countrymen a lesson of patience, of patriotism, and of constancy from the history of modern Servia. His preface dwells with much elegance upon this topic; it is like a swarm corda addressed to despairing France.

M. Boulé goes on publishing for the benefit of the general reader the lectures on archaeology which he delivers at the National Library.¶ Having taken a final leave of the Cæsars, he conducts us to Herculaneum and Pompeii, and endeavours to describe all the circumstances of the volcanic eruption which in Pliny’s time destroyed the environs of Naples. In his introduction he undertakes to write with “the impossibility of a magister who follows painfully the track of some great crime"; but we must never take M. Boule's etymology at his word when he talks of his "impossibility"; passing is the very essence of his nature, and the chief merit of his work is that, whilst professing to give us the history of Mount Vesuvius, he really writes the history of the human beings whom the most unexpected of all catastrophes hurried into destruction. The author's profound acquaintance with antiquity, and also with the manners of the Campanian population, has enabled him to give a lifelike character to his descriptions. After remarking on the superiority of Herculaneum, the Greek city, in point of taste and of intellectual culture, over Pompeii, the Oscan town, inhabited by a colony of merchants and fond only of coarse pleasures, M. Boule goes on to state that the excavations in the former city are not attended with the difficulties which most people suppose, as the workmen have to dig through a crust of dried mud, not of caldried lava. The city was actually destroyed by an inundation of mud and of ashes mixed together, and whereas this substance, hardened to a certain degree but yet perfectly capable of yielding even to the knife, reaches to a depth of about sixty feet, there is not a centimetre of lava in all the parts of Herculaneum which have as yet been explored. M. Boule recommends in conclusion that, even at the risk of abandoning Pompeii, the efforts of the arçhæologues whose business it is to superintend the excavations should be concentrated upon the other city.

It is satisfactory to find Rabbinical studies so far encouraged in France that a scholar of such distinguished merit as M. Moses Schwab has undertaken a French translation of the entire Talmud.* The first volume of this important publication is now before us. Mr. Deutch's well-known article in the Quarterly Review, whilst quite sufficient to give ordinary readers a general idea of the Talmud, had stimulated the curiosity of many students who wanted to become acquainted with the Rabbinical work, not at second-hand from the imperfect essays of Buxtorf and others, but through the medium of the text itself. Next to the advantage of being able to overcome the difficulties presented by Rabbinical Hebrew, the help derived from a good translation is invaluable; and here M. Schwab has rendered an important service. Should he be spared to complete his gigantic undertaking, we shall at last have the means of studying one of the most curious and interesting repositories of theological literature. The fact that M. Moses Schwab was for a long time the collaborateur and amanuensis of the late Professor Munk is the best guarantee of his qualifications. It is at the special request of M. Ad. Franck and other well-known Oriental scholars that he has begun his heavy task, and, with the help of a few able coadjutors, he hopes to carry it on to a successful issue. The first volume contains the entire treatise of Berakhoth, according to both the Jerusalem Talmud and that of Babylon; it is preceded by an introduction which discusses all the problems of theology, philosophy, philology, &c., bearing upon the work. A table of contents, a list of Biblical quotations, and a number of valuable notes have also been added.

M. Rathier's prose translation of Theocritus† is a work of some pretensions, and claims a brief mention here. Not merely does it give a faithful rendering of the Sicilian poet, but it supplies also a number of valuable notes on points of antiquity and of moral philosophy. Thus the fifteenth idyl is followed by an essay on the mythological systems of the ancients as compared with the doctrines of the Christian religion; and at the close of the sixteenth we have some remarks on war, and on the providential character of the calamities which afflict the human race. The parallel quotations from Horace, Virgil, André Chénier, and others, are judiciously chosen; the biographical and geographical details are illustrated wherever necessary; and the scholiasts have been consulted with a minuteness which proves that M. Rathier is at home in the most recondite paths of ancient literature.

M. Chaignet has aimed at giving in a small compass an introduction to the study of Plato and of the Platonic philosophy.‡ His book, which bears evidence of conscientious research, is divided into three parts. We have first a biographical sketch of Plato, and here the scanty means of information left to us by Greek antiquity are made the most of. Respecting the moral character of Plato M. Chaignet allows perhaps too much weight to the testimony of Athenæus, and forgets that the founder of a school of thought, a man constantly before the public, must necessarily be exposed to calumny and abuse. But the Plato whom we are chiefly concerned to know is the philosopher, and not the private person; in the latter capacity he escapes from our grasp; in the former, on the contrary, we are able to arrive at a more satisfactory result, for his works are before us, and it is from the study of them that we can pass judgment. M. Chaignet dwells especially upon the pedagogic vocation of Plato; teaching was his strongest point, and his two greatest works are educational treatises. The second part of our author's volume comprises a discussion of the problems connected with the various dialogues, the determination of their authenticity, the classification proposed by editors, &c.; each dialogue is then analysed separately, and a list is given of the best editions, and of the commentaries, translations, and other works which it has suggested. The third division of the treatise examines from a general point of view what the Germans would call the Essence of the subject; this is the most unsatisfactory part of M. Chaignet's labours; it strikes as very incomplete, and we find no names whatever, for instance, of Mr. Grote's great work.

The history of French literature has lately been frequently examined by competent scholars, and M. Albert's volume goes to a great extent over the same ground which M. Réaume had already surveyed in his Prosauteurs français. The origins, however, occupy six lectures in the course delivered by M. Albert, and we are taken as far back as the Chansons de geste. In like manner the concluding chapters of the work go somewhat beyond the limits which M. Réaume had assigned to himself. Hæcæ, the Provençaux, Corneille, and Voiture are introduced to the reader, and M. Albert stops only on the very threshold of the siècle de Louis XIV., properly so called.

M. Littré is not only a painstaking lexicographer, and one of the few men who know all the mysteries of French grammar, from the origin of the language to our own day; he has also devoted a considerable part of his time to medical studies, and he was favourably known as the editor and translator of Hippocrates long before he published in the Journal des Savants his researches on the early monuments of French literature. The volume he now gives to the world under the title Médecine et Médecins may therefore be considered, to a certain extent, as his jeunesse; and although some of the essays it contains are of recent date, yet most of them were written at least twenty years ago, and treat of subjects which M. Littré has lately seldom noticed. The preface opens with a kind of autobiographical fragment, explaining how it was that the disciple of M. Auguste Comte was induced to study the science of medicine, although he never passed his examination, nor took the diploma which would have qualified him to practise. He goes on to describe the revolution undergone by pathology, and, assigning this revolution to the influence of positivism, he contends that Comte's doctrines form the only true foundation upon which science can be established. The essays collected by M. Littré are of various kinds, some of the most interesting being those in which pathology is made to illustrate some literary problem or some incident in the life of a celebrated personage. We may mention the article on Pascal's amulet, and that in which our author discusses the question whether the Duchess of Orleans, daughter of Charles I., was indeed poisoned, as the majority of historians would lead us to believe.

The present state of France naturally affords an opportunity for politicians to bring forward their theories, and to discuss the best means of reconstructing society so as to prevent the recurrence of a war between capital and labour. M. Étienne Baudry is one of these reformers; his Fin de Monde § contains a number of useful truths put in an amusing way, and the various classes of the community have sat for portraits which are scarcely caricatures. M. Baudry stands up in defence of the bourgeoisie, and he has no difficulty in proving that what the disciples of Messrs. Aul and Millière call "social liquidation" would be simply the destruction of the working classes, because the power hitherto wielded by the bourgeoisie class must inevitably fall into the hands of the peasants, who have no fellow-feeling with the ouvriers, and can manage perfectly well without them.

M. Oscar de Vallée § invites all men of common sense and all true patriots to join for the purpose of destroying that democratic pride which he considers infinitely worse than the arrogance of the greatest despots who ever occupied a throne. He does not condemn the Republican system of government, but he wants to see consistent Republicans giving the death-blow to centralization, instead of working, in the name of "liberty, equality, and fraternity," the system which they are the first to condemn when it is carried on by a Napoleon.

Count de Chambrun's Fragmenta politiques|| are interesting, but they are too fragmentary, and the author is so fond of generalizations that he leaves facts almost entirely in the background. His sympathies are altogether on the Orleanist side, and he is very decided in the expression of his religious views. It is matter for regret that he has not taken more pains to throw his thoughts into a popular shape. He seems to forget that political questions must be discussed, especially under the régime of universal suffrage, so as to command the attention of the community at large, and that a dry, axiomatic style cannot influence the majority of readers.

Numerous pamphlets are still poured forth with the view of explaining various incidents of the late war, and of showing that Prussia, notwithstanding the genius of Prince Bismarck, must finally give way as soon as France is in a condition to begin the contest again. The author of L'armée de Henri V.¶ has thought proper to publish anonymously a satire which displays a lamentable amount of bad taste, and an equally wonderful share of prejudice. In the struggle against Germany the Hoyat soldiers of Cathelineau and Charette gave proofs of at least as much patriotism as the Garibaldian franco-tirons, and it is certainly not very generous on the part of a journalist to hold up to ridicule a political party whose only fault is that they represent the traditions to which France owes all its glory.

M. Emmanuel Liáis comes from Rio Janeiro to assert in the loudest manner the intellectual superiority of le peuple le plus spirituel de l'univers, and to prove that the majority of the French nation has not been deteriorated by the influence of luxury, selfishness, and pleasure. His words are no doubt comforting to the readers for whose special benefit they have been written, but we do not think they are likely to go far with sensible men. The preface to Baron Stoffel's Rapports militaires is much more wholesome reading than the nonsense of M. Liáis.

Like many other Republicans, M. H. Entz lives on a number of old sophisms which have for the last fifty years passed current in France, but which are now worn thoroughly threadbare. The political programme he brings forward is only the concluding part of a small volume devoted, as the title suggests, to an enumeration of all the crimes committed by the Prussians, and to a vehement cry for revenge.

The events which took place between the 24th of February and the 18th of March have supplied M. Charles Yriarte with the materials of an interesting and well written volume. The author has had at his disposal several documents hitherto unpublished.

M. Alfred Duquet's narrative of Count de Flavigny's famous journey to Ireland is intended as a manifesto against England for the want of sympathy we showed towards our French neighbours during the war. Let us not, says M. Duquet, rush into fresh hostilities with that recklessness which characterized the last campaign; but let us remember that, by supporting the cause of Home Rule in Ireland, we can be a permanent thorn in the flesh of perfidious Albion.

ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

IN the present difficult and anxious crisis the speeches delivered in both Houses of Parliament on the question at issue with America are in the highest degree satisfactory, as showing the unanimous determination of the country to resist an unjustifiable demand. Lord DERBY and Mr. DISRAELI, in accordance with the traditional practice of English statesmen, abstained from throwing any impediment in the way of the firm and prudent policy announced by the Government in the Speech from the Throne. Lord GRANVILLE, always courteous, was also firm and decided; and even Mr. GLADSTONE, in language which has been criticized as going beyond the necessities of the occasion, showed that his blood was stirred at last. It is scarcely worth while to pursue Mr. DISRAELI's inquiry as to the exact date of the communication which has been forwarded to Washington. In matters of detail the Government has a right to exercise a latitude of discretion corresponding to the greatness of its responsibility. Lord GRANVILLE says that the advantages and disadvantages of various forms of communication were carefully considered, and Mr. GLADSTONE observed that the first words in the discussion are not necessarily the last. There could be no impropriety in a fortnight's delay; and perhaps it may have been well that the state of English feeling and opinion should be known in the United States before it became necessary to deal with official despatches. The American Government and Senate had announced their intention of waiting for the QUEEN'S Speech before arriving at any decision, and it may be hoped that the debates on the meeting of Parliament will also be carefully studied. On this occasion they will find that while, as on all former occasions, Parliament is anxious, even at the cost of considerable sacrifices, to appease American hostility, there is neither hesitation nor difference of opinion as to the necessity of making a stand. Mr. GLADSTONE relies on the language of the Treaty, taken in connexion with the Protocols, and interpreted by the speeches of Lord GRANVILLE and Lord RUSSELL, and by the subsequent silence of the American Government; but he also remarks that, if any verbal ambiguity could be established, the impossibility that the American claim could have been submitted by an English Government to arbitration is in itself conclusive. In Mr. DISRAELI's words, "the American Case demands from this country a tribute greater than could be exacted by conquest, which would be perilous to our fortunes and fatal to our fame." Mr. GLADSTONE adds that the sum demanded is greater than the penalty imposed by Germany on France, which was itself ten times as great as any similar payment recorded in history. The people of the United States must be well aware that Mr. GLADSTONE is passionately, if not excessively, devoted to the cause of peace; and he only expresses the universal feeling of his countrymen when he declares that, "if there is one country to which we are willing to give more, and from which we are willing to exact less, that country is the United States of America." The most pacific of Ministers nevertheless reserves "the right to fall back on the plea that a man or a nation must be taken to be insane, if supposed to admit in a peaceful arbitration claims which not even the last extremities of war and the lowest depths of misfortune would force a people with a spark of spirit, with the hundredth part of the traditions or courage of the people of this country, to submit to at the point of death." The Americans may perhaps be excused for contending, in the first instance, that, if the claims are unreasonable, they will be rejected by the Tribunal; but a party to a controversy who submits the dispute to arbitration must be understood to admit that the decision may possibly confirm and enforce the utmost demands of his adversaries. If the Treaty had been intended to include a reference of the claims since advanced by the United States, the negotiators must, as Mr. GLADSTONE urges, have voluntarily conceded more than could be extorted by a conqueror.

The New York Herald declares that the American people will require the utmost damages which the arbitrators may award, and that, if necessary, they will extort payment at the point of the bayonet; and it is asserted in recent telegrams that the Washington Government is determined to adhere to the position it has taken. But there is no need to pay attention to insolent menaces or unauthenticated rumours; and in general the answers of the principal American papers to the English comments on the Statement of Claims confirm the conjecture that they would be utterly taken by surprise. The vituperative language and the monstrous demands of the American agents were regarded by their countrymen, with or without approval, as empty bluster. It is impossible that there should have been no speculation on the probable reception of the document in England, if the people of the United States had supposed that they were preferring a serious claim for three or four hundred millions sterling. Their explanations of the official statement are evidently extemporized at a moment's notice, as when it is asserted that the indirect damages were intended to be set off against any unreasonable demands which might be preferred by English traders. It is certain that if the arbitration had proceeded on the basis adopted by the American agents, the Tribunal of Geneva would have awarded or refused damages without reference to the litigation which might be simultaneously proceeding at Washington. The leaders of opinion in the United States will now have had time to reconsider their position, and it will be well if they adhere to the just and pacific feelings which prevailed two months ago; but there is too much reason to fear that the Government will be encouraged to persevere in its aggressive course. The strong and unanimous expression in England of surprise and alarm, and the unexpected warmth of the PRIME MINISTER'S language, will furnish a plausible cause of offence. Some Americans have not unreasonably reconstituted against the public discussion of issues which are to be tried before a competent tribunal; but it was scarcely possible to ascertain the scope of the arbitration without touching incidentally on the merits of the case. The tone and language of the American Statement of Claims were proper subjects of protest, even if they had been used in support of the most moderate demands. Above all, it has been necessary and opportune to examine into the extent and meaning of the reference. No arbitrator is a final judge of his own powers, and, in the absence of a superior tribunal, the litigant Governments alone can deal with any difference of opinion as to the preliminary question. On the extreme supposition of an award condemning the English Government in the full amount of damages claimed by the Americans, the inevitable refusal to comply with the decision would have borne the semblance of bad faith; yet the American negotiators were well aware that the payment of any damages which might be awarded was necessarily contingent on the sanction of Parliament; and they cannot have expected that the House of Commons would vote three hundred millions to be paid in tribute, until a dozen English counties were, like French departments, occupied by a hostile army. It is on all accounts better that the probable failure of the Treaty should be acknowledged before the commencement of the arbitration.

When the immediate excitement has subsided, no reasonable American will deny that the unfortunate misunderstanding which has occurred was compatible with perfect sincerity on the part of England. The laxity of the wording of the Treaty might suggest an ambiguity, if it had been possible that the English members of the High Commission should have agreed to the ruinous surrender which would be implied in the American version of the arrangement. The explanations of the Treaty which were given by Lord GRANVILLE and Lord RIFON in answer to Lord RUSSELL's speech and motion gave an official interpretation of the sense in which the Treaty was understood by the English Government. The President and his Ministers might indeed contend that they were not bound by any statement of the opposite party; but the contemptuous irony which would have been involved in deliberate, though tacit, encouragement of a misconception, would not be worthy of a powerful Government. That the Ministerial explanation was allowed to pass without diplomatic comment or objection is proved by the passionless forensic statement which was afterwards prepared for the arbitration. If Lord GRANVILLE and Lord RIFON were mistaken, the American Minister in England or the Secretary of State ought in common courtesy and fairness at once to have corrected the error. The unambitious English draughtsmen seem to have taken for their guidance rather the assumed intention of both parties than the words of the Treaty. In some instances, perceiving that the terms of the ex post facto law might possibly render a neutral liable for the operations of traders in contraband, the framers of the English Statement are compelled to rely on a voluntary waiver of the advantages which might have been derived from a too precipitate concession. The American Government, having since the civil war permitted the uncontrolled supply of arms to belligerents, thought it prudent to announce that they would not insist on the clause which prohibited a neutral from furnishing military stores and equipments. The wording of the Second Article of the Treaty itself is not creditable to the English negotiators. If the clause is construed by itself, there is nothing to prevent the American counsel from claiming damages for the War of Independence, for the war of 1812, or for any of the numerous grievances which have been devised by a litigious neighbour during times of nominal peace. It has also been pointed out that the First Article, which, with the rest of the Treaty, was evidently dictated by the American Commissioners, is copied word for word from Mr. HAMILTON FISH's offensive dispatch to Lord CLARENDON. The American Government will probably contend that phrases which were on the former occasion used in support of hostile and extortionate demands ought not even by English simplicity to have been understood in an innocent sense. It was not in this manner that negotiations were conducted by the agents of GRENVILLE, of CASTLEREAGH, of CANNING, or of PALMERSTON. Future diplomatists may learn from the disastrous miscarriage of Washington that abject submission is not even gainful, and that cowardice may be rasher than courage.

It is unfortunately impossible to acquit Parliament or the community at large of the involuntary complicity which consists in acquiescence. The House of Commons, which prattled and wrangled for months over the Purchase Bill and the Ballot Bill, never found a day for the discussion of one of the most momentous of international transactions. It was enough that American rancour was thought to have been at last appeased; and any disposition to criticize the method of settlement was effectively removed by the participation in the Treaty of a recognized leader of the Opposition. Scarcely a single public speaker, and only one or two political writers, condemned the servile policy which, as they nevertheless believed, might have attained its immediate object. To the illusion which has now been rudely dispelled the admirers and the opponents of the Treaty were equally subject. There was probably not a single Englishman who suspected that the American statement of claims would include a demand for the cost of the pretended prolongation of the war. Even travellers and residents in the United States shared in the universal belief that the controversy was practically settled. Excessive confidence in the justice and good faith of the American Government may have been a proof of weakness; nor was there any reason why the meaning which was attached by the English Commissioners to the Treaty should not have been distinctly expressed. The vehemence which the American papers now denounce as unseemly represents a natural reaction, but it is idle to revive the fabulous statement that the Treaty was a statesmanlike example of mutual concession. American apologists may perhaps succeed in showing that the Statement of Claims is not inconsistent with the letter of the Treaty; but the temper and manner of the demand can only have been dictated by deliberate ill-will. Mr. SUMNER's invective against England had previously been surpassed in acrimony by Mr. FISH's despatch; but both competitors must yield to the superiority of Mr. BANCROFT DAVIS, Mr. CUSHING, and Mr.

BEAMAN. It remains to be seen whether the American politicians and jurists who have condemned Mr. SUMNER's pretensions will extend their censure to the malignant composition of the agents for the arbitration. The language which has been already used in the American Senate is, as might be expected, angry and menacing; but there is reason to believe that the issue raised by the English Government has not been clearly understood. There is no question of repudiating a treaty, and there is also a positive determination to abide by its genuine meaning and purport. During the long controversy of eleven years England has hitherto always been divided in opinion, but

THE MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.

PARLIAMENT met on Tuesday full of anxiety to know the truth with regard to the Treaty of Washington, and to see how far the Cabinet had set itself with premises of success to surmount the innumerable difficulties that beset it. The beginning of the new Session was by no means reassuring. Bad as Queen's Speeches are expected to be, it was impossible to suppose that a speech could be framed so slovenly in style, so confused, so utterly inadequate. Fortunately, the only very important paragraph in it, that relating to the difference of opinion between England and the United States as to the scope of the Treaty of Washington, was carefully and judiciously worded. It left no doubt that England understood that the claims for indirect damages were excluded, while it forbore from reproaches and from any expressions that might make further friendly negotiations impossible. But almost the whole of the rest of the Speech was bad. It was full of blunders and inelegancies of language that were perfectly astonishing. It gave little of the information which it seemed intended to offer, and it introduced mysteries and suggested puzzles where clearness seemed the simplest thing in the world. After a preamble, in which it was announced that, on the Thanksgiving Day, the "necessary" accommodation would be afforded to members of Parliament in the "Metropolitan" Cathedral, it proceeded to select as its first topic of importance the Slave Trade in the Southern Seas, and events were depicted with an obscurity akin to the darkness of those benighted regions. Pronouns were distributed at haphazard, and it was left to the ingenuity of hearers or readers to decide whether they should be supposed to refer to islands, Englishmen, or nefarious practices. Bills, it was announced, would be introduced to punish persons guilty of this trade, and endeavours will be made to "increase in other forms the means of counteraction." Perhaps clever persons in Australia, the country principally concerned, may be able to guess what this means, but to Englishmen such phrases only suggest that the use of the QUEEN'S Speech is to conceal the thoughts of the Government. Canadians, too, are offered a puzzle of their own, for they will read with interest that the provisions of the Treaty of Washington which require the consent of the Parliament of Canada "await its assembling." One part of the Speech was so supremely absurd that Mr. GLADSTONE had to explain that two of the paragraphs had been accidentally transposed. The QUEEN was made to say in her Speech that several measures of administrative improvement for Ireland would be laid before Parliament; in particular a Bill, having for its main object the establishment of secret voting, would be immediately presented—language which seemed, as Mr. DISRAELI said, to imply that the Ballot Bill was only intended to apply to Ireland. With regard to Mr. GLADSTONE's explanation of how this blunder came about we may observe—and the observation may be extended to the minor blunders and inaccuracies of the Speech—that Ministers ought not to be guilty of that amount of negligence which is involved in putting into the mouth of the QUEEN language so unworthy of her. It may of course be assumed that the Speech, such as it was read—transposed paragraphs and all—was the Speech of which she approved. She has no choice, or, at any rate, from the remoteness of her residence from the seat of Government, she gives herself no choice. She approves on Monday in the Isle of Wight what is to be published to all the world in London on Tuesday. But it is especially fitting that this jumble of obscure and ill-chosen phrases should be put into her mouth. Any one who has read her Journal must know that she herself writes in the clearest, simplest manner possible; and her subjects may be quite sure that if her Ministers had asked her to say for them what they meant to say, the Speech would have been written in good plain English, and its paragraphs would not have been transposed.

The first duty of Parliament on its reassembling is to choose a new Speaker. The leaders of both parties could honestly and cordially join in a testimony to the services which Mr. DENISON has rendered to the House while he has occupied the Chair; and although the address to the QUEEN praying that she will make Mr. DENISON a peer is a mere matter of form, yet it is perhaps worth while to draw the attention of the public to the fact that a peerage is sometimes deserved. The SPEAKER has declined to accept the pension usually given to retiring Speakers, on the ground that he will feel happier during the rest of his life if he is not a burden on his countrymen; but it is no burden on a country to pay its officials properly, and every precedent of a rich man offering to work at a lower figure than poor men can accept ought to be very jealously watched. The principal measures of the Session are exactly what might have been anticipated, and the Ministry has done wisely in limiting as much as possible the area of its labours. To the measures which were matters of course the only addition is a proposed Bill for dealing with the higher Courts of Justice and Appeal. This is a measure very much wanted, and, as it will naturally be introduced in the House of Lords, need not add much to the real business of the Ministry; but the CHANCELLOR has hitherto shown himself so entirely incompetent to conceive measures of Law Reform combining width of view with knowledge of details, that it is difficult to suppose his Bill will do much good unless abler men among the law lords will show themselves possessed of enough public spirit to shape his measure for him, so that it may ultimately assume a satisfactory form. The difficult subject of Irish education was passed over in silence in the Speech, but the Ministry subsequently explained that they only refused to take up the question because they had not time to deal with it, and that they would deal with it this Session if they could dispose of other business more quickly than they expected. They thus give it to be inferred that their policy with regard to Irish education is determined; and it is tolerably certain that they will not find it practicable to leave it in doubt until the end of the Session what their determination is. The debates on the Scotch Education Act and on the proposed remodelling of the English Act must force them to indicate how, in their opinion, Irish education is to be dealt with, even if the early introduction of Mr. FAWCETT'S Bill with regard to the Dublin University does not oblige them to be explicit. The Speech was also silent on all that concerns the Army and Navy, and this silence naturally provoked the comments of Opposition speakers. The fact is that the whole administration of the Army and Navy is in such a complete mess, and the members of the Cabinet to whose provinces the superintendence of their administration belongs are so bewildered, and find everything under their management going on in such a confused and chaotic way, that the Cabinet spares all reference to the two services as long as it can, and is quite right in doing so. Sensible men, when they know that there is a weak point in their case, say as little about it as possible.

The notices of motion and the speeches on the Address show that this Session will be marked by a very important change as compared with last Session. The Opposition is now prepared to act as an Opposition—to criticise the acts and measures of the Government, and to try its strength in divisions. The Yorkshire election occurred on the very day on which Parliament met, in time to infuse fresh vigour and inspire new hopes in the Conservative party, and the Yorkshire election was only the last in a series which shows that the Government has rapidly lost ground in the country. It is a great misfortune when the Opposition is so beaten down and hopeless that it ceases to fulfil its proper functions. The less responsible members of the party out of office take upon themselves to do the work of criticism, and necessarily do it in a very imperfect manner; they have no authority, and do little else than obstruct the passing of Ministerial measures by sheer waste of time. But this is by no means the worst consequence of the abeyance of the regular Opposition. The nation loses the benefit of having the free hearing of important acts of the Government pointed out to it, and does not understand and appreciate what is being done. The extraordinary use of the Royal Prerogative to abolish Parliaments may have been defensible or not; but it was a lamentable failure in the discharge of his duties as leader of the Opposition that Mr. DISRAELI, after characterising it in the strong and even violent language which he used with regard to it, should not have invited the House to consider not only its immediate, but its ultimate, consequences. No doubt he would have been beaten on a division; but Ministers are not undisciplined by the strong and well-grounded remonstrances of able opponents, and it is highly probable that, if the Government had had the danger and folly of riding roughshod over law and usage strongly impressed on them, they might have succeeded in showing to their satisfaction that in that particular instance they were justified, but would have been led into a frame of mind which would have made the COLLIER'S appointment impossible. In the same way it is now a cause of the most extreme regret that all discussion of the Treaty of Washington was hushed in the Commons. This was partly owing to the retirement of Mr. DISRAELI from the real duties of his position, and partly to the unfortunate appointment of Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOKE as one of the Commissioners, which prevented the Conservatives from criticising the terms of the Treaty, lest they should cast dirt upon one of their friends and minor leaders. It is to be hoped that the precedent of seeking to avoid Opposition criticism by getting a leader of the Opposition to make himself responsible for the acts of the Government will never be repeated. It is quite true that, if a Conservative of eminent ability like Lord CAIRNS had gone as one of the Commissioners to Washington, the nation would have gained a great advantage; but this would have been impossible. Had so able a man as Lord CAIRNS been at Washington, he would have insisted on drawing up the Treaty as he knew it ought to be drawn up, and the Government at home would thus have been put in a secondary and unendurable position. It was only by getting a Conservative who held a place in his party much the same as that which Lord RUSSEL holds in the Ministerial party, that the supremacy of the Government at the other end of the Atlantic cable could be preserved, and at the same time the criticism of the Opposition prevented. This Session the Opposition is strong enough to proceed in the regular path which constitutional tradition assigns to it. A motion to censure the Government for the COLLIER'S appointment is to be made in both Houses, and Mr. COCHRAN gives notice that on an early day he will call the Government to account for its mismanagement of the Admiralty. Important matters will no longer be discussed at haphazard, or disposed of by stray and random votes. The speakers on both sides will do their best, and will strive to show that they have gone to the bottom of the matter debated, while the voting will force each voter to take a serious and deliberate part. Of course the Opposition keenly enjoys the change of circumstances which has opened this new field to them, but their gain in this respect is the gain of the whole country, and may even become the gain of the Ministry itself, if it is wise enough to give ear to the lessons of good counsel that will thus be forced on its hearing.

PRINCE BISMARCK AND THE ULTRAMONTANE PARTY.

PRINCE BISMARCK took occasion last week to unfold to the Prussian Assembly his views on the present pretensions and conduct of the Ultramontanes. Two Catholic deputies, one of whom, M. WINSTROCK, is a Hanoverian, had attacked the Government on account of the suppression of what is termed the Catholic division of the Ministry of Public Education and Worship. Their argument was that, according to the theory of the Prussian administration, the Catholics had a right to be represented in Ministerial circles in proportion to their numbers. This drew from Prince BISMARCK not only a vehement protest against any religious body urging any claim of the sort, but an exposition of the attitude towards the Ultramontane party which he said the Government has been forced to assume in consequence of the new form which the hostility of this party to the Government has taken. Prince BISMARCK spoke as usual with the utmost frankness and boldness. It is one of his chief pleasures to let all whom it may concern know from time to time what he has been observing, and what he is going to do in consequence of what he has observed. He has lately watched the course taken by the Ultramontane party in the elections, and he has seen that these violent members of the Romanist communion have not only got hold of a new dogma, but have been impelled by the fact of holding this new dogma into a new method of attacking the Prussian Government. Formerly the chiefs of the communion, the Pope himself and the German bishops, were perfectly well satisfied with the treatment which Catholicism received at the hands of the Prussian Government. They and their subordinates were treated with great respect and much courtesy, and were allowed to manage their own affairs very much as they pleased. But a new spirit has come over them, and the adoption of the dogma of Papal infallibility has been the cause of the change. In the first place, they wish to avail themselves of the power of the State in Prussia to punish or reduce to submission those recalcitrant members of their communion who hold professorial or ecclesiastical offices and will not accept the new dogma. In the next place, they regard Prussia and the Government of Prince BISMARCK, and the German Empire itself, as so many powers barring the way to the triumph of those views of social and political life which necessarily accompany or flow from the acceptance of the dogma of infallibility. The downfall of France and the virtual subjection of Southern to Northern Germany have been two heavy blows to the Papal cause; and if the dealing of these blows has been specially the work of any one man, that man is unquestionably Prince BISMARCK. The Ultramontanes have therefore set themselves to work against him, in the first place, by representing in electoral speeches and journalistic manifestoes the Prussian Government as a Government hard upon Catholics, unfriendly to them, and prone to deny them their just rights; and, in the second place, by combinations and intrigues with the Separatist party in the Imperial Assembly, to embarrass, if not to break up, the German Empire itself. Prince BISMARCK, among his other retorts on their attacks, denied that they really represented the Catholics of Prussia. To discuss whether he was justified or not in saying this would lead us into the wide field, every day acquiring new interest and importance, which is opened by the opposition of a section of the Catholic world to the new dogma. It is impossible to foresee, for example, how great may be the consequences of the revolt of the Vicar of the Madeleine against the authority or tyranny of the new Archbishop of PARIS. But although the larger and more general question of the true relation of the Ultramontanes to the Catholic world is of great moment to Europe, and must have been vividly present to Prince BISMARCK's mind, it may be worth while to study his speech from a narrower point of view. No contribution, probably, of equal value to the right comprehension of the current politics of Prussia and Germany has been made since the tender of the Empire at Versailles and the surrender of Paris completed the political and military successes of Prince BISMARCK and his master.

It is difficult for foreigners to pronounce how far Prussia can be at present considered to be a country under constitutional government. But it is quite certain that Prince BISMARCK has in all his recent utterances assumed that constitutional government exists in Prussia. In former days he was a strong opponent of the Liberal and constitutional party in the Prussian Assembly. He persistently said that the objects which that party had in view could not be accomplished by the means in which they confided. Prussia was constantly thwarted by Austria, which was the home of the mediæval and reactionist clique, and Prussia could not stir a step towards the unification of Germany because, first, Austria, and secondly, France, stopped the way. If Prussia was to be free at home and the bulwark of German unity, she must fight those who were ready to use force to prevent her attaining the ends she sought. The power of the King and the efficiency of the army must therefore be upheld before everything else. This was the opinion which Prince BISMARCK, rightly or wrongly, always upheld, and he acted up to it with that resolution and contempt for all opposition which distinguish his character. He laid Austria in the dust, he humbled the pride of France. The German Empire was created, and then he said the time was come for constitutional government at home. In strict accordance with these views he rejected the claims of the Ultramontane party, on the ground that they were totally incompatible with constitutional government. While the Government of Prussia remained the Government of an absolute monarch, it was, he said, quite consistent with good sense that there should be a Catholic division in the Ministry of Education and Religion. The King wished to know what each section of his subjects thought and desired on matters of considerable importance to them. He was not in the least bound to follow the advice or be influenced by the statements which they offered to his consideration. He was the sole judge and master, and the Catholic division was only an instrument by which he got together information which he was pleased to think might be of use to him. But things are quite different now. There is a Ministry responsible to the Assembly, and the members of this Ministry must have a certain mode of thinking in common, and must represent the opinions and aims of the Parliamentary majority that supports them. A Catholic division in a department of the Ministry would now be quite out of place. Either its views would have to be taken into account in the decisions at which the Ministry might arrive, and then the Ministry would no longer be in harmony with its supporters, or the opinions of the Catholic division would be entirely ignored, and then the existence of such a division would be superfluous. If, again, the Catholics were to claim a certain number of places in the Ministry because a certain number of Prussian subjects are Catholics, there is no saying where this would stop, and in every department of Government and administration there must be a distribution of offices on account, not of the fitness of the holders of office, but of the religious tenets they might happen to profess. All the sections of Protestants would require to be represented, as they too would have an unanswerable title not to be overlooked. A theological standard, or rather a series of theological standards, would dominate the whole of Prussian political life, and the result of such an absurd state of things would be, not only an abandonment of the wholesome traditions of Prussia, which try to thrust theological differences as much into the background as possible, but the downfall of constitutional government. The Assembly would be turned into an Assembly of the representatives of rival creeds, and every measure would be discussed from the theological point of view. No Ministry could hope to administer public affairs successfully, or to secure the passing of useful measures, if it was itself the motley representative of motley theologians. The thing must fail, and the country would be driven back again into absolutism.

The action of the Ultramontane party must not, however, be viewed simply as it regards Prussia. The Ultramontanes are the enemies of the German Empire as well as of the Prussian Government. They form a clique in the Imperial Assembly, the sole aim of which is to put the adherents of German unity into difficulties. With this end they have constituted themselves the allies of the heterogeneous factions which in the Imperial Assembly itself oppose that unity of Germany to represent which forms the main reason of the existence of the Assembly. There are still many parts of Germany in which a strong dislike of the new order of things prevails. The States violently annexed by Prussia after Sadowa abound with persons who regret the fall of the petty Governments under which they formerly flourished. With some this regret proceeds from an honourable attachment to rulers who befriended them, or from a traditional love for local independence. With others it is only a form of expression of general reactionary leanings. Others, again, have been mortified by the high-handed and arbitrary behaviour of Prussian officials; and a considerable number look back fondly to times when abuses prevailed by which they were allowed to profit. In the South of Germany Bavarians, and to some extent Wurtembergers, resent the inferiority to which the States to which they belong are now condemned in face of the eminence of Prussia. It is not very long ago that politicians of some tiny eminence dreamt that an arrangement would be possible under which Germany might be placed under the dominion or leadership of three Powers—Prussia, Austria, and a group of minor States, headed by Bavaria; and to men who dreamt such dreams it is mortifying to find how facts have belied their fancies. There is also a party, at present very insignificant, which longs to overturn the German Empire in order to raise up a democratic Republic on its ruins. The Prussian Ultramontanes have no real sympathies with either of these classes of politicians. They are Prussians, and are not naturally Separatists; they are Catholics, and all their principles would lead them to keep aloof from a Socialist or violently democratic Republic; and yet they work in concert with Separatists and democrats in order to promote what they conceive to be the interests of their Church. Theology comes with them before love of country or love of social order. Prince BISMARCK asks them to understand that he is quite alive to the game they are playing. It is, he says, his rule in politics to be the friend of his friends and the enemy of his enemies. The Ultramontanes are doing what they can to thwart him, and he will do what he can to thwart them. He does not affect to think that the German Empire has no enemies in Germany. He recognises that it has enemies, numerous, active, and unscrupulous. But he informs them, and by informing them he informs his friends also, that he will not be caught sleeping. He points out who his enemies are, and carefully measures their strength; and then says that he intends to fight them as hard as he can. Boldness in such a case seems to be the wisest and soundest policy. When Germans thoroughly understand that the Ultramontanes mean to destroy the unity of Germany if they can, and that Prince BISMARCK will not hesitate to do everything in his power to defeat them, his success is half assured. Intrigues and cabals and manœuvres such as are dear to all theological factions might do much mischief so long as attention was not drawn to them; but when the issue has once been decisively raised, whether the hopes of the German nation are to be baffled in order that the supporters of a new dogma may rule society and tyrannise over those whose submission they claim, there cannot be much doubt as to the answer which the bulk of Germans will give.

THE PROPOSED VOTES OF CENSURE.

IT would be unreasonable to blame Lord STANHOPE, Mr. CROSS, or the political friends with whom they have probably concerted their intended motion, for asking Parliament to censure a transaction which has out of doors been unanimously condemned; yet it may be permissible to express regret that the Opposition should not have thought it consistent with its duty to abstain from a discussion which may perhaps be unseasonable. It is perhaps still possible that when the opinion of both Houses has been elicited, and after the explanations of the Ministers whose conduct is impugned, the resolutions may be withdrawn. The safety and honour of the country are paramount to all ordinary considerations; and it is not desirable that the Government should be engaged in defending an isolated act of two of its members at the moment when its attention ought to be concentrated on the negotiations or discussions relating to the Geneva arbitration. Mr. GLADSTONE indeed, with obvious sincerity, welcomes the challenge which has been offered; but his personal feelings, though they are entitled to due regard, ought not to be put in competition with national interests. Since the discussion has become inevitable, it may be hoped that it will be conducted on both sides with moderation and good temper. The strong expressions which have been already used may supersede the necessity of too severe a censure on a proceeding which is not likely to be repeated. From the first, judicious politicians have regretted the probability that a division would be taken on a personal question. A vote of censure or of want of confidence is a legitimate mode of determining whether a Government shall be driven from office; but prudent leaders of Opposition have not been in the habit of delivering the blow until they have, like Sir R. PERL in 1841 and Lord PALMERSTON in 1859, satisfied themselves that it would be effective. There is much inconvenience in passing a censure on a Minister who will afterwards remain in office; and it is in the highest degree undesirable that as long as he commands a majority he should be driven from power by a formal Parliamentary vote. If indeed the appointment of Sir R. COLLIER had been illegal, as it was substantially irregular, it might have been absolutely necessary to correct the error by the authority of Parliament; but, as the formal validity of the appointment is not seriously disputed, any resolution which may be passed against the PRIME MINISTER or LORD CHANCELLOR will be abstract in character and inoperative in result.

Although Lord STANHOPE has formally moved for papers, the facts of the case are universally known, and the merits appear to ordinary apprehension to lie in a nutshell. It might, on the mere statement of the matter, seem to be obvious that an Act of Parliament which imposes a qualification for office virtually limits the choice of the Crown to candidates who have independently satisfied the legal condition. If the managers of the Corps of Commissionaires had, from motives of benevolence, determined to employ only one-armed men, they would probably not approve of an applicant who should cut off one of his arms in the hope of entering their service. A few years ago it is true that members of Parliament were in the habit of obtaining, by fictitious contrivances, the pecuniary qualification which was then required by law; but their ingenious devices were occasionally baffled by Election Committees; and they were not, in their capacity of candidates, either official keepers of the Royal conscience or principal representatives of the English nation. The evasion of a long-established law by a private person bears little analogy to the open disregard of a recent Statute by the Minister who passed it. The habitual connivance of society or of Parliament at a legal fiction is in itself a constructive excuse for irregularity; but legislation is useless if the Ministerial coach-and-six is to be deliberately driven through Acts of Parliament as soon as they are passed. In ordinary parlance a Judge of the Common Pleas is a functionary who has been appointed for the sole and ultimate purpose of administering justice in that Court. If a testator had left a fund to the Crown for the payment of the salaries of the Judges, it would be monstrous to promote additional Judges for the purpose of enabling them to receive a portion of the payment. A Judge who is made a Judge that he may immediately afterwards be made something else furnishes none of the usual guarantees of competency and character. Lord HATHERLEY would probably not, except in peculiar cases, appoint to the Common Law Bench Judges exclusively familiar with Chancery practice; but when the Court of Common Pleas is used as a stepping-stone, it becomes immaterial whether one of its nominal members is ever capable of discharging the duties of his office. Sir ROBERT COLLIER, indeed, was perfectly qualified for the place of Puisne Judge; but the Act of Parliament implied that the Chancellor who made the appointment should take nothing into consideration but the fitness of his nominee. In whatever way the case may be presented it is almost too plain for argument; but Mr. GLADSTONE's subtlety is more than sufficient to confuse any superficial plainness.

The Government is, it seems, prepared to contend that the construction which has been placed on the Act is correct, and that, as Mr. GLADSTONE injudiciously adds, the opposite construction would be mischievous to the public service. It is strange that a practised dialectician should fail to see that the correct construction of a given clause in a statute cannot possibly be affected by any benefit or injury which may accrue to the public service. If the provisions of the Act were injudicious, the Government is responsible for the miscarriage, and it has no right to correct by a forced interpretation the error of the Ministry or of Parliament. The appeal to expediency is almost equivalent to an admission that the obvious meaning of the enactment has been overruled or evaded. The daily eulogist and apologist of the PRIME MINISTER had already vindicated a similar irregularity, on the plea that Mr. GLADSTONE had disapproved of the restriction imposed by statute on the disposal of the living of Ewelme. If he had also objected to the statutory qualification for the office of paid member of the Judicial Committee, it would be a bold pretension to claim that his personal judgment should supersede the authority of an Act of Parliament; but in the particular case, those who introduced the Ministerial Bill deliberately omitted the mention of the law officers, who had been in earlier versions of the Bill placed in the same category with the Judges. The mischief which is supposed to be inflicted on the public service must have been distinctly contemplated by the framers of the Act; and it is a graver mischief to explain away a Judge of the Superior Courts into any barrister who may be promoted in order to give him a qualification. Mr. GLADSTONE may perhaps argue that no Government would appoint to the Judicial Committee a person who was not qualified for a seat on the Bench of the Common Pleas; but he has himself lately placed on the Committee a jurist who, however personally eminent, was not even a practising barrister. The only precedent for the appointment of a member who had not held judicial office was that of a lawyer who had recently been the undisputed head of the Equity Bar. It may be perfectly true that it was a mistake to interfere with the discretion which is in other cases exercised by Government. It is desirable that the fittest man should be selected, although he may have received no previous promotion; nor can it be alleged that judicial patronage has often been abused, although the most capable among several candidates may occasionally have been passed over; but questions of this kind have nothing to do with the only charge which has been brought against Mr. GLADSTONE and Lord HATHERLEY.

If Parliament had no more urgent business to attend to, it might be useful to prove, as far as a vote could establish the proposition, that Mr. GLADSTONE is mistaken in the meaning which he has no doubt conscientiously persuaded himself to attach to the clause in the Act of last Session. It would in any case be difficult to convince him that he had erred, or to fix his attention on the distinction between the letter and the spirit of a document; but it is only in vindication of vital truths that ATHANASIUS can afford to put himself in the balance against the world, and the unanimous verdict of Parliament, and of society in general, might perhaps raise a doubt even in an infallible mind. At present both Houses ought to be cautious in taking any course which can weaken the Government; and even if they decline to pass an adverse vote, they cannot be accused of condoning any atrocious crime. Mr. GLADSTONE is not a dark conspirator, nor is the excellent Lord HATHERLEY a traitor to his country, or an enemy of the human race. The PRIME MINISTER is unfortunately too fond of quibbles; and the CHANCELLOR extends to his own judgment the confidence which he might safely repose in his good intentions. Little weaknesses of this kind are irritating, and when they find vent in usurpation or abuse of authority they require to be checked; but the criticism which Mr. GLADSTONE has borne, as he declares, with patience, from friends as well as enemies, will probably serve as a warning for the future. The comments which have been made in all quarters will be repeated next week by Lord STANNOR and Mr. CROSS; and probably it will be found impossible to induce a non-official member of either House to defend the Ministerial construction of the Act. After due discussion and explanation, it may perhaps be possible for Lord HATHORLEY's friends on the Opposition benches to induce their colleagues to abstain from a hostile vote. In the House of Commons the case is simpler, inasmuch as the Government majority may fairly be rallied in opposition to a vote of censure. If the previous question or some colourless amendment is moved, no member is bound at the instance of an adversary to affirm or deny any proposition, except with a practical object of which he approves. Mr. HUME formerly said that he would rather vote that black was white than aid in defeating a Government which he wished to keep in office. In the present case it is unnecessary to assert anything which is even theoretically untrue. The House is, with the exception of the Treasury Bench, of one mind about the evasion of the Judicial Committee Act; but more than half its members are perfectly willing to support the Government. The Opposition are, in the present circumstances, not anxious to bring on a change of Ministry or a dissolution of Parliament. The centre of political interest is neither in Westminster Hall nor in England, but in the Cabinet and Senate at Washington.

PARIS AND THE ASSEMBLY.

THE French Assembly has definitively refused to return to Paris. A Parliamentary vote is of course open to be rescinded, and there are few things more certain than that the schism between the capital and the Government will not be perpetual. But it seems that the rules of the Assembly forbid the reopening of the question for six months, so that the work of Friday last can only be undone by a straining of Parliamentary forms which is greatly to be deprecated in a country where representative institutions have taken such imperfect root. And, whenever the decision may be reversed, it must, while it holds good, be regarded as a very serious matter. So long as the Executive and the Legislature are to be looked for elsewhere than in Paris, there can be no settled Government in France—no power confessedly superior to the mob of the capital. Versailles was described in the course of the debate as the strategical quarter of Paris, and the theory of the majority of the Assembly seems to be that, in fixing themselves at Versailles, they are only choosing a vantage ground from which Paris may be more completely controlled than from any nearer point. But such a control as is here contemplated is an exclusively military control—a control exercised over enemies, not over subjects. The police of a great city may be reduced, owing to exceptional circumstances, to the necessity of blockading the criminal quarter as the only means of keeping its inmates in check; but, so long as they dare not enter it, the law is militant, not triumphant.

The debate failed to call forth any new arguments. M. VAUTRAIN tried to persuade the majority that, had the Assembly been in Paris, the insurrection of the Commune would never have happened. His hearers, on the other hand, were firmly persuaded that, had the Assembly been in Paris, the insurrection of the Commune would never have been put down. It is not easy indeed to feel any confidence in the soundness of M. VAUTRAIN's conviction. Had the Assembly been in Paris last March, we confess to believing that it would have fared no better than some of its predecessors. But the conditions of the problem are altogether changed since that time. The Legislature was once saved by a fortunate absence from Paris from becoming the victim of revolutionary aggression, but it does not follow that the same degree of protection can be assured to it in no other way. In March the Assembly would have been weak in Paris for the same reason that it was actually weak at Versailles. The Government had no troops that it could trust; at all events, it did not trust those which it had. If the Commune had made an immediate and vigorous attack upon Versailles, it is by no means certain that the Assembly would not have been driven into space. But, with the army which M. THIERS can now command, the Deputies may feel as easy in one place as in another. While the troops are faithful to them, there is no danger in Paris; if they waver, there will be no safety in Versailles. Thus much of truth, however, there was in M. VAUTRAIN's speech. The presence of the Assembly might not have prevented the Communists from rising, but it certainly would have lost them the sympathy, passive or active, of a large part of the population. The pride of the Parisians was hurt and their trade injured by the arbitrary determination of the Assembly to hold its sittings somewhere else. They had just sustained a long and desperate siege, and at the very moment when they hoped to find the eyes of all Europe fixed upon them in admiration, they found the eyes of the French Assembly turned away from them in distrust. The revival of business to which they had trusted to make good their losses during the war was indefinitely delayed; the sufferings they had endured at the hands of the enemy were to be aggravated by the perverse timidity of their own countrymen. It is no wonder, therefore, that on the first outbreak of an insurrection which had Paris for its centre, and the aggrandisement of Paris for its aim, the shopkeepers should have overlooked the social heresies of the Commune in their admiration of its political purpose. So long as the Assembly persists in treating Paris as an enemy, it has no right to be surprised if the Parisians see a friend in any one who is the enemy of the Versailles Government. The Commune was probably not the last opportunity that will present itself for the gratification of this dislike.

The vote of Friday was made almost inevitable by the mismanagement of the Government. M. BUISSEAU dwelt with just severity on the inconsistency of first demanding urgency for the motion, and then proposing to postpone the consideration of it. It was not, he said, the majority that had forced the question on. It had been forced on by the Government against the wish of the majority. Now that the Government came forward to undo their own work, the majority had a right to decline to assist them. There is no answer to this reasoning. A Government which presses forward questions of this magnitude, unless it is prepared to resign in the event of the division going against it, exposes itself to just contempt. There are some subjects that ought either to be left alone altogether or treated as involving the existence of the Cabinet which introduces them. It is true that the unprecedented position which M. THIERS occupies makes the resignation of the Cabinet peculiarly difficult. Though they are his Ministers in name, they are his colleagues in fact. The policy they carry out is not dictated by the dominant party in the Assembly; it is the policy of the PRESIDENT. The course taken by M. THIERS upon the tax on raw materials showed his clear appreciation of this fact. The resignation of the Ministers was only an incident accompanying the resignation of the PRESIDENT. Great as are the inconveniences which belong to this state of things, it would be unfair to lay them wholly at the door of M. THIERS. The PRESIDENT of the Republic cannot resign every time the Assembly insists on having its own way, without endangering the stability of the Executive. Yet, if he accepts the alternative, and consents to see a policy which he thinks mischievous carried out by Ministers not of his own choosing, he is not playing the part assigned him at Bordeaux. Before M. THIERS can do all that is expected of him, he must be King and Minister in one. But this state of things, while it provides M. THIERS with exceptional excuses, ought to subject him at the same time to exceptional restraints. A statesman who knows that no important difference can arise between himself and the Legislature without his having to choose between sacrificing the dignity of his office and leaving the country a prey to confusion should be especially careful not to provoke such differences. If M. THIERS thought the return of the Government to Paris a question of sufficient moment to be forced on in an Assembly known to be bitterly opposed to it, he ought to have made as much of it as he did of his financial projects. If he was not prepared to go this length, he should have left it altogether alone.

Nor is it M. THIERS alone that has come out of this discussion with a diminished reputation. The Duke of ANJALU and the Prince of JOINVILLE have thought it expedient to declare that, had they been present during the division, they should have voted in favour of Paris. The inquiry naturally suggested by this notification is, Why were they not present? The silence of two Deputies about whose admission into the Assembly there was so much controversy, may often be due to a desire not to embarrass the Government. But though this motive may hinder the Duke of ANJALU from using his influence to throw out projects of which he disapproves, it need not interfere with his support of projects which he approves.

M. THIERS is anxious to see the Assembly consent to return to Paris, and any influence which the Princes of Orléans might have used on behalf of this step would have been a direct support of the existing Government. As it is, they have no right to wonder if their enemies attribute their abstention to their uncertainty whether the minority would be large enough to make it prudent for them to be classed among it. The exception to the general discredit which this vote has contrived to entail upon all connected with it is M. CASIMIR PÉRIER. His speech was not very vigorous, but he seems to have a degree of readiness to stand by his opinions, whatever may be the consequences of doing so, which is rare in France at present. Nothing, it seems, could have made him so popular, even with the majority against which he voted, as his determination to resign. There is some disposition on the part of the Deputies to regard M. THIERS's Ministers, especially M. POUYER-QUÉNETIER and M. JULES SIMON, as so many old men of the sea. The discovery that one of the Cabinet has persisted in leaving it is calculated to suggest a hope that the staying power of the rest may have been exaggerated.

THE TREATY WITH HOLLAND.

AS the Ministers seem to have been at a loss for matter when they framed the QUEEN'S Speech, they might perhaps as well have noticed the little colonial transaction which has produced some exorable excitement in Holland. As the negotiation for the transfer of the Dutch settlements on the Gold Coast was on both sides entirely voluntary, it may be taken for granted that neither Government has suffered by the bargain. Long experience has shown that neighbouring civilized Powers in contact with the same inferior races are in frequent danger of collision. Before the conquest of Canada the French and English in North America were always squabbling for influence with the Indian tribes; and on a small scale a similar antagonism prevailed on the West Coast of Africa between the Dutch and the English. The police of the seaboard was in the hands of two independent authorities, and the local chiefs probably believed that any disregard to the orders of either Government would be countenanced by the other. It is easy to believe that amalgamation or monopoly may have been the only effectual remedy for the inconveniences that ensued; and as the possessions of England in the neighbourhood were larger than those of the Netherlands, it was an obvious arrangement for the more considerable competitor to buy out a willing rival. The consideration is paid partly in money, but principally in concessions as to another colonial region. It seems that under existing treaties the English Government had a right to impose certain restrictions on the extension of Dutch power in the great island of Sumatra; and the claim, whatever it may have been worth, is henceforth abandoned in consideration of the cession of Elmina and the other Dutch forts on the Gold Coast. The confusion which has hitherto existed was explained by the intermixture or alternation along the coast of Dutch and English settlements. In similar cases private owners are generally anxious to round their estates by exchange or by purchase; and although it is not in the nature of English dependencies to be absolutely costless, the burden of maintaining the establishment will probably not be increased by the enlargement of the dominion. It may be inferred from the names of some of the local dignitaries that the population as well as the territory has been somewhat capriciously distributed. A patriotic representative of the subject King of ELMINA is called Mr. DAVID MILL GRAVES, and the burgomaster of the capital signs his name as J. HARMAN SMITH. It may be hoped that in time the alien clans of GRAVES and SMITH will find it possible to reconcile themselves to English rule. It is true that they are both probably of the race of HAN, but the original godfathers or patrons of their families would seem to have been rather English than Dutch.

The opponents of the measure in the Netherlands Parliament were fairly justified in their assertion that Holland is a great colonial Power. No European State can boast of historical achievements so illustrious in proportion to the number and natural resources of the population; and the administration of Java and of other Dutch settlements proves that, although from political changes it is no longer possible for the kingdom of the Netherlands to occupy the position which was held in the seventeenth century by the Confederacy and its Stadtholder, the national vigour has at the present day not been impaired. The jealousy which is excited by the withdrawal in any quarter of the boundary of an Empire is legitimate and respectable; but probably there is more to be gained in Sumatra than to be lost on the African coast. Some of the speakers complained that the English Government was annexing the diamond fields of South Africa at the expense of the little Dutch Republic which borders on the Cape Colony. Where English settlers go English authority must follow them with protection and control; and there is no reason to believe that the farmers of the Republic object to the practical extension of English territory. It might have been remembered that the independence of the Transvaal Republic was voluntarily established by the English Colonial Office only twelve or fifteen years ago. It is natural that the people of the Netherlands should sympathize with the descendants of their former colonists, but the South African Republic has no political connexion with Holland. If Dutch patriotism derives any satisfaction from recalling the exploits of RUTTER against the English in the days of CHARLES II., it may nevertheless be suggested that, because the Admiral visited Elmina and entered the Medway, it scarcely follows that a friendly cession of Elmina for full consideration is necessarily a compromise of national honour. Although Holland may no longer be equal in power to England, the arrangement which has recently been effected had nothing whatever to do with the naval or military superiority of either party to the contract. The Government of the Netherlands has apparently satisfied the Parliament that the covetousness attributed to England is wholly imaginary, and that there is no question of attempting to detach Surinam or Curaçao from the present allegiance.

Mr. GRAVES, the intelligent Envoy of the titular King of ELMINA, unintentionally explained the grounds of the transfer which he was sent to oppose. According to the statement which he was instructed to present, his countrymen of Elmina lately saved the colony from certain Fantee invaders, who were, it is said, instigated by the English. It may be conjectured that no barbarous tribe within some hundreds of miles has at any time engaged in a warlike expedition which has not been attributed to the malignant influence either of England or of Holland. When the Fantees recommence hostilities against Elmina, it will be impossible to suspect that they are set in motion by the Government which they will attack. It is not surprising that the German Minister at the Hague should have declined to interfere with an arrangement which exclusively concerns England and the Netherlands. It would hardly suit the purpose of the German Government to maintain the independence, or rather the Dutch government, of Elmina, on the general ground that no Power ought to annex a province against the supposed wish of the inhabitants. Perhaps the Elmina Ambassador may be induced to reconsider his amiable intention of persuading the King of ASHANTEE to cut off the heads of all the German subjects who may come within his reach. The sable potentate will probably reflect that the political representation of Elmina belongs henceforth not to the nominal King of his Envoy, but to the protecting Power. As Mr. GRAVES in the intervals of diplomatic employment keeps a shop or store in his native town, the increase of business may perhaps, unless he happens to be interested in contraband trade, console him in course of time for the shock inflicted on his feelings. The more important interests of the Dutch traders on the coast are protected by a guarantee of perfect free trade. In the days of commercial and colonial monopoly, the transfer of a dependency by one Government to another involved the destruction of an existing trade. On the other hand, the treaty provides that the merchants of the Straits Settlements shall be entitled to trade with Sumatra on equal terms with the Dutch. An equivalent for the concession is provided by the stipulation that the Surinam planters shall be entitled to obtain free labour from India as freely as the inhabitants of the English colonies. It would seem that all parties concerned benefit by the arrangement; but the principal advantage will accrue to the African tribes in the neighbourhood of the coast. They will no longer be able to indulge in warfare among themselves, nor will the Fantees attempt to conquer or devastate the English territories. The negotiations have taken many years to complete, and it may be fairly assumed that all interests involved have been duly protected.

Mr. RYLANDS, the self-appointed censor of foreign policy, referred to the Gold Coast Treaty with Holland when he lately propounded the doctrine that the Government would be better employed in effecting internal reforms than in filching colonies from neighbours by the dark practices of diplomacy. If he repeats his criticisms in the House of Commons, the Government may fairly adduce the treaty as an illustration of the benefit which the country may derive from the unostentatious activity of its diplomatic agents and of their chiefs at the Foreign Office. Lord CLARENDON, who set the scheme in motion, was probably influenced by the representations of the only persons who understood the condition of the Gold Coast settlements or the interests involved in the trade. The imports and exports of the Coast already amount annually to a million and a half; and in the probable contingency of the trade being doubled by the discouragement of disturbances and native wars, a small percentage on the profit will far more than repay the expense during several years of the English Legation at the Hague. The resources of the interior of the continent have been but imperfectly explored; but they have been both increased and rendered available for legitimate commerce by the suppression of the slave trade on the Western Coast. As the exports have hitherto exceeded the imports in value, it would seem that there must be a growing demand for English manufactures which will find their way from the coast to the interior. In an early stage of civilization cheap cutlery and cotton prints begin to be appreciated; and the inhabitants of the Gold Coast and their inland neighbours are fortunately not without the means of paying for the commodities which they require. If any advantages which may result from the acquisition of additional territory had been purchased at the cost of unfriendly conduct or disrespectful demeanour to Holland, they would have been bought too dear; but the Government and Parliament of the Netherlands are competent judges of the interest and honour of their country, and both have deliberately approved the transaction. As far as England is concerned, it is satisfactory to find that the Foreign Office is not always occupied in making unlimited concessions to powerful and exacting claimants. In commercial negotiations the Government can always secure the aid of skilled advisers who have in the special matter a common interest with the nation. The Foreign Minister is not, like the President of the French Republic, wiser than the manufacturers and the merchants who suggest to him the most effectual modes of opening and extending new or existing markets.

THE WEST RIDING AND GALWAY ELECTIONS.

THE elections which have occurred during the Recess have almost uniformly gone against the Government, and the meeting of Parliament has not broken the spell of defeat. Two more seats were lost on Tuesday; a close contest is apparently inevitable when the Speaker retires from North Nottinghamshire; and the only consolation that can be offered to the Government is that, if Mr. PENDER succeeds Mr. LOCH at Wick, its majority will not thereby be diminished. As regards the Irish elections, we should perhaps distinguish in fairness between the Government and the Ministry. It may be plausibly argued that the Home Rule candidates are opposed rather to the British Government than to any particular Administration, and that if the Conservatives had been in office the result would have been the same. At the same time it is obvious that if, as we are assured in the QUEEN'S Speech, serious crime has declined and trade and agriculture are unusually prosperous in Ireland, the constituencies either do not attribute these advantages to Mr. GLADSTONE'S policy, or they have chosen a singular method of showing their gratitude. The North-West Riding election has a significance which it is impossible either to overlook or to explain away. It is sometimes difficult to say precisely why one candidate is preferred to another. There is perhaps no broad political issue between them, or, if there is, it is complicated by personal preferences or local influences, and the constituency is swayed by a combination of motives. The personal popularity of one candidate may outweigh political objections, while his opponent may be acceptable in his opinions but not in himself. In the West Riding, however, the candidates appear to have been pretty equally matched. Each had been in Parliament before, each had a connexion with the county, and there seems to be no reason to suppose that one was personally more agreeable to the electors than the other. Nor were there, as far as we can see, any local questions involved. The election turned distinctly and exclusively on the choice between Radicalism and Liberal-Conservatism. Mr. HOLDEN endorsed the revolutionary intolerance of the Dissenting junta, and the subversive crotchets which have been taken up by the advanced wing of Mr. GLADSTONE'S party. Mr. POWELL adhered very closely to the programme which Lord DERRY sketched out the other day at Liverpool. The question most sharply at issue between the candidates was that of religious education. Mr. HOLDEN demanded secular instruction and the immediate disestablishment of the Church of England. Mr. POWELL supported the compromise of the Education Act, and deprecated any rash violence towards the Church or any other institution which, however it might offend fanatical theorists, was practically beneficial in its operation, and gave rise to no tangible grievance. It is true that Mr. POWELL was opposed to the Permissive Bill, while his antagonist either had, or was supposed to have, a leaning towards it; but it does not appear that this question caused much excitement in the West Riding, or exercised a decided influence on the election. The most prominent subject of controversy was undoubtedly the freedom of religious education, and it is significant that the efforts of Mr. MIALD and his friends in Bradford did not prevent Mr. HOLDEN from being left in a minority in that borough. The result of the first election since the Nonconformist declaration of war furnishes perhaps the best comment on the campaign to which they have committed themselves.

It appears that the return of Mr. POWELL has been hailed as a conclusive proof of the existence of what is called a Conservative reaction; but it may be doubted whether this is an accurate description of the political condition of the West Riding, or of other parts of the country where similar symptoms are observable. There can be no longer any doubt that the Liberal ranks are seriously divided. Mr. AKROYD, and other gentlemen who have hitherto been associated with that party, openly supported Mr. POWELL, and his success was clearly due to the votes or neutrality of a large body of Liberals. This indeed has been the common history of most of the elections which have taken place during the Recess. The Government has ceased to command the implicit confidence of its supporters; they are willing that it should remain in office, but they think it safer to clip its wings and restrain its flight. There is an indisposition to strengthen Mr. GLADSTONE'S authority, because it is not known to what use he may be tempted to apply it, and because it is suspected that it may be a use which will not be generally approved. It is thought, therefore, to be the more prudent course to keep down his majority, just as a cautious father reduces his son's allowance in order to put him on his good behaviour. It is true that the hurried violence of recent legislation has been followed by a condition of languor and fatigue; but it can hardly be said that there is a reaction in the sense of a desire to go back. The general feeling of the country appears to be merely a longing for repose, and a reluctance to go forward without a distinct understanding as to the direction and pace of movement. "Rest and be thankful" is again a popular device. The defection, as it is called, of Mr. AKROYD and others of his class may perhaps be attributed in some degree to social causes similar to those which have produced so remarkable a change in the political complexion of Lancashire; but there can be no doubt that it corresponds with the prevailing sentiment of important classes.

The Galway election is a characteristic illustration of Irish politics. Captain NOLAN, the Home Rule candidate, has been returned by an overwhelming majority, but it is not known whether, like Mr. MARTIN, he will sit and speak, but not vote, in the Parliament whose authority he repudiates. Mr. BUTT, whose rumoured appointment to a well-paid Indian judgeship has been contradicted, has expressed some doubts as to the prudence of challenging a decision on the Home Rule question in the House of Commons, and the Parliamentary organization of this great party of half-a-dozen members appears for the present to be impeded by the difficulty of determining which of them shall command it. It is stated that the priests took an unusually active part in the Galway election, addressing their flocks from the altar in favour of Captain NOLAN on successive Sundays, and heading the march of voters to the poll. In Kerry clerical influence is also said to have been vigorously exercised on behalf of Mr. BLENNERHASSETT, another champion of the Home Rule movement. Sir T. BURKE, who was declared by an excited priest to have rung his own death-knell, complained to the Archbishop, and was assured that the expression was used in a purely political sense; but it might have led to unpleasant consequences if the words had been literally construed by a passionate and ignorant peasant. It may be doubted whether clerical intimidation will be checked by the Ballot; a threat of divine wrath does not depend for its effect on the disclosures of a scrutiny. During the Galway election there was some rather serious rioting in different parts of the county, several people were injured, and on one occasion the Riot Act had to be read. In Kerry the authorities have during the week been prepared for similar disorders. The Home Rule candidate deprecated violence, but his opponent Mr. DEANE had already had his ribs broken by the mob. The various candidates who have taken up the cry of self-government for Ireland have been careful not to enter too minutely into explanations of the practical nature of the project. It is announced that the object is not to obtain a repeal of the Union, but to promote the "reconstruction of society," and to transfer legislation for Ireland from those who misunderstand or neglect it to those who have an interest in advancing the welfare of the country. It is necessary that the Imperial Treasury should play an important part in this scheme of social reconstruction, and the Union is to be preserved to the extent of placing Imperial revenues at the absolute disposal of patriotic Irishmen for the benefit of local interests. It appears to be also thought desirable that arrangements should continue to be made for the admission of Irishmen into the civil and military service of the Crown. Another concession which the Home Rulers may not be indisposed to grant is that the British Government should continue to advance money to Irish tenants, who desire to become landlords; but the payment of interest or rent in return for those advances will of course be a purely Irish question, to be settled by the free will of an independent people. It may be supposed that, if there were any chance of the Home Rule movement becoming really serious, there are people in Ireland who, for their own sake, would at once take care to put it down. It is to a belief in its impotence that it owes the factitious importance which it has been allowed to assume. The respectable classes who have no sympathy with reckless agitators, and who would be the first to turn upon them if they gave any indication of being practically dangerous, are willing to play them off upon the Government, in the hope that a little pressure of this kind will help their own demands. It is for the Government to show that this pressure has ceased to be effectual.

LORD RUSSELL ON THE EDUCATION ACT.

NO reputation is safe from being discredited by the subsequent freaks of its possessor, and if Lord Russell had not been "obliged to write again on the subject of education," he would have been open to just censure for giving this unpleasant spectacle to the world. But, as the victim of compulsion, he has a claim to sympathy and condolence, and the things he has said under the pressure of this necessity make the claim an unusually strong one. To be obliged to write must always be a hardship; to be obliged to write as Lord Russell has now written is a misfortune of extraordinary magnitude. He begins, it is needless to say, with an historical retrospect. The object of this survey is apparently to disprove the claims usually set up with regard to popular education on behalf of the Church of England. The clergy have really been the enemy that sowed the tares in the educational field. The object for which the National Society was founded was simply to counteract the efforts made by Lord Russell's father to provide "schools for all." In these admirable institutions the Bible was daily read, and the Roman Catholics of that generation seem to have been made of less stern stuff than their descendants, since for some years they, as well as the Jews, sent their children to these schools "without scruple or objection." This delightful harmony might have lasted till now if the clergy had not interfered. They were "generally opposed to the education of the poor," and to give effect to their opposition they invented Denominationalism. Schools for all were making progress; their further extension must be checked by the establishment of schools for some. Hence the National Society. It might have been thought that the really guilty people in this transaction were not the founders of the National Society—who, even on the principles of Lord Nottingham and Lord Mansfield, had a right to teach their religion in whatever way they chose—but the Government which aided them with public money without insisting upon a conscience clause. It may be unjust to help one man to teach his children and not to help another; but it has not usually been held that a man ought to leave his own children without education unless he is prepared to educate at the same time the children of all his neighbours. Perhaps the fact that Lord Russell was himself responsible for the assistance formerly given by the Government to strictly Denominational schools may account for his shifting the blame to the shoulders of the clergy. It will be admitted, however, that his last retrospect is a great advance on those that have gone before it. Hitherto Lord Russell has been rather given to the production of jejune summaries of universally known facts. This time he has soared above the level of Mangnall's Questions, and has invigorated his statement with a warm imaginative glow. The future historian will hardly turn to his house for information as to the early history of National Schools; but the novelist may study it to learn how to give verisimilitude to a narrative which is absolutely the creation of the writer's own brain.

The Birmingham League will perhaps survive Lord Russell's regret that they "have adopted the fallacious and inadequate plan of secular instruction." But if they wish to maintain their character for ingeniously misrepresenting the intentions of the Education Act they must be on the alert. For perverse unfairness of criticism it will not be easy to rival Lord Russell. He describes the 25th section of the Act as sanctioning "an exclusive rate far worse than the former 'Church rate.'" How the epithet "exclusive" can be applied to a rate which is spent in paying the fees of indigent children at any elementary school which their parents may prefer is not evident, but the description of the actual working of this clause is more wonderful still:—"As matters stand at present, half-a-dozen pauper parents who 'have been cajoled by the Church can inflict a rate upon their neighbours, three-fourths of whom may differ from the Church on the thorny and obscure question of infant baptism.'" Nothing can be more certain than that the neighbours of these cajoled paupers would have to pay a much larger rate if the 25th section were repealed, since in that case, whenever a parent was ordered to send his child to school, and pleaded inability to pay the school fee, it would be incumbent upon the School Board to build a School Board school for his exclusive use, while all the time there might be ample room for him in a voluntary school close by, and his parents might actually wish him to be sent there. Taken by itself, the reference in this paragraph of the letter to the "thorny and obscure question of infant baptism" appears hopelessly unintelligible. As the only question in dispute is whether the School Boards shall teach reading, writing, and arithmetic by a master of their own providing, or pay the master of a school already in existence to impart this rudimentary instruction, the opinions of the ratepayers on matters of sacramental doctrine seem beside the mark. But a later paragraph clears up the mystery. "To force Baptist parents to pay a rate for the enforcement of the Church Catechism," says Lord Russell, "is an unjust and persecuting innovation." From this it appears that Lord Russell supposes that the fees paid to Denominational schools go to defray the cost of religious as well as secular instruction, and that all the children attending the school are compelled to be present at the religious lesson. No misconception less complete would cover the whole of Lord Russell's proposition. Before a Baptist parent can be correctly described as forced to pay a rate for the enforcement of the Church Catechism, the Church Catechism must be forced on the scholars, and the money of the Baptist parent must go to assist the process.

From these general views on the subject of education Lord Russell turns to defend himself against the sneers of "a Bedfordshire Clergyman"—a phrase in which we seem to recognize a characteristically inaccurate reference to the letters of "a Hertfordshire Incumbent," who has blamed him for "saying that those who arrived at years of discretion might decide for themselves whether they might join the Church or any other Protestant, or the Roman Catholic, Communion." Lord Russell refers for a justification of his statement to the preface to the order of Confirmation. The Church of England, he considers, has shown "its usual wisdom" by giving a locus penitentiae to all children baptized into its pale. It "approves the entrance of a child a fortnight old into the 'Christian Church,' but it 'sees the absurdity of supposing that a babe who cannot speak or understand can be bound irrevocably to the faith' professed in its behalf. It is ordered, therefore, that children who are come to years of discretion shall ratify and confirm with their own knowledge and consent what has been promised for them by their godfathers and godmothers." Lord Russell acknowledges that this form is too often only a form—that a child "who has for years said the Lord's Prayer at its mother's knee, who has gone regularly 'with its parents to the parish church, and has learnt to say the Creed and the Ten Commandments, is easily induced to 'attend and renew its promises openly.' Still the Church itself repudiates this unfair pressure, and 'asks the children now come to years of discretion for their own assent.'" Lord Russell assumes that to ask assent is the same thing as to allow dissent; but supposing him to be right in his interpretation of the Prayer-Book, it would be well that this should be more clearly expressed in the Confirmation Service. A very slight addition would remove all doubt upon this head. The Bishop might be ordered to instruct the candidates, before putting the question which begins "Dost thou," that they are not to answer "I do" unless it is their own wish. It must be borne in mind, however, that on this supposition the Church of England goes a good deal further in its "usual wisdom" than most secular moralists have been accustomed to go. The promise in respect of which the Church "asks the children now come to years of discretion" for their own assent does not relate exclusively to belief. It is largely concerned with practice. But there is nothing to show that the Church makes any distinction between one part of it and another, and consequently, on Lord Russell's theory, it must equally intend that those arrived at years of discretion shall decide whether they will or will not renounce the lusts of the flesh. No doubt a very considerable amount of choice is exercised on this point; but it is something new to have it laid down that the Church of England wishes her members to approach the question with as little bias as the natural prejudices of education will allow.

It is clear from the last paragraph of Lord Russell's letter that, if he were ten years younger, the disestablishment of the Church of England would have to be added to the list of enterprises which he is ready to undertake at a moment's notice. He is full of surprise that "the present Ministry have taken no pains to retain and conciliate so valuable and distinguished a colleague as Mr. MIALI," and he intimates, not obscurely, that, if the choice lay with him, he would rather have Mr. MIALI's friendship than that of "the bishops and clergy, and the congregations committed to their charge." New joint-stock companies are rather fond of getting an aged peer for their chairman, and the Liberation Society may perhaps like to advance to the charge for which their trumpets have lately been sounding under the leadership of the author of the Durham letter and other equally brilliant raids into the region of ecclesiastical politics. At all events, if this is their desire, there is no fear that Lord Russell will incline an unfavourable ear to their prayer.

STATE CEREMONIALS.

EVERYBODY remembers the celebrated "purple patch" in Lord Macaulay's essay on Warren Hastings; it is an excellent bit of rhetoric of its kind, and it is hard to read it without being carried away for the moment by the imposing roll of sentences, by the historical allusions to Rufus and Baron Somers and Strafford, and by the graphic portraits of the distinguished spectators of the show. There, as we remember, the "historian of the Roman Empire thought of the days when Cicero pleaded the cause of Sicily against Verres"; there were "the greatest painter and the greatest scholar of the age"; Sir Joshua was allured from his easel, and the grand spectacle had "induced Parr to suspend his labours in that dark and profound mine from which he had extracted a vast treasure of erudition, a treasure too often buried in the earth, too often paraded with injudicious and inelegant ostentation, but still precious, massive, and splendid." This and much more of the same kind is known by heart to many of the author's favourite schoolboys. Is it fair to look too closely into the gorgeous sentences, and to ask whether they are really gold embroidery or tinsel? At times we feel the language to be a little overcharged and provocative of a certain scepticism. We wonder whether Gibbon really thought what he ought in all propriety to have thought, or whether his mind was perhaps more occupied with the possible effects of draughts, or with the atrocious behaviour of somebody who was treading upon his toes. Did it want much persuasion to induce Parr to suspend his labours in that mine the treasures of which seem, rather oddly, to have been at the same time extracted and buried in the earth? or did the deprivation of his much-loved tobacco weigh upon his spirits more than the absence of books? In one or two passages the upholstery arrangements are a little too prominent. Neither military nor civil pomp, we are told, was wanting. There were grenadiers and cavalry outside; whilst "the Peers, robed in gold and ermine, were marshalled by heralds under Garter King-at-Arms," and "the Judges in their vestments of State attended to give advice on points of law." The gold and ermine and the vestments of State give, we fear, a slight tinge of vulgarity to the eloquence; and we can hardly refrain from a smile when the orator rolls forth the imposing name of "Garter King-at-Arms" in such simplicity of faith. It may be wrong, but in our fancy poor Garter King-at-Arms would be a fit companion for the lion and the unicorn in "Looking-Glass land," rather than a personage made visible and tangible to our senses. It is curious to turn from the rhetorician to a keen humorist, and to contrast with this glowing description Thackeray's account of the funeral of Napoleon. Here we have the seamy side of the tailoring and upholstery business. We hear how the awed and expectant throng stamped their cold feet and blew their fingers and munched their ham sandwiches, and laughed at the unfortunate Englishwomen in an outrageous bonnet, who with true national obstinacy succeeded, in spite of rebuffs, in forcing her way into a good place. There are distinguished personages enough, but we are not invited to bow down before them in solemn reverence. There is your old Memory, for example, the Governor of Paris in 1814, who has been praying to live over this grand ceremonial; for him we cannot but have a kindly feeling, but we can hardly say as much for the other "illustrious Marshal who once carried a candle before Charles X. in a procession, and has been this morning to Neuilly to kneel and pray at the foot of Napoleon's coffin. He might have said his prayers at home, to be sure, but don't let us ask too much; that kind of reserve is not a Frenchman's characteristic." We may be glad that Englishmen have still some of it; but if they overcome their shy reluctance to publicity on any future occasion, we can guess how the imitators of Macaulay would work their prayers into a bit of fastian. At length the drums beat, and the guns roar, and the audience draw their breath as they do when the rockets go up at Vauxhall, and the clergy chant in "a weak, snuffling, lugubrious manner," and Napoleon's coffin passes. "A box covered with a great red cross, a dingy-looking crown lying on the top of it—seamen on one side and Invalids on the other—they had passed in an instant and were up the aisle."

Which of the two reporters suits our feelings best? It is needless to decide, for at all public ceremonials that we happen to have witnessed, the real impression is produced by the conflict of two currents of feeling, which probably get the mastery by turns. The gravediggers in Hamlet, according to our English taste, serve to heighten the pathos of Ophelia's funeral. It would seem, indeed, that we take pains to reproduce the same effect by our national method of conducting that melancholy ceremony. The pathetic and exquisite service of the English Church stands out in relief against the clumsy and ludicrous mummeries of the British undertaker. That estimable person does not generally possess Shakespearian humour; but he does his best by his pompous affectations to provide an efficient contrast to the natural manifestations of grief. We could dispense with a great part of his services as being superfluously incongruous and obtrusive; but there must always be a certain element of the mechanical and the prosaic even in the most solemn ceremonies, which we do not desire to ignore too completely. It is well to remember that even the most impressive ceremonies destined to give expression to the deepest feelings of a nation are very far from absorbing all its energies. There are sandwiches to be eaten and noses to be blown even when our greatest heroes are being carried to their final repose; and all the gold lace and ermine and upholstery in the world has a seamy side to it somewhere. The ceremonial which has recently taken place at Westminster, and that which is about to take place at St. Paul's, undoubtedly correspond to genuine sentiments. Englishmen have a considerable regard for their Parliamentary institutions, and we need not speak of the sympathy excited by the recovery of the Prince of Wales. It would be unbecoming in the one case, as it would be superfluous in the other, to point out how much that is insincere or unworthy mixes with the public demonstrations in these as in every other ceremonial conducted by human beings. If we refuse to confine ourselves to the imposing exterior, we may detect abundant illustrations of the manifold meannesses of which the world is made up. The lessons which we should learn would not be the less profitable because they would not all bear public expression. We do not by any means condemn for such reasons any State ceremonial which has in it a genuine core of belief. There is indeed something occasionally impressive in an entire absence of pomp. Visitors to the United States during the civil war might see a gentleman in commonplace costume, surrounded by less state than attends the mayor of the smallest English borough, who, as was said, had only to touch a bell in order to place in arrest any obnoxious person in a population of twenty millions. There was in its way something striking to the imagination in such a combination of external simplicity with the possession of almost unlimited power. It is merely a question of art. There are occasions on which we may fully study the utmost possible simplicity, and there are others on which we may fairly aim at producing the most gorgeous effects. The grand rhetoric of Milton or of Burke may be as appropriate in one sphere as the straightforward vernacular of Swift and Cobbett in another. There is a time for all things in this world, as the wise man reminds us; a time for talking sense, and a time for talking nonsense; a time for the baldest method of stating facts, and a time for soaring, if we can manage it, to the loftiest flights of eloquence. And it is plain that the British constitution, depending so much as it does upon the prestige of a long series of uninterrupted historical associations, must frequently call for ceremonials of a gorgeous character which are attempts to put into tangible shape the vague mass of recollections that floats before our minds. We would not rashly abolish Garter King-at-Arms, or even a single beefeater, though we need not be altogether blind to the ridiculous side of some ancient observances. It is in fact desirable to keep up a sense of the ridiculous, if only to check the tendency of the mere upholstery to take leave altogether of reality, and to become a mere mass of meaningless pomposity. The misfortune is perhaps that our sense of ridicule is apt to be a little too keen. The disposition to criticism passes the bounds at which it is a useful check. It infects the unfortunate performers themselves; and though a Garter King-at-Arms is a very harmless, and even at times a very useful, institution, he is apt to break down when he is failing even to believe in himself. In this as in every other case it is impossible to lay down any mechanical rule for deciding what can only be properly decided by instinctive taste. Thus much perhaps may be said with more or less confidence—that it is better to make an

the side of simplicity, and that we should therefore abstain altogether from any ceremony in those cases where their absence would be felt as painful. A monument should always be erected for the sake of the person commemorated, not the person commemorated for the sake of the monument. A ceremony becomes absurd in proportion as it is intended to give rise to a sentiment, and not to provide a vent for a sentiment which exists already; and the same principle would be applicable to many of the details of such matters. We do not mean of course to hint the slightest doubt as to the propriety of the two performances we have referred to; we simply suggest that the strain of sentiment described by Macanlay may have a complement in the vein of satire to which Thackeray has given expression. It need hardly be said that there is a wide distinction between simplicity and shabbiness, and that, when it is thought desirable to have a public ceremonial with any pretensions to magnificence, it should be carried out handsomely, and without niggardly reserves.

RABAGAS.

IT is a familiar boast among Frenchmen that in their country ridicule kills, and that no party or institution can survive being laughed at. If this is true, some of the recent productions of the French theatre would seem to be somewhat ominous for the Republic. If Beaumarchais helped on the great Revolution with his Mariage de Figaro, succeeding dramatists have not shown themselves favourable to democracy. Perhaps under a Monarchy or Empire they may from malice have given a carping tone to their pieces, but as soon as a Republic has been established they have invariably turned against it. The performance of such burlesques as La Propriété c'est le Vol and La Foire aux Idées, no doubt, had their effect in disintegrating the Republic of 1848; and Rabagas and some other plays which have lately been brought out in Paris are apparently aimed at the democratic Republicans. It is known that the censorship is very strict in France, and that the present Government has no hesitation in suppressing any publication which displeases it. Several Bonapartist and Radical journals have been summarily punished, and the Minister of Justice is now considering whether he ought not to put a stop to the circulation of a "Popular Republican Catechism," in which the alarming doctrine is advanced that every man has a right to personal freedom and the use of his senses. On the other hand, not only has M. Sardou's Rabagas been allowed to be produced without, it is said, the alteration of a word by the censorship, but a strong force of police is employed to keep an eye on any perverse Radicals who may attempt to get up a demonstration against it. It is impossible to resist the inference that this comedy enjoys to a certain extent the patronage of the Government, and that M. Thiers is not sorry that M. Gambetta and his friends, at whom the piece is supposed to be levelled, should be presented in a ridiculous aspect to the Parisians. The play does not appear to be of much value from a strictly literary point of view, and the central idea is old and commonplace; but it is worked out with a good deal of vigour and vivacity, and at any rate it seems to please. On the first night the Democrats showed their teeth; the curtain fell amid great disorder, cries of "Vive la République!" were answered by "A bas les communistes!"; and the gas had to be turned off in order to compel the audience to disperse. The controversy was transferred to the streets, where the disputants fell to blows, and at one moment there were fears of a riot. The next evening there was only a little hissing, but it was observed that groups of men, isolated in appearance but evidently with a common understanding, had assembled in the neighbourhood of the theatre, and it was suspected that these were Democrats watching for an opportunity to renew the disturbances of the previous night. Since then the hissing within and the crowds without have both subsided. Those who resent a satire of this kind are obviously at a disadvantage, because their resentment is at once seized upon as an acknowledgment that the cap fits. M. Gambetta's more prudent friends have discovered that Rabagas is not Gambetta but Ollivier. M. Sardou's own explanation would perhaps be that it is not a portrait but a type. The political significance of the affair is that, whether rightly or wrongly, Rabagas is popularly identified with Gambetta, and that the Parisians are on the whole delighted with the caricature. It is quite possible that this may smooth the way of the Assembly back to Paris.

The plot of the piece, as far as Rabagas is concerned, is very simple. Readers of Mr. Browning will remember his King's Tragedy, in which the wily old legate, having a revolt to quell, tackles the leader in a private interview, and wins him over by exciting his ambition, and pointing out his superiority to his confederates, who already envy and distrust him, and his fitness for a higher sphere. This is, in substance, the story of Rabagas of Monaco. "Le plus joli batailleur de phrases, un aventurier jovial, bon gaçon et grand taiseur de chopin," who is the life and soul of the Bode of the little principality. He writes shocking articles for their newspaper, Le Carnegole. He makes tremendous speeches at their club, and whenever he holds a brief for a criminal he takes care to direct his glowing rhetoric against the authorities. "When civilization gets worn-out, you are sure to come upon the export: as the man of action disappears the theoretician appears." This is the political text on which the dramatist punches; and when he talks of "Hymenism, squabbling about an adverb more or less, while, gliding through the shade, the Turks, who act and do not talk, are suddenly at his gate."

There can be little doubt at whom the piece is pointed. While Gambetta vapours, Molike is at your gate—that is the prompt translation of the dullest fellow in the pit. Round the central figure is grouped the select society of the Chaparré Folies, a dingy tavern which is not only the headquarters of the revolutionary club, but the office of the Carnegole. Over the door is a notice that a fine of fivepence will be inflicted for any allusion to the Deity. The company is a choice collection of broken persons and disappointed ambitions; the barrister without briefs, the doctor without patients, the dramatist who has been hissed, the discharged clerk, the cashiered officer, a defaulter, three bankrupts, two blacklegs, a Utopianist, seven idiots, and eight drunkards. This is light, liberty, and progress at Monaco! A simple-minded youth, whose father is a well-to-do shopkeeper, is welcomed and fleeced. He is continually losing half-francs for saying "Mon dieu!" and whenever anything has to be paid for, the bills are handed over to him. The great General Petrowaki, the knight-errant of democracy and commis-voyageur of liberty, who undertakes to head the projected rebellion if he is provided with a gorgeous uniform and liberal pay, but who is sadly scared by the shadow of a gendarme, and a couple of very free and easy young ladies, complete the group. We are introduced to these amiable conspirators while they are engaged in concocting a number of their newspaper. Rabagas has just returned from successfully defending a victim of society who had kicked an old garde-champêtre to death with his wooden shoes; but then, as he argued, killing a garde-champêtre is not murdering a man, it is only crushing a principle. A subscription has been got up for a widow's pig which has been run over by the despot's carriage. Letters from correspondents are received and answers supplied. One has a scheme by which the working classes are to obtain ten hours' pay for five hours' work, with a whole holiday every Monday to allow for recovery from the relaxations of Sunday. Another reports the funeral oration of a materialist at the burial of his wife with civil rites, proving with much eagerness that he can never meet her again in any other world. A soldier writes to ask whether as a citizen he is bound to obey his sergeant, a question which is promptly answered in the negative.

While a rising against the Government is being planned with much enthusiasm, an invitation to a ball at the Palace arrives for Rabagas. His companions are disgusted that he should think of accepting it, especially as he will have to go in knee-breeches, the livery of servitude. He is warned that a man who begins with knee-breeches may come to decorations at last. The Democrats of Monaco share Mr. Peter Taylor's conscientious objections to the appearance of a "sans-culotte en culotte!" But Rabagas is not to be shaken in his determination to visit the Court. Rubespierre, he says, wore knee-breeches, and, after all, they are only trousers cut short. So he goes and falls into the trap that has been laid for him. It was set and baited by a clever American widow, with whom the Prince is deeply in love, and who responds by pitying him, at least as a sovereign, and by doing what she can to help him in his difficulties with his subjects. She has seen through Rabagas and gets over him very much as the legate gets over the revolutionary leader in Browning's drama. What good, she asks, would he get by a revolution? It would go to the profit of the low fellows of the Crapaud Volant, if of anybody, and with such a set Rabagas, an aristocrat by genius, if not by birth, an aristocrat by his instinct for the good, the great, the delicate, the fine, could have no real sympathy. Opposition, the temptress argues, is not an end but a means, and the portfolio of Minister is better worth having than the leadership of a pothouse club. Rabagas yields; he takes office as the Prince's chief advisor; but when the mob, howling around the palace, learn his appointment, their rage is doubled instead of being calmed; they receive him, when he presents himself on the balcony, with groans and hootings, and he is the first to propose that the dragoons should charge the people. Having borrowed the Prince's carriage, he is captured by mistake and imprisoned in the Hôtel de Ville, where he witnesses a succession of impromptu Governments. For broad humour this is perhaps one of the most telling passages in the comedy. A provisional Government having established itself in the green room, another Government turns the key on it and installs itself in the yellow room. Soon after a third Government, entering by the window, establishes itself in the red room, and locks up the yellow room Government, which still holds captive the green room one. But this last escapes by the chimney, returns by the cellars, and compels the red Government to jump out of the window by which it had entered, while the yellow Government seeks shelter on the roof. The chiefs arrest each other, and up to the time at which Rabagas himself escaped there had been three Governments in three-quarters of an hour. Anybody who will take the trouble to turn back to an account of the 4th of September and 31st of October will perhaps be surprised to find how closely the history of those days approaches to Sardou's broad farce. The joke, however, has at least a serious side for the Parisians, which might, on reflection, tempt them, as the vulgar phrase goes, to laugh on the other side of their mouth. Rabagas, played out in Monaco, starts for France, the only country, he says, where people of his stamp are appreciated. And with this the play ends. In character Rabagas resembles Ollivier more than Gambetta, though he exhibits some traits of both. The object, no doubt, is to discredit the democratic Republicans, and this object will perhaps be accomplished with the assistance of the Government, which may be surprised to find hereafter that it has thus been undermining its own position.

is construed along with another piece by the same writer—a piece of a very different kind, but with much the same moral. In Le Roi Carotte, which is not a comedy but a burlesque, there is little, if any, trace of Sardou's incisive and vigorous wit, at least in the published version; but the censorship may have dealt with it less indulgently than with his later play. Prince Fridolin, who is supposed to recall memories of the Empire, is a light-hearted, frolicsome monarch, who has led rather a wild life, and is now disposed to settle down and behave respectably. He is deposed by Le Roi Carotte, a wretched creature composed by a witch out of the vegetables she has boiled in her caldron; his misfortunes help to sober him and to cure him of his fondness for a certain Princess Ounégonde, who may be presumed to typify the Quartier Bréda. The fickleness of the populace and the treachery of courtiers are illustrated by Fridolin's experience, and in the end he is restored to his throne with every promise of a reputable reign. In the course of his adventures he is cast by shipwreck on the Island of Monkeys, and the antics of the apes are supposed to point to some of the peculiarities of the Commune. Another popular burlesque, Qui veut voir la Lune? exhibits a couple of Parisians, who, visiting the moon, are received as the "monkeys of the earth," and welcomed to a Republic "one and invisible"; but even in the moon Republics are not exempt from the fatal influence of reaction. It is tolerably clear that the intention of the satirists is to ridicule the democratic impatience and inconstancy of the capital. The bourgeoisie finds it an easy way of settling old scores with the Radicals to go to the theatre and laugh at them; but perhaps it may turn out that ridicule is not so potent an influence in politics as most Frenchmen imagine, and that revolutions are not to be averted by simply going to the play.

THE VIRTUES OF RED TAPE.

IN one of those naval tales which formed the delight of a past generation there is an amusing account of a triangular duel, which, as far as our memory serves, ran somewhat in this fashion:—A had quarrelled with B and C, while these latter had no cause of mutual dispute. But, in order to bring matters to an issue as speedily as possible, and to save time, the following arrangement was planned and carried out by a second, whose ideas on these subjects were taken from the code of Sir Lucius O'Trigger. A, who owed satisfaction to the other two disputants, was to fire at B; and B, instead of returning A's shot, was to aim at C, with whom he had no difference, while C was to clear off his own score and that of B with A, by firing at this person. In the end, if we remember right, one man was shot in the cheek, and went off the ground wondering if he should be able to hail, or give the word of command in a gale of wind. Another of the combatants was hit in a more equivocal part of the person, but no one was killed or maimed, and the affair terminated "satisfactorily." The late disclosures of the proceedings of the Admiralty show that business has been conducted pretty much on the idea of responsibility which was present in the mind of the officer in Marryat's tale when he sketched out the above plan for a duel. Letters are received and opened by anybody, are minuted in one department, and are sent on for the answer to be drafted by another, while the reply is signed and issued by a Secretary who has never seen the original communication, the minute, or the draft. We may, however, for the present, leave this nautical chaos, these phantom Boards, and those inchoate reforms which appear only to have ramified error and to have facilitated confusion, to the remedies which will doubtless be suggested or proposed by Lord Lawrence and his colleagues. We merely hope to show how business is conducted in a great Dependency where the officials certainly do not err on the side of moderation in letter-writing, and where a bad system of record and revision might lead to errors as formidable in their consequences as those under which unroasted coffee was served out to troops in a Russian winter, or a rotten ship was freighted with valuable lives, and exposed to the gales of the Southern Ocean.

The Government of India, presided over, as all are aware, by a Viceroy, assisted by the Commander-in-Chief, by a general officer known as the Military Member of Council, by an eminent jurist, by two experienced Indian administrators, and, occasionally, by an English financier, is divided into five great departments, to which very recently there has been added a sixth—that of Agriculture and Commerce. Under the Imperial or Supreme Government, so constituted, are no less than eight subordinate or local governments—that is to say, the Governorships of Madras and Bombay, the three Lieutenant-Governors of Bengal, Agra, and Lahore, and the three Chief Commissioners of the Central Provinces, Oudh, and British Burmah. For our present purpose these are sufficient, without taking into account the kingdom of Mysore, administered in a paternal fashion during the minority of its lawful possessor, and the important Political Agencies or Residencies in Rajpootana, Central India, and Nepal. Before explaining the distribution of business between the Viceroy and his councillors, we shall endeavour to show how correspondence is registered, examined, noted, or minuted on, and finally recorded, in each or any of the great departments of an Indian Secretariat. The system, which sprang from the counting-house and has gradually been adapted to the requirements of a vast Empire, is, with some slight modifications, essentially the same and is worked with success and regularity, in the furnace blasts of Upper India, in the steamy atmosphere of British Burmah, or where the fresh sea breeze blows along the esplanade of Bombay.

At the head of every Secretariat is an official termed a Registrar or Chief Clerk. This official is invariably taken from the Uncovenanted Civil Service, is often of European extraction, has spent the greater portion, if not the whole, of his life in the country, and receives from 700*l.* to 900*l.* a year. The chief duties of this person are to distribute the work amongst the clerks of the office, to take care that current business never falls into arrear owing to temporary and unavoidable absences, to open every letter that comes to hand either by post or by messengers, to see that the work of transcribing, printing, and recording in the office, as well as of despatching missives from it, does not fall into confusion, and, generally speaking, to keep the whole framework and machinery in complete working order. The registrar at 9.30 or 10 o'clock commences the operations of the day by opening every letter, and noting in a book the date of despatch and that of receipt, the official title of the sender, and the subject of the correspondence. When he has ascertained, which he generally does at a glance, to what subdivision of the Secretariat the communication belongs, he delivers it to a clerk, whose peculiar business it is to "docket" the same. Every letter, if possible, is folded after the same pattern; and on the back, in addition to particulars of date, name of transmitting officer, and so forth, is inscribed a brief and accurate précis of the contents. The letter, so prepared, is then given to a clerk, who looks up all previous correspondence bearing on the question; and in a well-regulated and well-officed department it is marvellous in how brief a space dusty records and ancient red-leather volumes are scanned and made to yield up their hidden treasures. When this operation is concluded, the pile of correspondence, arranged chronologically, is laid before the Under-Secretary. This gentleman is a Covenanted civilian, chosen usually from among the most promising members of his service, and he has probably resided in India from four to eight or ten years. If the matter be one of routine, or fixed precedent, or one where the office is used as a mere channel of communication with other departments, it is disposed of by the Under-Secretary himself, or after a reference to the Secretary, who, like his deputy, is a Civil servant, but of much older standing. If the subject be new or controversial, as many are in a huge Empire and a hot and irritating climate, the Under-Secretary masters the case, and transmits it with a formal note, or with such brief suggestions of the points for decision as his intelligence or previous experience in the executive lines may warrant him in giving. If the case is one of those interminable disputes on education, land revenue, changes in the police, or in the mode of taxation, which are variously the terror or the delight of Indian administrators, the bundle is carried home, analysed in the early hours of the day, and melted down into an exhaustive précis or a masterly "note." The papers then come before the mature and experienced Secretary, who may send them on with a brief comment, or with an addition of his own, or may perhaps be fired with some bright idea, and so give an unexpected turn or a new life to the whole controversy. From the Secretary to the Governor or Lieutenant-Governor the transmission is short and easy. When the papers have been systematically arranged and analysed, when the précis or note is clear, when the suggestions are incisive and full of good sense, the labour of the Indian statesman is considerably shortened. Boxes are emptied and piles of correspondence disappear, or are knocked over like the knights in the lists at Ashby before the spear of Ivanhoe. An experienced hand will know when he may safely rely on his subordinates, what subjects he may dispose of on the note or the précis by a few curt remarks in pencil, and what bundles he must keep by him until he has mastered every line of the huge written debate, and can shape the plan of action in some minute which shall provoke an animated discussion in the Council Chamber at Simla, or even awaken a host of genial reminiscences in the minds of retired administrators at Westminster.

Let it not be imagined that such a careful system of record, preparation, and inspection by two or three different officials, is incompatible with the prompt despatch of business, or with the issue offhand of instructions to executive officers on an emergency or a crisis. Whenever anything unpleasant occurs in any province or district of the Empire, the telegraph is put in motion, and the Governor is advised through the wires of the event that has happened, and of the inevitable Report which is to follow. As soon as a despatch finds its way into the hands of the Registrar—say, on a sudden monsoon, an inundation, the destruction of a great mart by fire, or a dormant feud which has again broken out and has resulted in a whole batch of killed and wounded—it is taken out of the regular routine, and forwarded with a red label to the Secretary, who flies with it to the Governor, whom he probably finds to be fully informed of the calamity by a long demi-official letter penned for His Honour by the Magistrate or Commissioner. The celerity of despatch on which one of the Megara witnesses prided himself is obviously indispensable in India, where troops have to be moved to protect a frontier from a raid, or measures taken to shelter a starving, drowning, or burnt-out population. But we will give a few samples of the work of an Indian Secretariat. Simplin, the active Magistrate of Shikarpore, writes through the Commissioner to say that he has been at work continuously for the last thirty-three months; that his district is in excellent order; and that he hopes for the two months' leave of absence which the "exigencies of the service" prevented him from obtaining a year ago. The real reason for the leave is dropped out in a demi-official enclosed in the formal letter and directed to Elmhurst, the Under-Secretary, a college friend, who is told that there is to be a grand gathering of sportsmen at the celebrated hunting grounds of the Roshmapatra, or in the jungles of Rohilound, where the absence of Elphinstone would be much regretted. It is needless to say that the latter is passed on with extraordinary promptitude, and the leave probably granted. Robinson, who is of an archaeological turn of mind, sends up a copper plate which has just been dug up in some old fort, and which he conceives may throw some light either on the great controversy between Buddhists and Brahmins, or on the limits of the ancient and well-known kingdom of Mithila. The Under-Secretary, being lukewarm on these matters, suggests that Robinson be thanked, and that the copper plate be made over to the Asiatic Society. A Commissioner pens a hurried line to say that he is off as hard as a palanquin and relays of bearers can carry him, to investigate on the spot a tremendous row between the members of the great rival creeds in the East, and that all he can say at present is that three men are reported dead and ten wounded, and that he is credibly informed that the occurrence is due either to the act of a low caste Hindoo who slaughtered a pig in front of a mosque, or to that of a fanatic Mohammedan who flung the shibboleth of an ox at the head of a venerable and orthodox Brahmin just as he was stepping out of the temple of the goddess Kali. The Commissioner is informed in reply that His Honour will await his promised Report with anxiety, and that the officer commanding the nearest military station has been warned to hold a detachment of the Ballygunge Irregulars in readiness to march at half an hour's notice. A collector writes in despair at the falling off in the receipts of the wheel-tax. A magistrate asks whether he should reward, or should commit to the Sessions, one of the village watch, who, going his rounds at night, espied the head of a burglar issuing from a hole in the wall of a shopkeeper's house, and, without further question, smote him so that his life was despaired of by the Civil Surgeon. From one district comes an account of a hailstorm which has destroyed whole acres of the poppy-plant, and has seriously impaired the prospects of the next opium season; from a second, intimation that a bridge, or a barrack, lately built by the Department of Public Works, has cracked from top to bottom; and from a third, an announcement that a rich native banker, whose eldest son has miraculously recovered from an attack of cholera, is willing to expend the sum of 1,000*l.* on the construction of a new road, or the deepening or clearing out of an enormous old reservoir. One functionary presses on the attention of the Government the propriety of looking after the head of a new sect, who is preaching general repentance and humiliation, but who is believed to hold heterodox doctrines concerning the payment of taxes and the proprietorship of land. Another has rashly revived a discussion which regards the peculiar position of a Rajah whose ancestor was exempted from the operation of the General Laws and Regulations by the policy of Lord Wellesley, and who is described as an anomaly and an anachronism that ought to be summarily put down. All these cases, and scores of others for which we have no space, according to their several degrees of urgency and importance, are submitted to the various functionaries already described by us; not one letter in one thousand is lost, stolen, or strayed; no one signs letters without seeing the order or the draft of what he is signing; and no one records orders without having it in his power to see whether they are duly carried out. When orders have been passed, the papers are dealt with on the same principle. The Under-Secretary drafts and issues all ordinary correspondence. Anything at all out of the common run is written, or revised, or seen by the Secretary; and in highly important letters the actual language receives the imprimatur of the Governor.

We now come to the division of labour amongst the members of the Council of the Viceroy. In former times, when the Government was rather more autocratic and proconsular, the Governor-General took the lead in all business, and was the first to see every letter or bundle. As the Empire grew in extent and business multiplied, the following system was devised by the late Lord Canning, and by Sir J. P. Grant, the present Governor of Jamaica, and, with some alterations and improvements, it is now still in force. The Viceroy takes to himself the whole of the Foreign Department, embracing our policy in Central Asia, in the Persian Gulf, and even the Chinese waters, and our relations with the whole tribe of independent, semi-independent, and feudatory States adjoining or lying within the Indian Peninsula. Lord Mayo has also at one time undertaken the conduct of the department of Public Works. The Military Department, which is a thing wholly distinct from the discipline and management of the army, was in the hands of the late Sir H. Durand, and is now worked by General Norman. Sir Richard Temple is the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Mr. Fitzjames Stephen is a fitting successor to Sir H. Maine as legal member; and the other departments, of which the Home is the most overworked, are entrusted to two very able civilians, one of whom represents Bengal and the other Bombay. The Commander-in-Chief has no portfolio in the Government of India, though he assists at all its deliberations, executive and legislative. Lord Napier has, however, for the management of the forces, his Adjutant-General, his Quartermaster-General, and his Judge-Advocate. But these officers have no direct connexion with the Government of India. A great deal of the vast business of that Government is disposed of by the members of Council or by the Viceroy, working, as it were, in isolation and independence. But no case remarkable by its importance or its novelty, nothing that involves any material departure from routine or precedent, no reform in education, finance, jurisprudence, or general policy of any kind, ever fails to come under the direct cognisance of the Viceroy. While ordinary business is transacted by the members of the department, with its Secretary and Under-Secretary, everything of political moment and of real value ends by being debated by the whole council. This system has been so admirably organised and is so thoroughly understood that, while the Viceroy is relieved of an enormous mass of detail, routine, and uninteresting business, he is never left in the dark while solid reforms are under preparation, and he is invariably referred to first by each individual member whenever it is proposed to amend the laws, to alter the form of taxation, to add to the police force, to increase the pay or the number of the native Judges, to reform gaol discipline, or to consider, not only those questions which we should designate as Cabinet questions in this country, but those which involve in any way the permanent interests of the humblest Englishman or the lowest caste of Hindoos. The system, to our thinking, secures a reasonable distribution of work and a right division of labour, together with the proper concentration of authority and responsibility in the head of the Indian Cabinet. Lord Lawrence was, and Lord Mayo is, as fully responsible for a bad or good law, for an unpopular or an equitable tax, as he is for an impolitic move in the direction of the Llama of Thibet, or the Jam of Lus Boyla, or the Khan of Kelat. Whether such a system, tried, proved, and never found deficient, could or could not be adapted to the business of the Admiralty, we cannot now stop to inquire. But it is quite certain that, whatever may be the errors or the shortcomings of the Indian Government in actual administration, work is there got through, as far as each bureau is concerned, with a regularity, a despatch, and a completeness which illustrate the excellences of that much-abused article of stationery which has supplied us with a title to this paper.

THE SPEAKERSHIP.

THERE could hardly be a better example of the way in which English institutions are gradually built up and adapted to the circumstances of each period than the office in which Mr. Brand is about to succeed Mr. Denison. The Speaker of the House of Commons is a remarkable illustration of the continuity of politics. The constitution of the office is to be sought in a bundle of historical precedents. Its origin may be traced to the principle of natural selection. A crowd of men summoned from different parts of the country to bargain with the King as to the amount of money to be paid to him was helpless without a mouthpiece, and the hubbub of voices was hushed in order that one might speak with authority for all. The Speaker was, as it were, the foreman of the jury, and, with such hints probably as a preliminary meeting might furnish, he had to plead and higgles for his fellows as best he could. A glib tongue, with some adroitness and smoothness of manner covering a good deal of moral courage and stiffness of purpose, was the primary qualification for the post. Softness of speech was pretty much in proportion to the moderation of the King's demands; if he held out for large sums, he had to take hard words with the grant, and very plain language was sometimes used with regard to the favourites of the hour, who tainted the honour and wasted the revenues of the Crown. It was natural that the Commons should endeavour to conciliate the Sovereign by choosing as their spokesman some one who was personally agreeable to him; and, on the other hand, the Sovereign was not long in perceiving the advantage to be derived from having in his own hands the choice of the agent with whom he had to negotiate for supplies. Hence the usage of presenting the Speaker for the Sovereign's approval, although to this hour it has never been formally determined whether this sanction is really necessary. A conflict on this point has been carefully avoided, the Commons no doubt thinking that it did not much matter how the Speaker was appointed as long as they had the absolute and exclusive right to dictate what he should say. On the only occasion on which the Crown positively refused to accept the nominee of the Commons, another was, after some demur, elected and approved. On the other hand, when Charles I. was a prisoner in the keeping of Parliament and the army, when the Convention Parliaments of the Restoration and Revolution were summoned, and again when George III. was in seclusion, Speakers were elected without communication with the Crown. A presentation to the House of Lords was in these instances deemed sufficient. The Speaker of the House of Commons is still the parleur of that body, but his most important functions are of another kind. As the power of the House increased, the question became, not how much money the Sovereign would be content to accept, but how much the House chose to grant; it recorded its resolutions on the subject, and practically there was then an end of the matter. The original duty of the Speaker has thus passed away. Since the Revolution his chief business has been to regulate the proceedings, to put questions, and to maintain order in the assembly over which he presides. There is a tradition that a garrulous Speaker once treated Queen Elizabeth to a speech of two hours, while another inflicted an address twice as long on her successor. A member of the present House of Commons has remarked that it is much easier to talk than to listen; but the Speaker is practically incapacitated from taking part in the debates, and has no longer an opportunity of indemnifying himself for his reticence in the House by his loquacity before the Throne. It is rarely that he has to address the Sovereign, and the occasions on which he has to survey the thanks of the country to a distinguished public servant, or to rebuke an offender at the bar, are scarcely more frequent. A great capacity for silence is an indispensable qualification for the Speakership. Mr. Gladstone's worst enemies would not be cruel enough to condemn him to the Chair.

The importance which is attached to the prestige of the office as held individually by one man, and sustained by the confidence of the House, is attested by the reluctance which has always been shown to permit the duties to be discharged by deputy, except in the case of urgent and extreme necessity. The House has frequently adjourned, or taken care not to make a quorum to commence a sitting, in order to release the Speaker, without providing a substitute. A few years ago it was arranged that the Chairman of Committees should, as a matter of course, preside in the Speaker's absence; but a proposal that the latter should enjoy some relief from constant attendance was decisively rejected. It is necessary that the office should be individualised, in order that it may carry with it the full measure of respect. Uniformity of decision would be endangered if it were put into commission. The errors or indiscretions of one of the Commissioners would reflect discredit on the body; and the appearance of different men in the Chair would weaken the sentiment of personal deference with which its occupant ought to be regarded. The absolutism of the President necessarily makes large demands on the confidence and respect of the assembly. It may be remarked that submission to the Speaker has become more complete in proportion as it has been made clear that his authority is derived from, and is exercised in obedience to, the House itself. The doubts which prevailed in former days as to whether the Speaker was the House's man or the King's man gave rise to ill-disguised suspicions and unseemly altercations. During the stormy debates on privilege in James I.'s time, we find one member declaring that he "will spare none, though they sit in chairs," while another "admonisheth Mr. Speaker that sometimes he neglecteth his duty to the House in intruding or deferring the question"; and a third finds it necessary to remind the Speaker that "he is but the servant of the House, not a master, nor a master's mate." Edward Seymour, though a strict disciplinarian, used to be chaffed for his beardless chin and his losses at play, as well as more gravely rebuked for the haunts which he frequented to the scandal of good citizens. Once, it is recorded, a member put out his tongue at a Speaker, while on another occasion a member, gliding behind the Chair, shouted "Baugh!" to the "great terror and alflight" of the occupant. Happily Mr. Brand need be under no apprehension of tricks of this kind. Everything is now done to show honour to the Speaker. The members rise when he enters or leaves the House, they bow when they pass before the Chair, and they are also careful to raise their hats if they meet their President out of doors. His decision on a question is rarely challenged, and never without the utmost deference and respect, while his invitations to dinner rank as commands next to those of the Sovereign. At the close of each sitting the cry, "Who goes home?" is supposed to summon, as of old, an escort of members to attend the Speaker to his residence; only, as he lives in a wing of the same palace which contains the House itself, the escort is conveniently dispensed with. On a memorable occasion a Speaker told the King that he had neither tongue, eyes, nor ears but what the House gave him; and this is illustrated by his obligatory blindness to the emptiness of the House when his attention is not expressly called to it. He is not allowed to take notice that less than forty members are present unless a member refers to it. Even if he were left alone, he could not move the adjournment of the House; and it is said that once it happened that he was actually deserted without a formal motion for adjournment, and had to sit till some one could be found to move his release. Nor can he inflict punishment without the order of the House, although it would appear that in certain cases he is entitled to "name" an offending member, and the result of naming him would be his ejection by the Serjeant-at-arms if he refused to withdraw of his own accord. Speakers have been known occasionally to exercise somewhat arrogant authority over the House, and the right of clôture has even been assumed to exist. "You have a right to speak," said Spencer Compton on one occasion, "but the House has a right to judge whether it will hear you." This right, however, has never been enforced by a vote, marks of impatience and disorder being deemed sufficient to express the disinclination of the assembly to listen to an intrusive or prolix orator.

A Speaker, disparaging his own appearance and qualities, once drew an ideal picture of the kind of man who ought to fill the post—"a man big and comely, stately and well spoken, his voice great, his carriage majestic, his nature haughty, and his purse plentiful and heavy." This last qualification has ceased to be indispensable, a sufficient income and pension being now attached to the office; but it was certainly desirable, in days when the Speaker's revenue was mainly derived from fees, that the possession of private means should place him above the temptation of accepting bribes. Two Speakers have been expelled for this offence. The other qualifications are still desirable, and though Mr. Brand cannot be called big, or his carriage majestic, there is no reason to suppose that the dignity of the office will suffer during his incumbency. It may perhaps be thought that it is very easy to sit in a padded chair, crying "Order, order!" now and then, and only rising to put a question or to announce the result of a division. But, in the first place, even this is, when continuous, anything but a light labour, and, in the next place, it is only a part of the Speaker's duties. It is said that Arthur O'Slow once sat in the Chair for seventy-two hours, and Mr. Denison must often have sat for ten or twelve hours with only the little break of a quarter of an hour at nine o'clock. It is calculated that Lord Eversley sat for something like 18,000 hours during his term of office. At any time the physical fatigue of even eight or nine hours in the Chair must be considerable, but allowance must also be made for the mental weariness and depression of listening to rapid talk and the dreary repetition of exhausted arguments. Members come and go, and even a Minister can snatch an hour or two for dinner or perhaps a visit to the Opera; the Serjeant-at-arms has his deputy who divides the night with him, and sometimes relieves him altogether; the reporters flit in and out in frequent turns. But the Speaker must sit through it all, with just such relief as may be got from a slight change of posture in his chair, leaning back or sitting upright, crossing one leg or another. He is tied to his seat as tightly by the obligations of his office as Finch was by the resolute arms which held him down while Elliot read out his famous Resolution. It is perhaps difficult for any one who has not tried it to realize the utter weariness of such an experience. It is not every one who is gifted with such energetic wakefulness as to be able to resist the soporific influence of the Parliamentary MacFlecnos. Speaker Cornwall, who had a sonorous voice, imposing figure, and all the physical qualities for the place save one, was not proof against the drowsy atmosphere of the assembly; and a contemporary bard has recorded his agonizing efforts to keep himself awake:—

In vain he looks for pity to the clock;
In vain the power of strengthening porter tries,
And nods to Bellamy for fresh supplies.

"I am tired," Speaker Norton used to exclaim in a dull debate, "I am weary, I am heartily sick of this"; but we are afraid that a Speaker of our day would hardly venture to exhibit such candid impatience. If a member wanders from the subject before the House, he has a right to check him; but there is no measure of the proper length of speeches, and even the House itself cannot authorise the Speaker to check an unduly prolix orator whose love of talking gets the better of his modesty and good sense. The mere putting of questions is simple enough, but points of order occasionally arise which it is less easy to decide off-hand, especially as the spirit as well as the letter of a rule has to be taken into account. The duty of determining which member out of a number who rise simultaneously has caught the Speaker's eye has been simplified by the practice, when there is a great debate, of arranging the order of speakers beforehand through the medium of the Whips; but occasions still occur when it is a delicate and embarrassing question to say who shall be declared to be in possession of the House. Not the least important part of the Speaker's work is that which he discharges out of the Chair when the House is not sitting. He is usually in his study by noon, and many awkward questions in regard to points of order or the arrangement of business are settled there quietly, without being brought before the House at all. A private hint from the Speaker, or a few minutes' conversation with him, will often remove a difficulty which might prove troublesome if a public decision were demanded from the Chair. When Lord Eversley was Speaker, he got over an important constitutional difficulty by suggesting that clauses or amendments passed by the House of Lords which infringed the taxing privileges of the House of Commons should be printed in italics, or, as is now the custom, in red ink; thus the Lords can indicate their meaning without offending the jealousy of the Lower House. Some of Mr. Denison's hints have been equally valuable. The smooth working of our Parliamentary system, which those who look at it from the outside are disposed to attribute to the perfection of the machinery, is not a little due to the judicious oiling of the wheels, and the careful supervision which keeps little gritty obstructions out of them.

HATBANDS AND SCARFS.

WHEN Lord Bantam succeeds by his father's death to the hereditary title of Earl Ffowlesmere, his first act of independence is to overhaul the bill of Messrs. Rooking, the undertakers, one item alone in which—"two hundred and ten silk hatbands at 30s. each"—led him to the conclusion that "the honour of a funeral in Westminster Abbey was altogether too dear." With a strength of mind that showed a commendable superiority to custom and public opinion, the new Earl set his butler to count the number of hatbands at his father's funeral, and succeeded triumphantly in reducing Messrs. Rooking's bill. But though the shoe pinches even worse with small folk than with great, it would seem that, as a rule, the cost of the last disguise goes quite untaxed, a sense of delicacy towards the memory of the dead recoiling from all question of "nicely calculated loss or more," where the chief object is to be unsparing of the customary tribute of respect and regret. There is, no doubt, much to be said for this pious acquiescence. Weeping eyes are ill able to scrutinize the quality of silks and the freshness of crepes; and in any case there is an unfitness in the exercise of sharp-eyed economies in the house, and at the time, of mourning. Yet there is no reason why custom should not discourage itself of certain outrageous superfluities, and try back to a simplicity which might be quite as respectful to the dead, as well as less burdensome to the living—not to speak of the moral advantage of removing sore temptation from the path of the fashionable widow.

cometices, novels, and general experience concur in representing as the sole gainer by the exaggeration of outward manifestations of respect for the dead, whereby in very truth corruptio optinet, et pascitur.

The time is seasonable for raising this question, inasmuch as it has been announced that the clergy of one of the London districts have resolved henceforward to decline accepting the scarfs, gloves, and handbands which have heretofore formed no inconsiderable addition to the burial fee, and which in some cases have brought the sacred profession into discredit by tempting the poor incumbent into an unseemly sort of "sale and barter"—namely, a negotiation for the return of these useless trappings in reduction of his mercer's bill. There can be little doubt that in this social reform many of the laity would gladly follow the example of their spiritual pastors, for these insignia of mourning are as awkward and ugly as they are useless; and nothing but lack of moral courage to lead the way impedes the reduction of the amount of ceremonial and paraphernalia on such occasions to a minimum consistent with due solemnity and common sense. Now and then, indeed, a noble testator leaves instructions in his will that he be buried plainly and quietly, and by a decisive stroke of the pen displays at once consideration for his friends and wariness as regards undertakers. One fine old squire we have heard of who, having no mind for feathers, velvet, mutes, and pages to make his obsequies senselessly formal and ridiculous, left it in charge to his executors to have his body placed in a plain oak coffin, and conveyed by his own carriage horses in his own "break" to the place of burial, without mourning-coach or hearse—no pall, no handbands, no scarfs, and only such following as the necessities of the occasion and the unbidden respect of friends and neighbours might ensure. A more sensible cortège never traversed "the way to dusty death." Unfortunately, however, there is always a large number of persons who, measuring sorrow by the number of folds of crape, exercise their severity of criticism upon those who forsake the customary groove, and who respectfully carry out such considerate and sensible provisions. Hence timid heirs come to disregard this sort of testamentary veto upon costly obsequies, or else compromise the matter for fear of incurring the opprobrium of stinginess. They have no affection for a mummy which has neither taste nor picturesqueness to recommend its continuance; and if it were a personal concern, they would be foremost in deprecating such waste; but the fear of evil tongues becomes paramount at a time when the question is pressing, and the mind is unready and unhunged. Thus it is that a custom which is generally voted hollow and superfluous holds its own, to the enrichment of a class of tradesmen who, we suppose, compound with their dislike of ridicule, and taking the bitter with the sweet, endure the shafts of satirists and humorists so long as they can do a good thing in "best gentlemen's black kids at 4s. 6d.," and "ten guineas for the use of velvet pall, satin-lined." As we descend to the lower strata of society, it is curious to observe the strange influences which conduce to the retention of the custom of going to the utmost verge of cost and display for the "last tribute of respect." It might be expected that in this rank of life pride, imitation, and the spirit of rivalry would co-operate with the influence of custom in prompting a family to bury its dead with no less outward ceremonial than its fathers used, even though divisions and subdivisions have reduced the patrimony, and rendered needless cost especially undesirable. But still meaner motives occasionally come into play. There is a story of a disconsolate widower of this class who, within a shamefully brief space after his wife's death, applied to the clergyman of his parish to publish his banns for a second marriage. The rector expostulated. It was like Hamlet's mother—"a little month, or ere the shoes were old"; and here he was proposing to take to himself another mate. But the widower was justified by his own code of "the proper and becoming" in such matters, and it came out that a funeral about which no expense was spared was, in his view, an absolution from all further concern, regret, or mournful remembrance. "I buried her handsome, sir," he said; "I buried her handsome! Handbands and scarves, the lecturer and the curates and all; handbands and scarves! I buried her handsome!"

But this "burying handsome" is apt to supersede the pressure of heavy expense to the bitterness of death and bereavement. It is true that with millionaires and great territorial magnates the most sumptuous funeral expenses can form but an inappreciable item in the vast list of contingencies involved in the maintenance of many houses and many retainers. If the reform begins with the testamentary injunctions of such persons, it must at least be admitted that their action is entitled to the praise of unselfishness. The real champions of the statu quo, the unwilling supporters of the undertakers, quites, and mourning-coaches, are the gentlefolk of moderate incomes, who reverence the authority of custom to an idolatrous extent, and are prepared to pinch themselves and encumber their estates rather than depart in any way from the measure of the expenditure and social pretension of their fathers. A lively insight into this condition of things is shown in a novel which was reviewed in these pages some three or four years ago—A Scarcy Leap. Towards the end of the third volume the hero's father, an embarrassed old squire, has died, and "the rites of the feudal Libitina" are in course of celebration. Here is a sample of the talk over the funeral talked next day:—"Why, what a lot of tomfoolery this is," protested the doctor, sagaciously; "the old bankrupt ought to be sent to the pound before he is buried; and besides, he should have been buried at the parish expense, if he had not been so

Now there has been gussling and drunkenness enough during the last five hours to devour half the future income of the whole family." "It's all part of the same system; this sort of squandering, my good sir, are getting used up very fast," remarked Mr. Old-square, the family lawyer. And in coarser language one of the tenants, a page or two further on, comments upon the inherent absurdity of such a state of things:—"The best mourners here is them he owes money to, and I spect there's many an' on 'em, and their sorrow's real enough, for they must feel now they've little chance of being paid." It should be added that the heir and the solicitor had done their utmost to avoid lavishing on undertakers the small remnant which was barely enough to meet other exigencies, and had only waived their objection to "the very showy piece of upholstery drawn by four very creditably plumed black horses" in deference to a unanimous and strong expression of the feeling of the family. No doubt the novelist's satire refers rather to the burial feast than to the funeral weeds; and to what a pitch of ill-timed extravagance such feasting has been immemorially carried may be gleaned from a paper in Notes and Queries (January 27, 1872), "On the Usages and Expenses at a Dumfriesshire Funeral a Hundred Years Ago," from accounts in Irish tales of the customary "waking" of Irish gentlemen, and from the experience of those who know what an affair a funeral still is in Wales. But the advance of civilization must of itself tend to cure "guzzling and drunkenness" at such times. It is a more difficult matter, because it touches a sentimental chord, to reform the conventional custom with regard to that outward guise of woe which a writer in the Times justly calls one of "the most cruel and offensive of our social tyrannies." Even the keenest reformer would not dream of abolishing that customary wearing of black apparel which is adopted, we believe, by all sects of religionists except Quakers as the garb of mourning. The retrenchment need not be extended beyond the purely gratuitous paraphernalia, the showy, floating accessories of the so-called funeral pomp. Stories have been rife of good-for-nothing husbands who, when their wives died before them, bade the hearse-drivers go gently over the stones, lest they should wake again the tongue that had so late taken rest. Yet if a wife had been careful and thrifty in her lifetime, one would say that, if aught could rouse her from her last sleep, it would be the lavish waste of silk and crape and velvet which characterizes a funeral procession for no other end than to outrage real taste, and to offer a field for exorbitant extortion to the trade which lives by death. Some people, indeed, like the sort of thing, but would like also to cheapen it; and it is in their interest, and with a view to their patronage, that numberless advertisements invite mourners and executors to patronize the "Necropolis Company," "the Reformed Funerals Company" (Limited), "Shillibeer's Economic," and the like. All these profess a moderate tariff. They hold out the bait of "elegant equipages, chaste appointments, respectfully attired and well conducted men, careful supervision, and very reasonable charges." But this is only like making two bites of a cherry. The principle is retained, only it is to be carried out on a "cheap and nasty" scale, and most people will think that, if reform is to go no further than this, it were as well "to eat the devil as the broth he's boiled in." What is really required is that a sufficient number of persons worthy in their respective spheres of life, and weighty too through their known character and general maintenance of the decencies and proprieties of life in those spheres, should set themselves to effect a steady, if gradual, change of fashion as respects the needless accessories of mourning and the prescriptive extortions of undertakers. The sooner "the trash of state" is dissociated from death and burial, the more easy will be the contemplation of that other side of the grave where all are equal. Very few persons, it may be believed, when looking that change in the face, can say with Ennius, Nemo me laqueum decet; more commonly and naturally,

On some fond breast the parting soul relies,
Some pious drops the closing eye requires;

and there is a yearning for the genuine tribute expressed in the words—

His saltem accumulæ donis, et fangar inani Munera.

Yet we question whether any human being, taking into account the uselessness of it to himself, and the tax inflicted upon his successors, ever found the near approach to the dark passage cheered, solaced, or enlivened by the vain prospect of being "buried handsome."

THE OLD CATHOLIC MOVEMENT IN FRANCE.

IT was well known at the time that the Court of Rome, with its wonted astuteness, had seized on the opportunity of Mgr. Darboy's timely removal and the embarrassments of M. Thiers's Government to insist on the nomination of a staunch Ultramontane—the first time for many years past—to the see of Paris. Dupanloup had been originally designated by the Government for the post, but it was privately intimated by the Papal Nuncio to M. Thiers that no minority bishop would be accepted by Rome, and the French President was weak enough to yield to the pressure put upon him. And accordingly the throne of Quelen, Affre, and Darboy has been filled by one of the feeblest and most narrow-minded of the septuagenarian adherents of the dominant faction. His first step, naturally enough, has been to suppress through-but his diocese the Paris liturgy, with its noble hymns and comparatively unadulterated lectionary, in the interests of that dead uniformity which it has long been the unwisdom of Rome to mistake for unity. His next step, as was all along expected, and was of course intended—probably required—by those who secured his appointment, has been to demand of his clergy, many of whom were known to be decided anti-infallibilists, an ex animo submission to the new Vatican dogmas. We have had occasion already to notice the pusillanimous recantation of Father Gratry, who, from his previous writings on the subject, was the most prominent among them in vindicating the old faith. On the other hand, Father Hyacinthe had shown his unmistakable resolve to bear everything rather than profess to believe what he does not believe; and in the first number of the journal he has just started, the Esperance de Rome, he clearly defines his position as at once a loyal Catholic and a determined opponent of infallibilism:—

If [he observes] we venture, with all due deference to the Church, to demand reforms, let it be fully understood that we do not therefore renounce our title as Catholics. . . . We only ask for the reform of the Church within the Church, and if we frankly condemn the abuses committed by those who claim to be her sole representatives, we console ourselves with the recollection of her beneficence and her greatness.

Father Hyacinthe was the only spokesman of the French Opposition at the Munich Congress last September, but he was not its sole representative. Three other names are given in the official report, and one priest, whose name it somehow omitted, was also present, who bids fair to become the leader of the movement now organizing in France in connexion with the Allkatholiken of Germany and other countries of Europe.

Dr. Michaud, though he is a comparatively young man, has long been known as one of the ablest, if not the ablest, of the French priesthood. He was the friend of Lacordaire, Montalembert, and Archbishop Darboy, and has learnt from all of them, without becoming the disciple of any. His wide information, keen intellect, and great force of character alike indispose him jurare in verba magistri, and it is evident from his public utterances that he is now taking a bolder line than has been yet ventured upon by even the most fervid of his compatriots and comrades in the fray. He openly denounces Rome as heretical, and it is certainly difficult to see what other judgment could be consistently formed from his point of view. The tenet of Papal infallibility is so momentous a dogma that it can hardly escape the alternative of being either regarded as a sacred truth or an outrageous falsehood, and it is obvious to which category alone the Old Catholics could refer it. M. Michaud visited England last autumn, and was in communication with many distinguished divines, both of his own Church and of the Anglican. But he bided his time, feeling probably that his course would be clearer and his position stronger if he did not himself take the aggressive. Of course he had not long to wait. When the new Archbishop found himself firmly seated, he lost no time in requiring of his clergy an explicit acceptance of the new dogmas, and directing them to require it of their flocks as a condition of receiving the Sacraments. Dr. Michaud, who was one of the vicars—or, as we should say, curates—of the Madeleine, one of the principal parish churches in Paris, could not remain passive under such an injunction. He accordingly addressed a personal inquiry to the Archdeacon as to whether the Archbishop would allow confessors in his diocese to give absolution to those who rejected the Vatican Synod and its decrees; and whether the clergy themselves were at liberty, while continuing to say mass, to disbelieve those dogmas if they did not openly attack them? To both questions a decided negative was returned, although Archbishop Darboy a few days before his arrest had answered them, in a personal interview with M. Michaud, in a precisely opposite sense; and it seems that even the present Archbishop was himself at one period of his life opposed to Ultramontaniam. This we gather from the letter addressed to him by M. Michaud on the 5th instant, and which is published at length in the Journal des Débats of the 7th, opening with the remark that, from 1845 to 1853 his Grace, as Bishop of Viviers, had "energetically attacked Ultramontaniam, and Veuillot, its leader." The letter soon afterwards proceeds:—

You, Monseigneur, at one time, when you were Bishop of Viviers declared that the Ultramontane party was anti-Catholic; but now you treat as heretics and schismatics the Catholics who persevere in rejecting Ultramontaniam. You formerly defined Catholic truth to be that universal truth which, in the words of Vincent de Lerins, had "always been believed everywhere and by everybody"—quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus creditum est; but now this Catholic truth has degenerated in your mind to Roman truth. Formerly the Catholic Church was the agglomeration of all particular Churches, but now in your eyes and those of your adepts the Church is nothing else but Rome and the Pope. The universality of the Church of Jesus Christ is degraded to the individualism of one man. You, in fact, ignore Jesus Christ, and care only for His vicar, whom you make His master; for with you the Gospel is subordinate to the interpretation which the Pope may choose to put upon it. . . . The Gospel is no longer that of Jesus Christ, but the Bull which it may be the good pleasure of any present or future Borgia to issue.

This, the writer adds, is "un changement complet de drapeau," and just as a French soldier would disgrace himself by deserting his national flag, so, too, it is a dishonour to a soldier of Christ to abandon the banner of Catholicism. In such a crime he will not be an accomplice, and he therefore sacrifices his office at the Madeleine and his honorary Canonry at Châlons, though well aware that this determination will cost him both in ecclesiastical and temporal penalties. An unjust excommunication will separate him, not from the Catholic Church, but only from Ultramontaniam.

His future he leaves in the hands of God, not knowing where he may find even provision for his daily wants; his present duty is to remain loyal to conscience and to Catholic truth. Nor is he moved by being told that he is undermining the authority of the Church; for he holds that those are really undermining it who would merge its divine and primitive sanction in the absolutism of a single human will. And if he is told that the discharge of a solemn duty will give scandal, he replies that it is not sincere and intelligent men, but only cowards and fanatics, who will be scandalized. The real scandal is occasioned by "those sceptical priests and bishops who publicly accept the new dogma, while laughing in their sleeves." Nor does he arrogate to himself that infallibility which he denies to an ignorant and peccable man, though he be Pope. He does not stand alone in his protest. Without dwelling on the Armenian bishops, the priests and faithful of Hungary, Bohemia, Austria, Silesia, Bavaria, Wurtemberg, and other parts of Germany, who prefer excommunication to dishonesty, there are numbers in France, England, Italy, and Spain who reject the authority of the Vatican Synod, which a French bishop designated Ludibrium Vaticanum, as the modern correlative of the Latrocinium of Ephesus. Dr. Michaud adds that he knows enough of the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church to be aware that there are numbers of them who "completely repudiate in foro interno this Conciliabulum." In conclusion he desires to insist on two points:—

First—I am, and will remain, a Catholic, not following the heterodox decisions of Ultramontaniam, but adhering to the orthodox principle of ancient Catholicism, which is the sole true rule, admirably formulated by St. Vincent of Lerins, quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus. Secondly—I am, and will remain, a priest. Obligated for the moment to recognize in you [the Archbishop] the power, not of right but of force, I cannot indeed, thanks to the ignorance of the faithful, exercise my sacerdotal ministry in the churches under your jurisdiction. But the locality does not affect the validity of the sacraments.

Dr. Michaud adds that, wherever his services are desired, he shall continue to administer the sacraments of baptism, penance, marriage, the eucharist, and extreme unction, and to bury the dead, and shall say mass in his own house, and recite his breviary, acting as the early Christians did in the ages of persecution. And, when opportunity occurs, he will preach, and meantime will write, as will his friends also, to advance the cause of the true Church. A Committee will at once be formed to meet at his house, 74 Boulevard de Neuilly, in connexion with similar Committees in Russia, Germany, England, Italy, and Spain; and, as soon as the means are provided, a church will be opened, and the question thus publicly tried, under whatever practical difficulties, "who will eventually prevail, those who fight for Christ ruling the Pope by His Gospel, or those who fight for the Pope supplanting Christ by his Syllabus."

Contemporaneous with this outspoken manifesto of a distinguished Parisian ecclesiastic, we have in the Allgemeine Zeitung the report of the first of a series of lectures in course of delivery by Dr. Döllinger in the Great Hall of the Museum at Munich, on the "Schemes for Reuniting the Christian Churches, and the Prospects of Future Union," giving a masterly sketch of the present divisions of the Christian world, to be followed in the next lecture by a notice of its relations to the outlying religious communities of heathendom. In Italy Dr. Cassani is engaged in disproving at length the canonical authority of the Vatican Council, in a series of essays in the Rinnovamento Cattolico of Florence; so that it is by no means without influential protest from the most various quarters that, to quote the words of a recent Catholic author, Mr. Lowry Whittle, "the whole constitution of the Latin Church has been swept away," so far as the Vatican Synod had power to effect the change. In what were probably the last words he ever spoke on the subject, a few days only before his imprisonment, Archbishop Darboy characterized the infallibilist dogma as "un dogme inepte." It is possible that the Court of Rome may be compelled at its cost to acquiesce in a similar conclusion. It has all along been notorious that a large section of the Parisian clergy share Dr. Michaud's convictions, and now that the ice has once been broken, some at least may have the manliness to declare themselves. And it is anyhow significant that the Old Catholic movement should have been taken up by the clergy of a nation which, as Dr. Döllinger lately observed, is the habitual interpreter of world-stirring ideas and discoveries to Europe, and by a man marked out alike by his antecedents, his attainments, and his eloquence as one of the most eminent and influential of the clerical body. There is something almost grotesque in the circumstance that only a few days before the publication of Dr. Michaud's letter the Abbé Theodores Loyson, the Ultramontane brother of Father Hyacinthe, in a lecture at the Sorbonne on the "Catholic Renaissance of France, and the Schism of Munich," was indiscreet enough to assert, with a somewhat premature outburst of devout gratitude, that "the German Schism, thank God, will not invade France." The "German Schism" has meanwhile just obtained a signal victory in the Bavarian Chambers, where the Ultramontane party strained all their energies to upset the liberal policy of the present Ministry, and arm the bishops with legal powers to eject from their benefices all priests—beginning of course with Döllinger—who reject the new dogma. They were defeated, in a House containing an unusually large proportion of clerical members, the most noticeable feature of the debate being an energetic speech of Professor Sepp, who was till lately a strong Ultramontane, against the dogma, the crooked means by which it had been introduced through the Vatican Synod by the creation of a crowd of titular bishops, the slavish submission and intolerance of the German episcopate, and the character of their adherents, whom he described as "the old and young women of both sexes." The greater part of the bishops, he declared, do not themselves believe in the dogma; and, turning to the clerical portion of his audience, he added, amid shouts of laughter, "Do you believe it yourselves?" Dr. Reishmayer, the one theological professor of Munich who sided with Döllinger, is just dead, and it is expected that his place will be supplied by Reinkens, one of the leaders of the Akkatholik party. At Cologne the first Akkatholik service has been celebrated in the church of St. Pantaleon, Dr. Taugermann, who spoke at the Munich Congress, singing High Mass, and preaching from the words, "You shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." Another church at Cologne is also handed over to the Old Catholics. The movement is thus strengthening its hold and enlarging its area in Germany, while the war-cry is echoed from the opposite bank of the Rhine, from the very bosom of that clergy whose "filial devotion" to herself has been the standing boast of Rome.

ROMANESQUE ARCHITECTURE IN LOMBARDY.

WE spoke lately at some length of both the historical associations and the architectural remains of three of the noblest cities of what in the oldest geography was the borderland of Italy and Cisalpine Gaul. From Ravenna, Lucca, and Pisa we will ask our readers to follow us back into that old Gaulish land which in mediæval times became the truest Italy. From Tuscany we will again turn ourselves northward, and trace the form assumed by Romanesque art in a district which, in the fluctuations of Italian geographical nomenclature, we may perhaps be allowed to speak of as specially Lombardy. This is a Lombardy which stretches on both sides of the Po, but which does not take in the cities of the land known at different times as Venetia, as the Veronese or the Trevisan March, and, earlier still, by the startling, but perfectly harmless, name of the Lombard Austria. Our present district lies mainly within the Lombard Neustria, but we will venture to take in some more southern cities, lying all of them within the Lombardy of the Hohenstaufen, most of them within the dominion of the Visconti Dukes of Milan. We purpose, in short, to take a glance at the evidence on our subject supplied by the cities of Modena, Parma, Piacenza, and the once rival capitals of Pavia and Milan. The last-named city indeed might, from other points of view, claim as full a notice as Pisa and Ravenna. But as a contribution to the history of Romanesque architecture, the buildings of Milan, though of very high importance, are still of a kind which will be best treated in a group with several others.

The student who transports himself suddenly from the Arno and the Apennines to the river-basin of the Po will find himself spirited away into a new architectural world. Let him flit from Pisa to Modena. Pistoia, a city of high interest on other grounds, will not long detain him. A single noble campanile is attached to a basilican Duomo which would hold a third or fourth-rate place at Lucca, and which at Pisa no one would think of mentioning at all. The church of Pisa and the church of Modena are contemporary buildings, and the Great Countess is honoured as a benefactress to both; but they are as far removed from one another as any two buildings of the same date and general style well can be. At Modena we get our first glimpse of the genuine Lombard form of the Italian Romanesque, a form wholly unlike either the domical or the basilican type, and which makes a far nearer approach to the Romanesque of the lands beyond the Alps. The approach is indeed only an approach; the Duomo of Modena is Italian, and not English, French, or German; still it is a form of Italian far less widely removed from English, French, or German work than the style of Pisa or St. Vital. As at Pisa, the architect seems to have halted between two opinions. The church is cruciform, but the transepts have no projection on the ground-plan; there are real lantern-arches, not obscured as they are at Pisa, but they do not bear up any central dome or tower. The lantern-arches are pointed; but here, as at Pisa, the pointed form is more likely to be Saracenic than Gothic. Without, three eastern apses, rising from between pinnacles of quite Northern character, group boldly with one of the noblest campaniles in Italy, which is certainly not improved by the later addition of a spire. The great doorways rest on lions; the west front has a noble wheel window; the greater part of the outside is lavishly arcaded, but the arcading is of a different type from that of Lucca and Pisa, the long rows of single arcades; the favourite form of Modena is that of several small arches grouped under a containing arch. We are therefore not surprised to find, on entering the church, an elevation more nearly after the Northern type than anything which we have yet seen in Italy. At Pisa we saw an arcade, triforium, and clerestory; but the triforium was not so much the Northern type itself as the Northern type translated into Italian language. But at Modena we find as genuine a triforium as in any minister of England or Normandy. To be sure its form seems somewhat rude and awkward, as if the containing arch had been crushed by the lofty clerestory above, and eyes familiar with Norman detail may possibly be amazed at the sight of mid-wall shafts, and those of a somewhat rough type, showing themselves in such a position. But the mid-wall shaft is constructively as much in its place in a triforium as it is in a lofty window, and in the whole elevation there is nothing lacking; there are pier-arch, triforium, and clerestory, and the deep play of the highest range hides the presence of any continuous blank spaces such as we have seen in the basilican churches. The capitals are a strange mixture of classical and barbaric forms, and in the alternate piers, supporting the arches which span the nave, we find huge half-columns, which form a marked contrast to the tall slender shafts commonly used in like positions in Northern churches. Altogether the Cathedral of Modena is strictly an Italian church, yet the approaches to Northern forms are very marked, and they are of a kind which suggests the direct imitation of Northern forms or the employment of Northern architects.

At our next stopping-place, if we venture to discern traces of the same influence, it is to a much smaller extent, and, such as it is, it has made its way into a church of far more distinctly Italian character than that of Modena. At Parma attention may easily be drawn away from the cathedral itself to the noble baptistery, one of the grandest in Italy, and in which most of the details show the widest departure from anything to which we are used north of the Alps. Here, in most of the stages within and without, we find the ornamental arcade cast aside for the ornamental colonnade. It is an entablature instead of a range of arches which rests on the small decorative shafts. Yet even here, in the strange capitals of some of the lower columns, and in the vast doorways with their many receding arches, we may see a certain approach to Northern forms which contrasts strangely with the ultra-classical survival in the other details. In the Duomo itself it is not always easy to say how much is genuine Romanesque work, and how much is that later reproduction or adaptation of Romanesque work of which we have seen so many examples in Italy. The west front is thoroughly Italian; and nothing can be less like a Norman church, though at the same time few architectural objects can be grander, than the present effect of the apsidal east-end and apsidal transepts joining to support the noble octagon cupola. But inside we have, as at Modena, the genuine pier-arch, triforium, and clerestory, just as we might see them in England or Normandy, except that the triforium consists of a range of four arches in each bay, not grouped together under a containing arch as at Modena. Yet this arrangement may possibly remind the spectator of Matilda's church at Caen, and the vaulting shafts at Parma approach far more nearly to Northern forms than those of Modena. Still at Parma the departures from the more purely Italian type are of a kind which do not force themselves upon the eye so strongly as those at Modena.

The Duomo of Piacenza, though much altered, contains some fine Romanesque portions, but there is nothing in them which especially connects itself with the Romanesque of the North. We pass on to two churches of the highest interest, both architectural and historical, an examination of which may perhaps throw some light on the questions which we have already started. These are the two great Romanesque churches which still survive in the once rival cities of Northern Italy, in Quercia Milan, and in Imperial Pavia. We pass by the crowds of other objects presented by those two noble cities, and fix our attention on the two buildings which will teach us most for our immediate purpose—the churches of St. Ambrose at Milan, and St. Michael at Pavia. At Milan we will turn away from the dazzling exterior, the really solemn interior of the comparatively modern Duomo, and fix our thoughts on the venerable temple which covers the dust of the patron saint of Milan and the dust of the most truly Italian Emperor, and which boasts, truly or falsely, of containing the resting-place of the one worthy antagonist whom Rome sent forth to withstand the Gothic invader. A flash of the old magic of Ravenna passes over us as we look on the tomb of St. Ambrose, on the tomb of Lewis the Second, and on what at least professes to be the tomb of Stilicho. The mosaics of its spreading apse might hold their own in Pisa, in Ravenna, or in Venice, and one small portion of the pile lays claim to a date going back to the days of the saint whom it commemorates. But for our purpose we must pass on from the days of the saint to the days of the Cæsar, the Cæsar who was the champion of Italy against the Saracens, the truest Emperor that she had seen since the days of Majorian, the truest King that she has seen from Theodoric to our own day. It was under the worthiest of the Karlings, Lewis, King and Emperor, that the pile arose in which he lies buried. It seems impossible to withstand the direct evidence which assigns not only the glorious goldsmiths' work of the high altar and the soaring baldachino above it, but the main part of the building itself, to Archbishop Anshert in 868. The building has received large changes and additions; the vault with the pointed arches across the nave, the octagonal dome, the advanced upper story of the west front, seem all to belong to a renovation which began in the twelfth century, most likely after the overthrow of the city by Frederick Barbarossa. But everything leads us to believe that, in the main arcades of the nave, and in the most distinctive feature of the whole building, the cortile or western cloister, the genuine work of the ninth century still survives. It is the genuine Lombard style, something utterly unlike the classical forms of Ravenna, Lucca, Pisa. It comes nearer to our Northern Romanesque in its Norman variety, but it has throughout an earlier and ruder air. The general look of the building is dark and cavernous; the proportions are low and broad; the arcades support a large open triforium, like Norwich or Waltham, but without a clerestory—in that resembling the great minister of St. Sernin at Toulouse. As at Pisa, the arcade is continued across the transept arches, and here also the triforium assumes the form of coupled arches under a containing arch. The compound pier is used throughout both in the church and the cortile, to the exclusion alike of the classical column, of the square piers of the German Romanesque, and of the vast cylindrical piers of the English form of Norman. But there is a heavy squareness and flatness throughout surpassing anything in Norman work. The capitals are famous for the lavish use of animal forms; nowhere in Italy is there less imitation of classical forms. The Ionic volute alone seems here, as everywhere, to have lived on in the mind of the artist, and, both here and elsewhere, many strange forms occur which show that that favourite form of ornament was never forgotten. A bunch of leaves, a head, human or animal, may easily be so disposed as to keep the general effect of the volute; and when the beast represented happens to be a ram, one of those cycles which play their part in art as well as in everything else has brought back the architectural form to its first legendary origin. Some of the double-headed beasts at Milan can hardly fail to remind us of some of the double-headed beasts at Persepolis; but the likeness is doubtless as purely accidental as the likeness which has been often remarked between the columns in the Treasury at Mykéné and those to be seen in many a Romanesque building among ourselves. The subjects of some of the capitals should be noticed, as well as those in other parts where animal forms are used. Some are mere plays of fancy, others seem to represent hunting scenes; but there is a more remarkable one in the west front, representing a human figure between two lions. The reference to the sports of the amphitheatre is obvious, but its special purport may be doubted. It may of course refer to some legend of martyrdom; but it should not be forgotten that the combats with wild beasts went on at least as late as the reign of Theodoric, though they were looked on with no favouring eye by the Gothic King and his great minister. Altogether, if we can really believe this church to be in its main features the genuine work of Ansebert, we have in it one of the most instructive buildings in all Christendom. And the evidence seems directly in favour of such a belief. From St. Ambrose we shall then naturally turn to St. Michael at Pavia, where we shall find, among many later changes, the main portions of a church of the same character, therefore most likely of the same date as St. Ambrose. The general effect of the interior is somewhat less dark and cavernous, but the arrangement of arcade and triforium without any clerestory is essentially the same, and the same flatness and squareness reigns in the compound piers and their capitals. But one feature is prominent at Pavia which is not to be seen at Milan. The mid-wall shaft has thrust itself into places where we should least have looked for it, into the transept front and into a range of coupled windows running across the whole western façade itself. In both these two remarkable churches it is far from easy to distinguish the earliest work from later changes which follow the same general forms. But we have little doubt that in the main arcades of both we have work of an age of which in Northern countries we have nothing but a few uncertain fragments.

It is indeed impossible to believe, even if we bear in mind the wide differences which probably existed between Lombardy and Tuscany, that these buildings can be of later date than the columnar churches of Pisa and Lucca, with their elaborate and highly classical detail. Tuscany may either have uninterruptedly retained classical forms, or it may have deliberately fallen back upon them; but it is hardly possible that Milan and Pavia should have so far lagged behind as to have produced such work as we see in St. Ambrose and St. Michael in the twelfth century, after such work as we have seen at both Lucca and Pisa in the eleventh. And if the ruder parts of St. Ambrose do not date from the reparation in the twelfth century, they can hardly fail to date from the rebuilding by Ansebert in the ninth. We have then in these examples a genuine Romanesque style, which had worked itself remarkably free from classical detail, while preserving the main constructive features of Roman architecture. It is probably the earliest form of pure Romanesque which was worked out, a form distinct alike from German and Norman, but from which both German and Norman architects doubtless borrowed ideas in after times. On this style came the great architectural movement of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, which, in different ways, so greatly modified the Romanesque of all Western Europe. In Italy it chiefly took the form of a Renaissance, a falling back on classical forms, as at Pisa and Lucca, at Murano and Torcello. In other cases, as at Parma and more strongly at Modena, the style took a direction which distinctly assimilated it to Northern forms, whichever side of the Alps we may hold to have borrowed from the other. In a third class, as at St. Zeno, we get a type intermediate between the classical forms of Tuscany and Venetia and an improved and refined variety of the Lombard style of Milan and Parma. The Italian Romanesque thus offers many types, varying considerably, partly according to date, partly according to district. But all are Italian; all agree in those points of difference from Northern buildings which are caused partly by difference of climate, partly by difference of national traditions. However nearly an Italian church may approach to a Northern one in its internal arcades, the external effect is always utterly different. No Italian church shows the varied outlines, the ever-shifting groupings, of the great churches of Germany. Even the less elaborate outline of a Norman or English church with its three towers finds only a feeble approach to it at St. Ambrose. The high roof is unknown, and the absence alike of the high roof and of any towers thoroughly worked into the building gives an utterly different form to the main fronts. The style, in all its various forms, is thoroughly national. It is a style which has largely attracted the attention of architectural students, but it may still be studied with advantage by a more strictly historical and comparative method than has hitherto commonly been done. It should especially be compared with the contemporary forms of other Southern countries, of Provence and Aquitaine. For our own part we have done nothing more than throw out a few hints suggested by a few particular buildings. One subject more will bring our present survey of Italian cities and their buildings to an end. We cannot part from the Romanesque of Italy without a few words as to the change by which so noble and truly national a style was cast aside to make room for a feeble imitation of the Northern forms of a later age.

MR. HARCOURT ON OUR INSULAR POSITION.

WE all know that Great Britain is an island. It has pleased Mr. Vernon Harcourt to produce poetical authority for the fact, but perhaps the defensibility of our insular position may be most conveniently discussed in prose. We may remark, however, that the poem which Mr. Harcourt has translated exhorts Britain to rely rather on her navy than her army, and that is all. Without exactly apportioning the share which navy and army might be expected to take in repelling invasion, we should like to see the country able to rely on both. Mr. Harcourt has given us some rhymes against military preparation, but he has certainly given us no reason. Let him look at the martello towers and other defensive works which were erected on the Southern coast during the years of Britain's greatest naval power. They form a durable monument of the opinion of the statesmen of that time that the defence of the country could not be safely entrusted to her fleet alone. The history of the year 1805 has been referred to by Mr. Harcourt and his opponents with equal confidence; but it surely is tolerably plain that this country ran fearful risk during that year, to which no sane man would expose her if it could be avoided. Mr. Harcourt is desirous to show that Nelson and the fleet which he commanded were not "decoyed away" from home defence to the West Indies. It is doubtless true, as Mr. Harcourt says, that the French could only draw Nelson to the West Indies by going thither themselves, and thus the European fleets of the contending Powers were reduced by nearly an equal number of ships on either side. But evidently Napoleon proceeded on the supposition that his fleet might reach some point of effective action, were it the West Indies or Ireland or England, in advance of Nelson. This attempt so nearly succeeded as to show that it might quite succeed another time. That is all that the advocates of a second line of defence say, and it is enough. Mr. Harcourt has now got up the facts of our naval history tolerably well, but he does not reason upon them satisfactorily. "If," he says, "the French Admiral, instead of making Ferrol, had tried at Brest, he would have encountered a still more crushing defeat from the Channel Fleet under Admiral Cornwallis, with a force equal to his own." But at this time there lay in Brest, ready for sea, a fleet under Ganteaume at least equal to that of Cornwallis; and if Villeneuve, having got the start, as he did, of Nelson, had appeared off Brest, he would have had the opportunity of combining in an attack on the British with a superiority of two to one. We think that Cornwallis would have slipped through somehow, but there was the opportunity if Villeneuve had had the skill to take advantage of it. He steered for Ferrol instead of Brest, and before he reached Ferrol he was intercepted by Calder, who had raised the blockade of that port, and was cruising to the westward of it to intercept Villeneuve. But Calder left in Ferrol a Spanish squadron of more than half his own strength, and if that squadron had put to sea in time to assist Villeneuve, it might have gone hard with Calder. Besides, there was a French squadron at sea which had escaped from Rochefort, and this also might have fallen in with Villeneuve, or have appeared off Brest to co-operate with Ganteaume. It happened that this Rochefort squadron neither did nor suffered any great mischief, although it took more than forty prizes and caused intense alarm to British mercantile and colonial interests. The British navy of that time was not only numerically strong, but it possessed a familiarity with naval warfare as then conducted which its enemies could not approach. The bold measure of ordering Calder to raise the blockade of Ferrol was suggested to the Admiralty by the expectation that he might have time to defeat Villeneuve before the Spaniards in Ferrol could or would move to the assistance of their allies. In the same spirit the Admiralty ordered Cornwallis to cruise between Ushant and Finisterre, so as to give him the opportunity of defeating Villeneuve, if he came that way, before Ganteaume could make up his mind to sail from Brest. Yet the success of these tactics should not conceal the tremendous risk which they involved. Besides in those days it was known by experience what British ships and seamen could do, and the same cannot be said now. We do not doubt the skill or bravery of British seamen, but it is at least uncertain how some of the ships would behave at sea.

It may perhaps help to make the arguments of Mr. Harcourt and his opponents intelligible if we give a brief summary of the events of the naval war of 1805. We shall then see clearly what were the risks to which this country was exposed, and how it was preserved from them. A treaty had been signed in December 1804 between France and Spain, by which the French fleets and ports were placed at the disposal of the Spanish fleet.

power. "It," says Mr. James in his Naval History, "Napoleon with his forty or forty-five sail of the line had calculated to create such a diversion of the British fleets as should give him a clear channel for his flotilla to cross, how must his expectations have been raised now that he possessed the disposal of upwards of seventy sail of the line!" Mr. Harcourt has quoted from this author, and will probably admit the accuracy of his History; and this is the conception which he had formed of Napoleon's plan. By alarming England for the safety of her colonies and commerce all over the world, the Emperor hoped to induce her to weaken her fleet at home, and thus to find an opportunity of invading England, or at least Ireland.
